I call you lovers, you see. Perhaps I am mistaken. Well, for Harry I will not insist, but for Laura I have no doubt. He said to you, did he not? that as he was going away he wished to have the satisfaction of writing to you, for it was delightful to have a woman for a true friend, and that he despised the folly of supposing that men and women could not have intimate friendships without falling in love. He said that he had few friends, and that in the heat and contest of life it would be refreshing to have one sincere and impartial counselor who would be a kind of conscience to him—a beacon-light in the dark and doubtful way. Moreover, he wished to compare opinions with you in literature and art; to exchange the impressions received from books and pictures; to converse in perfect confidence about persons and events; in a word, to pour out his mind and heart with absolute freedom, and that you should do the same. And you, my dear Laura, how did you feel, how do you feel about it all? Is it not your secret and most fixed desire to do this? If you were to know that it could not be, that Harry was not to write in this intimate manner to you, and that you were not to answer, would it not be a very sore sorrow to you? If your mother should forbid it absolutely, would you not believe her to be the most unreasonable and the most cruel of parents? Would you not renounce all other correspondents rather than Harry? Yet if you knew that he were engaged, would you still care to correspond with him? If you knew that he would rather write to another than to you, would you answer his letters with such unspeakable delight?

Certainly you would not; and why not? I need not reply—answer yourself. You think that Harry is a proud and ill-disciplined spirit, full of talent and accomplishments; and you have told your mother—she and I are old, old friends—that there is not the slightest fear of his ever being in love with you or of your loving him. That he is fascinating, of course, you do not deny. That he can persuade any other girl than you to fall in love with him, you have no doubt. But you understand each other so thoroughly, you have so positively and finally settled your relation to each other, that it is foolish to pretend any fear of unexpected consequences from the most familiar correspondence and the most intimate friendship. And, my dear Laura, you are twenty years old, I think, next October. How invaluable is experience! You have nothing, it seems, to learn. There are no surprises, no disappointments, for you. You and Harry have talked it all over, and there is no possibility that you should ever be lovers.

Ah, my Princess Rasselas, listening with credulity to the fond whispers of your wishes, listen also to a little story.

In my youth, dear Laura, I knew the most delightful of men. You would hardly believe that old Algernon Ridley, whose palsied form you see painfully tottering and shuffling along the avenue, was ever an Adonis. But he was. He captivated men and he conquered women, and like most heroes and conquerors he knew his own power. My cousin Mary Latimer and he were neighbors. They played together, first; then as they grew older they walked and rode and boated, while yet he was a boy and she a girl. Next came college, and away he went. They said a blithe good-by and parted, nor did they meet again until the long vacation. Home came the handsome Algernon, no more a boy. Frank, familiar, buoyant, he was even more welcome than before. The swift years flew. Each added a grace to her, a charm to him. He told her of his college life; the mad pranks; the hopes; the triumphs. She told him of the town gossip, of the books she read, the journeys she made, the friends she gained. "My friend Mary Latimer," said Algernon to his intimate college companions, "is one of the noblest of women, we are the best of friends." "My friend Algernon Ridley," said Mary to her mother, "is the brightest man in college. I am very fortunate in having such a friend, don't you think so, mamma?"

It was curious how much she talked of Algernon, how constantly she congratulated herself upon her good fortune in his friendship, and how very intimate they were when he came home. "People seem to think that Algernon and I can not be good friends without being lovers, mamma; how foolish people are!" Then Mary told her mother a little of the heart history of her friend; how he was idolized by the cleverest girls; how they would fall in love with him; how sorry he was, but what could he do, and what a remarkable young man he was, needing, evidently, nothing but a firm and faithful woman for a friend, with whom there was no danger of his falling in love. Home came Algernon a graduate. For a few weeks he was to enjoy the delights of idleness before beginning the study of his profession. It was summer; it was a lovely country; and almost every day and almost all day Algernon and Mary were together. She took her work into the woods, and while she sat fair as a nymph upon the rock, he smiled and swung himself into the pine-trees with his stalwart arms, and, hidden in the evergreen foliage, his voice rang out in the warm silence of the woods in a tone half gay, half earnest, but rich and strong and sweet:

"So now my summer task is ended, Mary,
And I return to thee, my own 'heart's home,'
As to his queen some victor knight of faery,
Earning bright spoils for her enchanted dome."

Then down he bounded, laughing, to her feet, and said, "Do you know that? It is the prelude to Shelley's 'Prometheus.' I like Shelley because he despised the conventions. He thought the dismal old world a fool, and he told it so. And who had a better right to tell it so? He was a poet. Hark! hear that wood-thrush! Shenstone was a poet too, when he sang:

"I have found out a gift for my fair,
I have found where the wood-pigeons breed,
But let me such plunder forbear;
She will say 'twas a barbarous deed;
For he ne'er could be true, she averred,
Who would rob a poor bird of her young;
And I loved her the more when I heard
Such tenderness fall from her tongue."

He looked up in her face as he repeated the lines. Fair as a wood-nymph, I say, Mary Latimer sat upon the rock, and her busy fingers flew and her soft eyes answered his, and her happy heart was contented with such a friend.

"Busy, busy—always busy," he would say. "Mary, you country girl, you village maiden, do you remember those lovely lines that gruff old Ursa Major used to like to repeat?

"Verse sweetens toil, however rude the sound;
Still ~~after~~ her work the village maiden sings,
And as she turns the busy wheel around,
Revolves the sad vicissitude of things."

Well, I too must turn the busy wheel around, although I am not exactly a village maiden; and, Mary, I shall want to hold in my hand some clew to the dear old days; so you will write to me, and we can be just as good friends as ever."

With the evening they returned; and so the summer days of idleness passed by—to her all poetry and music and manly beauty and fascination. He went, and Mary told her mother about the correspondence. Her mother was wise, and begged her not to consent. "Why, mother, how absurd! Algernon and I understand each other perfectly. Our friendship is purely Platonic." Then for an hour she talked of him, describing every thing he did, repeating every thing he said, until her mother replied:

"Mary, it is a matter in which my experience must decide. Unless you love Algernon more than me, you will not write to him. When you see him you are conscious of some faults, but they do not overcome your feeling for him. When he writes he will seem faultless. He has no right to ask you to give him all your confidence, except upon one condition."

Mary looked at her mother, and burst into tears.

When she told Algernon that her mother was unwilling that she should correspond with him, he said that it was extraordinary, because they understood each other perfectly, and knew that they were capable of a Platonic friendship.

"We know that it is just that and nothing more, don't we, Mary?"

"Certainly we do," said Mary.

He went, and Mary had no life left but in remembering the wood-walks and the poetry, and his tones and his looks as he repeated it. But she did not write. The next summer he came again. The walks were renewed. There was more Shelley; and one day, soon after he returned, Algernon said to her:

"Mary, I am off for a week—for I am engaged to the most beautiful woman in the world. I want you to know each other, for I am sure we shall all three be as good friends as we two have been. And, now, I don't believe your mother will object to our corresponding. We, at least, have shown that a young man and woman may have a Platonic friendship."

Well, dear Laura, Algernon Ridley never brought the most beautiful woman in the world to see his Platonic friend, and Mary Latimer never married. If you see any moral in the little story you must apply it as you please. Don't say the moral is that young men and women should avoid each other's society, and never walk in the woods and never quote Shelley. No, no; consider the immense advantage that a man has. You think yourself able to cope with him. You believe that all baggage is at the risk of the owner. Perhaps it is so. Don't take any warning of mine, if you think it unreasonable; but let your heart and your consciousness decide if it be unreasonable. Is a rose less a rose because you choose to call it by another name? Is love less love because you and Harry call it Platonic friendship? Be frank with yourself, my dear Laura, and just to Harry. How if, under the Platonic mask, you should associate with perfect intimacy and suddenly you should discover that, although you had been mistress of yourself all the while, Harry had become your passionate lover? Could you feel quite guiltless? Would you not, upon the whole, think that, in the light of common-sense, the folly had been of the kind called criminal? But if, on the other hand, you should suddenly discover that, while Harry had been serene lord of himself, you had—

Trust my experience; trust that of Mary Latimer's mother; trust that of Mary Latimer, and call love love, and not Platonic friendship.

Your well wisher,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

TOILETTE APPLIANCES.

BRUSHES.

A MORNING at the fancy stores discloses many convenient appliances for the toilette. Beginning our inspection at a case filled with brushes we are advised that the most desirable are those that are trepanned, or made with holes drilled in the back through which the bristles are looped and secured by wires. The backs of such brushes consist of one entire piece, and are consequently stronger and less clumsy than those with an outside piece glued on to conceal the wires. French brushes are more readily sold than the expensive ones of English manufacture. The durable American brushes with rosewood backs are commended for ordinary use. The bristles are long and stiff, and cut in irregular points to penetrate the hair. Trepanned buffalo brushes at from $3 to $7 are chosen for nicer use. When inlaid with pearl they are quite ornamental. Valuable brushes with tortoise-shell backs are sold at from $15 to $30. Ivory backs, beautifully carved, worth from $10 to $40, are suitable for bridal presents. This expensive yellow ivory is called by dealers green or live ivory, as it is made of tusks taken from the animal while alive or immediately after it is killed. It has a peculiar yellowish color, is very beautifully grained, and is almost transparent. Tooth, nail, and cloth brushes, carved like the hair-brush, make up the bridal set. The monogram of the bride is painted in colors on each brush.

Tooth-brushes should always be trepanned to prevent the bristles from coming loose in the mouth. Those shown us of ivory and shell are sold at $2.50. The handles are jointed, and may be doubled into a small compass. A plated silver case, large enough to cover the bristles, is provided to protect them from the dust. This is a convenient device for stowing away a damp brush when traveling. Tooth and nail brushes are in sets with handles to match. A spool of white silk floss is sold with them for removing impurities between the teeth—a better plan dentists say than to use a pick. People who are fond of the odor of sandal-wood find a toilette luxury in tooth-brushes made of this wood. They are made in the best manner, and are very durable, lasting for years. To retain their fragrance they must be kept as dry as possible and in a close box. The price is sixty cents. Nail-brushes of sandal-wood are $1.25.

Small brushes for children have bristles of graduated stiffness, beginning with the soft hair of the badger for the tender scalp of an infant. A stiffer brush is used each year as time hardens the scalp.

COMBS.

Tortoise-shell combs are the most pleasant for dressing the hair. At first these are brittle, and require to be used with care, but with use they become saturated with the natural oil of the hair and with pomades, which renders them as tough as buffalo. Ivory combs are expensive and very frail, as they are made lengthwise of the animal's tusk. The short, fine-tooth combs are made crosswise of the ivory, and are more durable than the substantial-looking dressing comb. The buffalo comb is the standard article. Black and bleached buffalo range from fifty cents to $2. Rubber combs are cheap and strong, but they exhale a disagreeable odor when warm and saturated with the natural oil of the hair. A pretty, new enameled-steel comb is commended for durability and cheapness. Magnetic combs, made of lead, we believe, are said to darken red hair to a perfect shade of auburn. The best comb-cleaner has a stiff brush at one end, and a row of steel spikes at the other for inserting between the teeth of the comb to remove particles of dirt.

TOILETTE VARIETIES.

Hand-mirrors of French plate glass with ivory backs are marked $40. The high price arises from the large tusk required to give a solid piece of ivory wide enough for the broad glass. The glass is very fine, but the same quality framed in rosewood is sold for $4.50. Double glasses with a mirror on each side are shown. Others with rubber backs are low-priced, and desirable because rubber does not warp as wood and shell are apt to do. A fancy toilette mirror twelve inches in diameter is marked $50. The thick, beveled crystal is set in a frame of bronze enameled in colors to represent a wreath of eglantine. Another for the boudoir is of highly polished crystal framed in dark wood carved in Switzerland. Price $35.

Nail-cleaners, with brush, point, and file, are shown in ivory, pearl, and shell. A French addition to the toilette is a box containing all the appliances for fastidious treatment of the nails, viz.: a nail-cleaner of pearl, a small vial of powder for giving a pink tinge to the nails, slips of sand-paper for smoothing them, and a piece of chamois skin attached to a pearl handle for polishing them off. Price $7. Another is a pocket-piece, a nail-cutter, and penknife, for which somebody has taken out a patent—every thing is patented nowadays. It is used for paring, filing, and cleansing the nails, and by moving a gauge it becomes a penknife, eraser, and ripping-knife. The gauge on the knife fits over the nail, protecting the fingers from being cut.

An olive-wood ball, hollow with a screw top, not larger than a walnut, contains a tiny puff of swan's-down and a thimbleful of violet powder. It is small enough to be carried in the pocket for cooling a heated face.

Sandal-wood shavings for perfuming drawers are sold at one dollar a pound. Saw-dust of sandal-wood is seventy-five cents a pound.

The Mediterranean sponge is the best for toilette use. It is of thick, close texture. Only a small supply is brought to this country, as it is very expensive. A small piece of convenient shape for bathing is sold at $4. The common bath sponge is much cheaper.

Toilette-cases are of every variety and price. A neat and compact one called the "Indispensable" is furnished with a buffalo comb and brushes for the hair, teeth, and nails. Price $5. Another has an outfit of tortoise-shell including cloth-brush and nail-cleaner. Price $50. A dressing-case of Turkey morocco lined with blue satin has shell-combs and ivory brushes, glove-stretcher, and mirror. $75 in gold is the price. A combination-case for a lady and gentleman is made of Russian leather. Besides the usual supply of combs, etc., this is provided with shaving apparatus, perfume-bottles, cut-glass boxes with silver covers for cosmetics and soap, a knife, scissors, and tweezers. These are strapped to the lid and arranged in trays in a box not more than a foot square. Price $95 in currency. An elegant case, designed for a bridal gift, is of the pale Russia leather and scarlet-velvet lining, with a toilette outfit of carved ivory, including hand-mirror, glove-stretcher, and shoe-horn. Price $140. A fancy case, made in Nice, is of olive-wood inlaid with other woods in the beautiful French marquetry. The most valuable of all is of Coromandel wood, lined with velvet, and furnished with ivory and silver. Price $450.

Pretty odor-caskets were shown us made of onyx, a clear, transparent stone of pink, white, or green, with gilt bands, hinges, and pegs. They contain from two to six bottles of engraved glass, with mosaic landscapes on the stoppers. Bohemian vinaigrettes with gilt tops are made double, with separate bottles for different salts, or with a small place for sal volatile at one end, with vinegar and sponge at the other. Glove-boxes and mouchoir cases are in sets matching the odor-caskets. Glove-stretchers of ivory, plain and carved, are sold separately at from $9 to $15. Sachet-boxes of bands of white china, resembling carved ivory, are lined with gay-colored satin bags filled with perfumed powder.

The jardinière toilette-sets for cologne and powder are much admired. The stoppers are hollowed out for vases. A beautiful set of frosted glass, ruby, and gold is marked $50. It has a douche-basin, carafe, ring-stands, cologne-bottles, cosmetic-box, and others for brushes and soap. Another set is white decorated with gilt bands studded with imitation emeralds. A light green Bohemian set has a Grecian border of gilt.

FANS.

A carriage fan just introduced serves also for a parasol. It is a circle of fluted silk covered with lace. The stick is of white-wood. It is easily adjusted. The price varies from $6 to $8. A larger fan of more complicated arrangement may be transformed into a flat parasol of the Japanese shape. These are made of painted wood, or of silk, with a border of marabout. They are chosen for driving in open carriages at the sea-side or in the Park. The Watteau fans of carved wood painted to represent flowers, introduced last season, are still used for demi-toilette. A tasteful novelty in wooden fans is of French origin. The sticks, of light-colored wood resembling ivory, are prettily carved. The centre is covered with mauve or azure silk, on which flowers are painted. A heavy tassel and ring or slide in the color of the silk. Price $9. The myall-wood fans are preferred by many to sandal-wood. This Australian wood and the orris-root are the only substances known in nature which exude the odor of violets. The fans are either of the rich, dark wood, or are ornamented with wreaths of violets, painted in natural colors, and cost from $5 to $10. A bridal fan with pearl sticks, mounted with round point lace without silk lining, is sold for $60. Another of carved pearl, with white watered silk top covered with point appliqué, is $45. A third has pearl sticks tinted like opal. The top is white silk, with a basket of appliqué lace in the centre, and a painted medallion of gay French device, a wreath of flowers, a shepherd's crook, and rustic pipes. Price $34. Sticks of green ivory, mounted with black lace over white, are suitable for half-mourning. The brown and maroon colored pearl are only used by elderly ladies. A fan of pearl sticks has a black moiré top, on which are painted Pompeian designs in gilt and crimson. Carved and perforated bone like ivory is mounted with white satin embroidered. Price $20. Handsomely carved sandal-wood fans are bought for $6. Expensive ones ornamented with floral monograms cost $25. Small pocket-fans of silk are sold for $2. Muslin ones cost but fifty cents. Very pretty fans are made of ivory or white composition, with initials or monograms of forget-me-nots or rosebuds painted thereon.

PERSONAL.

THE articles in the London Pull Mail Gazette on "Woman," written with great brilliancy, are from the pen of a daughter of the late Mrs. J. S. MILL, by her first husband. She is Mr. MILL's private secretary, and a contributor to the Westminster Review. These articles, together with those in the Saturday Review, have turned the public attention of England to the Woman Question.

Before this Number of the Bazar reaches our readers the marriage of PATTI will have taken place, as the last Paris papers contain the following extract from the bans placarded at the mayor's office of the First Arrondissement: "M. Louis Sebastian Henri de Roger de Calsuzac, Marquis de Caux, son of the Count and Demoiselle Huguet de Varange, now the wife of the Duke de Valmy, and Mlle. Adèle-Jeanne-Marie Patti, propriétaire, daughter of M. Salvatore Patti and Catherine Bhoza, rentiers."

Count BISMARCK's wages, as Prime Minister of Prussia, are but $9000 per annum, which is only $1000 more than this upstart government pays to its cabinet officers. LOUIS NAPOLEON pays better than any of the Old World potentates, his chief advisers receiving from $30,000 to $60,000 each per annum.

The Duke of MONTPENSIER, youngest son of the late Louis PHILIPPE, has been banished from Spain. He married the only sister of the Queen of Spain. He was arrested at Seville, and allowed only two hours to prepare to leave the country. On being taken on board a Spanish frigate and asking where he was to be taken, he was told he would be informed when in open sea. He was subsequently allowed about twenty hours; but was unable to take leave of his five children, who were at a place a few miles distant. The Duke is accused of being involved in a wide conspiracy to overthrow the Queen of Spain; but the general belief was that he was in no way engaged in the plot.

HENRY WELLS, Esq., one of the pioneer express-men of the time, has built and endowed a seminary for young ladies at his home in Aurora, Cayuga County, New York, and it was "inaugurated" a few days since with appropriate and very interesting ceremonies. The institution is situated on the margin of a beautiful lake, amidst beautiful grounds, and surrounded by scenery exceedingly picturesque and beautiful. Mr. WELLS is one of the good citizens, one of the invaluable citizens, of the State, and is universally respected and beloved throughout the county of his residence.

STIGELLI, the tenor, who sang successfully in Opera in this country five or six years ago, and who composed some songs of great beauty, has recently deceased. His real name wasn't STIGELLI, but STIGEL, for he was a German.

VICTOR HUGO, although annointed by LOUIS NAPOLEON, continues to be wroth with that potentate, and refuses to return to France until the NAPOLEONS are interred. He lives in fine circumstances on the island of Guernsey, and has the royal habit of allowing the crowd of common mortals and sight-seers to visit certain portions of his house at certain hours of the day, and, finally, as the supreme of happiness, to peep through a window at his back while at work in his library!

Mons. THIERS is a droll in the matter of costume, i. e., when he leaves his house to attend the Corps Legislatif: he then wears a jacket of gray silk and white trousers. Imagine Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS in such raiment.

The mode adopted by Sir WALTER SCOTT to prevent his incognito being discovered during the publication of the Waverley Novels has just been made public by Mr. GORDON, in a letter to the London Times. The proof sheets of some of them have been offered for sale, and it is stated that not one of them ever went to the printer's hands. It was SCOTT's custom to have two copies of the proof sent to him. On one of these he made the corrections, and both were then returned to JAMES BALLANTYNE, who transcribed the emendations upon the other. The object of this was of course to keep from prying eyes any scrap of his handwriting, which was familiar to many who frequented BALLANTYNE's printing-office.

Dr. JAMES CLARK, physician to Queen Victoria, and Dr. HUGHES BENNETT, a great light in the medical firmament, are among the professional gentlemen who have recently announced their belief that consumption can be cured.

A personal admirer of ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE, who has recently had the honor of a view of that gentleman, describes him as a pale person, slight, undersized in body, with a head of immense development in the upper regions. Notwithstanding his physical weakness he has great powers of application. His writings show a wide range of reading, and his conversation has no known limits. There is a very general belief among his friends that nothing he has yet published indicates the real scope of his genius; but there has, for some time, been an equally general apprehension that the demands he makes upon his strength would speedily overtask it, and that no adequate career could be expected for him.

Mr. CHISHOLM ANSTEE's investigations into old parliamentary documents have shown that women had anciently a right to vote for members of Parliament, and frequently exercised that right. It is the opinion of several learned barristers, that the common-law right of woman freeholders to vote for members of Parliament has always remained and does still remain in force to this day. In Austria not only do unmarried women and widows enjoy the right of voting, but married women who possess property of their own; nor is the right in either case a dead letter, but is freely and generally exercised, and without any of the evils which are apprehended, in other countries, from the granting of the franchise.

The Catholics will soon have a notable "personal" excitement among them. Père HYACINTHE, the most eloquent preacher in Paris, is soon coming to Canada and the United States, to study our religious movements. Whether he preaches in the Yankee dialect or not is not stated; but in Quebec and Montreal, where people of the French persuasion do much abound, he will draw large houses. His habits are said to be as simple as his dress; and he believes he will yet, by the gift of tongues Providence has endowed him with, succeed in rousing the apathy of the Christian world. At Notre Dame he drew all Paris to listen to his castigating the vices of our age, and many who went to scoff remained to pray. He is the first of French pulpit orators.

The youngest college president in the United States—probably the youngest in the world—is JAMES KENT STONE, just elected to the presidency of Hobart College, Geneva, New York. He is only 28 years of age, is a grandson of Chancellor KENT, a graduate of Harvard and Gottingen, a private in a Massachusetts regiment during the war, and lately Professor of Greek in Kenyon College, Ohio.

It is proper, we suppose, to repeat a little thing about young S. H. TRNG, who was one morning walking to a church in which he was to preach. He was accompanied by his father. On the way they got into conversation with an old colored man, who assured them that he had rejoiced in a Christian hope for upward of fifty years. "Are you going to this church?" "It was the only church in the village." "No, Sah—I neber go to that church." "You never go to church—and yet you have been a Christian these fifty years?" "No, Sah—I neber go to hear them young ministers prac-tize—I'z a preacher myself—I is."

Mr. JOHN RUSKIN, the author and critic, is obliged to rough it on the income of $3,000,000. He has a superb collection of pictures, including many of TURNER's best. He expends his entire income, after paying for daily bread, etc., in works of philanthropy, and the time of a confidential secretary is entirely occupied in answering calls upon his benevolence. He has some of the soundest, and some of the wildest notions on the subject of political economy; but being a millionaire and a genius is the fashion, and is listened to with a certain degree of respect.

Professor WILLIAM D. WILSON, of Hobart College, Geneva, has been appointed Professor of Intellectual and Moral Philosophy at Cornell University, and WILLIAM C. CLEVELAND, of Cambridge, Professor of Civil Engineering. The inauguration exercises are to be held on the 7th of October. Our Ithaca is just about the size of the ancient Ithaca (an island in the Ionian Sea) in its best day, whence ULYSSES, who was born there, sailed with his army to the shores of Asia; but it hadn't any Cornell University, nor any thing that will go down to history so creditably as the great benefaction of Mr. CORNELL, who is a Senator, and more of a man, probably, than ULYSSES was.

The home of General GRANT in Washington is a very spacious house, built, and for some time occupied, by the late Senator DOUGLAS, and in its present arrangement shows the nature and taste of the occupant. Tall walnut book-cases surround three sides of the library. Every thing relating to the business of war is there, and histories in abundance. The usual display of fiction, essays, biography, philosophy, and works of general information and reference, line the shelves. On the mantle is a cigar-stand, a bronze statuette of a drummer, and another of a bugler. Engravings of WASHINGTON, LINCOLN, SHERMAN, and SHERIDAN, and several photographs of ROGERS's statuettes are the only pictures in the room. Easy-chairs and lounges are placed carelessly about the room, and the library is without doubt the most cheerful and inviting apartment in the house. A miniature saddle and trappings in bronze and silver is fastened to cross sabres of the same metal. A bronze drum rests beside a stack of six-inch muskets; a cigar-case from the home of Burns; half a dozen curiously formed and elaborately decorated pipes and cigar-holders; powder-horns, mounted in gold and silver, each having its separate history, and a hundred rare little articles of vertu, adorn the tables and mantles. On a side-table, in tin boxes, are the five military commissions of Colonel, Brigadier-General, Major-General, Lieutenant-General, and General, with the parchments of brevet ranks which GRANT has received. Some very costly albums, prayer-books, and Bibles are also upon the table. An oil-painting of SHERIDAN and one of M'PHERSON are prominently hung in the parlors, and a marble bust and an engraving of President LINCOLN are also conspicuous.

Swiss Muslin Tidy with Tatted and Netted Rosettes.

This tidy may be used in many different ways. The rosettes are button-hole stitched on the muslin. The foundation is cut away under the rosettes. The tatted rosettes are worked with tatted cotton as follows: Work, first, the central ring with only one thread; this is composed of 1 ds. (double stitch), nine times alternating 1 p. (picot), 2 ds., then 1 p., 1 ds.; then tie together the beginning and ending threads and cut them off. The following rounds are all worked with two threads. Tie the foundation and working thread together, fasten to a picot of the central ring, and work over the foundation thread, * 4 ds., 1 p., 4 ds., fasten to the next picot, and repeat from * till the scalloped round is completed. At the end of this round fasten the working thread to the picot of the central ring at the beginning of the scalloped round. At the end of this round work a second scalloped round, each scallop of which counts 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds. Having finished one such scallop, fasten to the next picot of the central ring, tying from the under side of the work so that the first scalloped round shall lie raised above this second round. At the end of the second scalloped round the working threads must be fastened to the picot of the middle ring at the beginning of this round, after which they are tied together and cut off. The 3d-6th rounds consist also of scallops, the first two of these being fastened to the picots of the second scalloped round, and the last two to the picots of the fourth scalloped round; this is done in the same manner as in the first and second rounds of the rosette. The scallops of the 3d round always count 10 ds., and are worked without picots; the scallops of the 4th round count 7 ds., 1 p., 7 ds.; those of the 5th round 7 ds., 1 p., 7 ds.; those of the 6th round 9 ds., 1 p., 9 ds.

For the netted rosettes cast on a steel knitting-needle one-fifth of an inch in circumference nine stitches, join these in a round and work 1st round: In every stitch two stitches. 2d-4th rounds.—In every added stitch two stitches, in every other stitch one stitch. After this four rounds without widening.

The netted foundation, which is now complete, is ornamented in the centre with a star, which is worked in point de reprise; the leaves of the figure conceal the added stitches. In the centre of the star work a few knots. In the round before the last a row of embroidery is worked as shown in the illustration.

Knitted Mitt for Girl from 4 to 6 Years old.

This mitt is knitted of fine silk with fine steel knitting-needles. Begin on the under edge with a foundation of 130 stitches, join in a round and knit the 1st round: * knit two, purl two, throw the thread over; repeat from . 2d round.— purl two, knit two, throw the thread around; repeat from *. Repeat these two rounds three times more, after which follow six rounds knitted plainly. On this make an openwork row, through which is run a rubber cord. This row is worked as follows: alternately knit four, knit two together, throw the thread around. After this knit six plain rounds. Now begins the figure, which consists in the continued repetition of the two rounds first described. Each pattern row counts seven rounds. In every 8th round reverse the design, as is shown in the illustration. Care must be taken to preserve the number of stitches. Make a seam on the under part of the hand by throwing the thread over the needle and knitting together the two following stitches; at the end of the round knit together the last two stitches, and throw the thread around the needle. In the following round knit together the thread which was thrown around in the last round and the stitch of the seam. Having worked four pattern rows, begin the narrowing on both sides of the seam. In doing this knit together two stitches in every 10th round of the work. Having narrowed eighteen times on each side, knit four pattern rows without narrowing, then divide the stitches exactly even, so that the middle stitches lie opposite the seam, and begin the thumb by throwing the thread around once between the two middle stitches in the next round. This thread is knitted as a stitch in the next round. In the following round (the 3d of the thumb), throw the thread around once at each side of the made stitch. In the 4th round also knit the threads as stitches. Proceed in this manner till the thumb counts thirty stitches. In the 12th round begins the design of the mitt, which is repeated three times on the thumb. In the 31st round take the stitches of the thumb on separate needles, at the end of the last stitch cast on eighteen additional stitches, join in a round, and finish knitting the thumb separately, in doing which narrow in every round on each side of the gore by knitting together one stitch of the gore and one of the stitches newly cast on. When only eight of the newly cast on stitches remain the narrowing ceases, after which knit five rounds and cast off. Now take the under veins of the eighteen cast on stitches on a needle, and finish the mitt with four pattern rows. Knit plainly these stitches which were taken up, and narrow on both sides till all are narrowed off. After the completion of the 4th pattern row, knit one round plain and cast off.

Knitted Suspender.

This suspender is knitted with a double thread of coarse white knitting cotton: the band is in net-patent, and the parts for the button-holes in common knitting stitch. Begin on the under side of the front, cast on fourteen stitches, and knit backward and forward five rounds. Then divide the stitches into two parts, in order to form the button-hole, and knit fifteen rounds further, keeping separate the seven stitches of each half; then take all the stitches again on one needle, and knit seventeen rounds over the entire row. Now follows a second button-hole like the first, after which knit six rounds plain, adding one stitch at the end of each, so that the row shall count twenty stitches.

Now begin the band in net-patent as follows: Knit, first, one round plain, then slip the 1st stitch of the following 1st pattern row; throw the thread around the needle, slip the next stitch as if intending to purl, knit two stitches together. From * repeat 5 times. The last stitch is knitted plain.

2d pattern row.—Slip the 1st stitch; * knit together two stitches; * slip the made stitch after the 2d knitted stitch. From * repeat five times. The last stitch is knitted plain.

3d row.—Slip the 1st stitch; * knit next (here as in all the other rounds, the stitch with the made stitch immediately preceding it), throw the thread around, slip one. Repeat from *. Knit the last stitch.

4th row.—Slip one, * knit one, slip the made stitch, knit one, knit the last stitch.

Repeat these four pattern rows till the band has reached the required length. In the original it is nineteen inches long. Knit, now, six rounds entirely plain, taking off one stitch at the end of every round; then knit singly each part for the button-holes, dividing the stitches so that each is seven stitches in width. Each counts seventy-two rounds. After the first eighteen rounds make the first button-hole, as already shown. Between the first and second button-holes are eighteen rounds. Each part is rounded off by narrowing after the second button-hole. We give an illustration showing the section of a suspender which is worked in crochet lengthwise with red and black twisted wool over a foundation of fine elastic cord.

Bead Card Receiver.

This pretty card receiver is made of crystal beads. It is eight inches high and twenty-eight inches in circumference; and the stand of the stem is eighteen inches in circumference. For making the stand obtain, first, a frame made of wood and wire, as shown by Fig. 2. Then cover this with beads strung on fine wire, in doing which run the wire from one wire of the frame to the next, winding the fine wire once around it. Begin this in the centre of the cup and stand at the point where the wires diverge from the wooden stem. The single beads, as also the strings of beads, must lie closely; only that part of the wire which is wound around the wire frame-work is left without beads. This wire frame-work of the stand is covered with a row of gold beads as shown by the illustration. This is most easily done by stringing the beads on a thread five at a time, and running this around the wire by means of the needle. The edges are likewise wound with the beads strung on a fine wire, as is also the wooden stem. The trimming consists of a wreath of bead leaves. The stems are of gold beads, and the leaves of light and dark beads. Fig. 3 shows a leaf of the full size. For the leaves string on fine wire a sufficient number of green beads, and bend this into the proper form; in doing this bring both ends of the wire to the point of the leaves where they are turned back and gold beads strung on for the stem. At the opposite side of the leaf wind the ends of wire around the edge, and then string on gold beads for the stem of the leaf. From the central vein run wires to each side; those for the veins are covered with gold beads, and the remainder with green. Finally, fasten the single leaves on a wire on which are strung gold beads, and arrange it on the stand as shown in the illustration. Instead of this style of leaves, that shown by Fig. 4 may be substituted. This is arranged on a foundation of thin material, of which the holes must be somewhat smaller than the beads. Sew the beads on this, as shown in the illustration, in such a manner that a bead shall come over every hole in the stuff; in doing which run the fastened thread—from the under toward the upper side—through a hole, string on a bead, run the thread back through the same hole, then back through the next diagonal hole, string on another bead, and continue in the same manner. The veins are formed of long bead stitches, and are of gold beads, as is also the outer row. For the latter string the beads on a fine wire, and button-hole stitch this to the outer edge of the leaf. Finish by cutting away the projecting material.

Fig. 1.—CRAVAT FOR SAILOR'S BLOUSE.

Cravat for Sailor Blouse.

THIS cravat, which matches the sailor blouse in our last Number, consists of a strip of blue foulard, two inches wide in the middle and three inches wide at the ends. The ends are pointed, as shown by the illustration, and edged with a bias strip of foulard écaré. In order to fasten the cravat tie one end of it in a simple knot, as shown by Fig. 1, and run the other end through the knot, following the direction of the arrow on the illustration. The cravat may also be arranged in the manner shown by Fig. 2; in doing which turn the twist of the knot toward the right side of the cravat and run the second end through the knot under the first.

Trimmings for Blouses, Waists, etc.

Fig. 1.—Trimming of muslin and French embroidery. The centre of each rosette is a worked wheel.

Fig. 2.—This trimming consists of a double strip of white alpaca an inch and a quarter wide, which is laid in box-pleats half an inch in width. The upper edge of each pleat is turned back and fastened with a few stitches exactly in the middle of the pleat, in doing which fasten only the under layer of the material, thus preventing the stitches from showing on the right side. The place where the pleated strip is set on is covered by a double bias fold of blue silk a third of an inch in width, which is arranged as shown by the illustration. The vest blouse in our last Number is finished with this trimming.

The border, Fig. 3, is on white piqué, worked in herring-bone stitch and point russe.

Fig. 4.—Trimming of muslin and French embroidery. Work the edges with fine black silk in button-hole stitch, leaving some distance between each stitch, then button-hole stitch the edges over this again with shorter and closer stitches. A black ribbon run through in the manner shown in the illustration completes this trimming.

Fig. 5.—This trimming, which is that used on the blouse with fichu in our last Number, consists of small rounded leaves of cherry silk, bordered with a piping of white alpaca. The back of each leaf is lined with linen. The folds which head the leaves consist each of a bias strip of cherry silk an inch and a quarter in width; on one side of this sew a narrow double strip of white alpaca in such a manner that it stands out like a cord, then lay the silk strip over in such a manner that the cord shall lie along the middle of the strip, as shown by the illustration, and sew the edges down.

The simple trimming, Fig. 6, is worked on piqué. First, sew on a mignardise cord, and fasten the picots with herring-bone stitch of fine black silk. The figures are also worked with black silk in the same manner. Border the outer edge with a lace which consists of fine scalloped braid, in which has been crocheted two rounds of open-work in double crochet stitch.

used also for antimacassars, is worked on lace in muslin application. The edges of the application leaves are partly worked in button-hole stitch and partly in straight half-polka stitch. The veins of the leaves are also worked in the same manner.

Fig. 8.—This is a very pretty simple trimming of white piqué, especially intended for children's clothing. A strip of the requisite length is scalloped in the manner shown by the illustration. The edges of the material are laid over on the right side and covered with the braid which is sewed on in imitation of circles.

The insertion, Fig. 9, is worked of fine tating cotton as follows: Work a ring of 6 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), five times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 6 ds.; turning this ring downward, work, at the distance of a third of an inch, a similar ring, and continue in this manner till the insertion has reached the requisite length. The rings must, however, be fastened together by means of the picots in the manner shown by the illustration. And in order to form the pointed contour, two rings must follow each other on the same side after every nine rings.

MODERN MARRIAGES.

THE great obstacle to marriage in these days is the pecuniary one. This has been variously stated, but the result is in most cases nearly or quite the same. Every body knows the old proverb, "What is enough for one is enough for two;" but few realize how literally and absolutely true it is. A young man who has an income sufficient to maintain him in comfort as a bachelor will not find his means greatly restricted by taking to himself a wife. Of course willful waste and extravagance must be put out of the question; but supposing always that the wife is a good manager, and properly capable of ordering her own household, the balance will pretty certainly be in favor of matrimony. It is, of course, impossible to specify any particular sum as "sufficient income to marry upon," but the rule of the proverb is pretty nearly a universal one. Nor need a man fear that the wife he takes to himself will hesitate at the little sacrifices that may be necessary for the maintenance of his modest household. Girls are not quite so silly as some modern writers would like to make them out. Their mothers are certainly not always so wise or so generous as they might be, and they are as a rule too anxious for their daughters to marry "well" for them to consent readily to their receiving the addresses of poor men. Let the girl, however, but once overcome the prejudices of her friends, and settle herself down in a quiet home with her husband, and she soon develops into a very reasonable and sensible housekeeper. It does not cost her much to resign the luxuries of her father's table, nor, if she really love her husband, is she likely to give the sacrifice a second thought. The one great obstacle to full and immediate success in household matters will be the want of proper training. As a consequence, every girl is of necessity compelled to begin immediately upon her marriage the study of economical sciences as applied to the management of a small household—a business in which success is naturally at first impossible, and which requires a good deal of patience before success is finally achieved. In the course of two or three months, however, all difficulty will be overcome, and the wife, having learned economy, will find the rest of her management mere "plain sailing."

One element should by no means be omitted. No one should marry without a certain sum of ready money in hand. The present writer would be inclined to fix this at not less than two years' income, one year to be contributed by each party. Plenty of comfort may, however, be purchased with half that sum; and since in many cases there may be a difficulty in procuring the whole, it might be wiser to draw the line at the lower amount. For many reasons it would be well if the bridegroom could be induced to save his share; but seeing the innumerable expenses to which a young man is of necessity put, he will feel no shame in taking it from his parents. Too often, however, parents of the middle class, with an inexcusable cruelty, make no provision whatever for their sons in the event of their marrying, nor, for that matter, for their daughters either. It is hard to use gentle words in describing this sort of conduct. Very few people indeed are so poor that, with a little self-denial, they could not save something toward the settlement of each of their children. A single shilling a week lodged in the savings-bank in the name of each would produce a very pleasant little sum by the time the children come to marriageable age. But so much is probably attempted in about one instance in ten thousand, the remainder being left to scramble on in the best way they can, and either to delay their marriage for an inconvenient and most dangerous period, or else to enter upon their married life burdened with a load of debt, which will to a certainty cause them almost perpetual misery. Parents, again, sin against their children in the marriage festivities in by far too many instances. It seems to be an understood thing—why, Heaven only knows—that money shall be thrown away in the most reckless fashion on all such occasions. Poor little Pen, the young lawyer, who marries on an income of, at the outside, $1500 a year, finds that the family of his bride will not be satisfied unless as much fuss is made over the wedding as was made over that of the bride's cousin on her marriage with Hickenbotham the wealthy banker. Fashion prescribes that all this display shall be made, and there seems nothing for it but to obey her behests. One can not be surprised, however, to hear Pen growl pretty audibly over the waste and annoyance and expenditure of the wedding-day. He would have liked—and Mrs. Pen, being an intelligent and sensible little woman, would have liked also—that all this fuss should have been dispensed with. They could have gone to church in a hack, and, after a domestic meal with the family of the bride and a friend or two, they might have started on the indispensable honeymoon tour without display, and with perfect contentment.

It is no wonder if the often-repeated sight of such things keeps a good many men out of marriage altogether. Those, however, who have had the courage to brave all these annoyances, and who have won their wives, will generally be able to say that they do not regret the step they have taken.

KATYDID.

THROUGHOUT the night I hear the cry go up toward the stars,
And the answer, in denial, seems to beat against the bars
That lie across the gates of pearl, as surf beats on the shore,
And the night rings with a pleading I have never heard before.

For though full oft the Katydid its bold assertion made,
And still the prompt denial rang through the willow glade,
To-night they seem to hold in tune the harmonies of song,
And, half forgetful of the hours, I linger late and long.

But who has known what Katy did? and when was it all done?
How long will the contention last? When was it first begun?
When David watched his father's flocks upon the verdurous plain,
I wonder if he heard their cry with pleasure or with pain.

Or when adown the sacred Nile swept Cleopatra's barge,
I wonder if the Katy's cry rose from the Lotos marge.
Was Cheops, as his eye surveyed the mighty Pyramid,
Still puzzled with the query as to what poor Katy did?

Since Cleo's page no record shows—since Thalia's lips are sealed—
It scarce can matter to us now though it were all revealed.
Oh, Katy! whether true or false, there's one thing that I know,
It all should be forgotten, since it happened long ago.

MISS BECKET'S SOCIETY.

By SHIRLEY DARE.

"DON'T you find Swampsideam rather dull?" was the inquiry with which its people were wont to preface that intellectual feat they called conversation—as people better informed are apt, through mental laziness, to descant on the heat this season, when as much effort as it takes to propel their feather fans would set a sensible conversation going.

Well, it was dull. The good wives of the village staid at home and made raspberry jam and canned tomatoes in the summer, and baked minced-pie and roasted turkeys in the winter; washed bedquilts in the spring, and shelled roasting ears for dried corn in the fall. Mrs. Salmon Barnes, the merchant's wife, and Mrs. Hillyer, the lawyer's wife, and Mrs. Williston, the minister's wife, had company all the year round, and, from first to last, pretty much the whole town were asked to tea or dinner at one or another of these ladies' houses. But the others contented themselves with visiting among their own relations once a year, and having "company to tea," as some of them phrased it, about as often.

Miss Becket was of an energetic, likewise of a reflective turn of mind. As she swept her sitting-room and pondered on the contents of her city newspaper, the idea quietly suggested itself why Swampsideam need be behind other places in the question of social reform; why it wouldn't be possible to have a nice little gathering once a fortnight, with light biscuit and tea and marble-cake, to ventilate the few ideas that gathered under the unique chignons of the good ladies on divers questions now profoundly agitating larger and more fashionable circles? A Woman's Club in Swampsideam! The old maid peered to see if any one was listening as she spoke the words mentally. No, that name wouldn't do. It savored too much of the fast and fashionable; but as a modest Society it might find favor in all quarters.

So after dinner—that is to say, about half past one—Miss Becket tossed her front-door mat into the entry, for fear of rain, turned the cat out, and hung the door-key under the dish-pan outside the kitchen door, and took her way over the hill to sow, not without fear and trembling, the seed of her new project in the rather muddy brains of Swampsideam. She meant to go to the minister's first, or at least to the minister's wife's sister, Miss Euphemia Lacy, who was known to have great interest in the family councils. She was anxious to affix the signet of ministerial sanction to her project at its first appearance. But as she passed a high-roofed cottage by the road, and a cheerful wrinkled leathern face, spanned by gray hair and a cap border, a hearty voice entreated her to stop.

"How are you, Mrs. Kingsley?"

"Right smart, thank ye. I was out taking in those quilts the men have up garret; hung 'em out to air this mornin'." I says to Anna Maria I didn't quite like the smell of 'em, sleepin' under 'em week after week, and just thought I'd put 'em where the sun and air could give 'em a real sweetnin', and happened to see you passin'. Wonder if you was goin' straight by and never give a body a word? How do you do, Miss Becket?" And having reached this point the worthy creature wiped her mouth on her checked apron, a queer nervous action she had, and looked Miss Becket straight in the face in an admirable manner.

"I'm goin' up to Mr. Williston's on an errand," replied Miss Becket, as she flattered herself evasively answering rather Mrs. Kingsley's curiosity than her query. "The fact is—" "I may as well say something to her about it, she has so many girls, and there's no use keepin' any thing," she said to herself—"I don't see why, Mrs. Kingsley, we can't have something going on here as they do in other places. We don't do any thing but stay at home and patch old shirts and go to meetin' from week's end to week's end. Seems to me as if it isn't the most profitable way of spending our years—tell you it isn't."

"That's so," chimed in the sociable, sympathetic old soul, easily moved to see things as her friends viewed them. "Jes' so. I tell Anna Maria there don't seem no such thing as ever gettin' through in this sort o' life. It's begin cleanin' in the spring, an' preservin' an' picklin' all summer, and I can't more 'n catch my breath before fall comes, and the men are bringin' home hay and pumpkins and squashes for me to see to; and then's the killin' time; and I'm so drove all winter with sewin' and dyein' and knittin', I don't seem to have no time to live—only time to work. We take things easy to what some does, for we never let it get behindhand. S'ficient unto the day! But it keeps us springin' to keep it always before us. La! you don't know any thing about it, Miss Becket!"

"I guess I do," returned that maiden, rather resenting the imputation of having leisure and rest from care. "If you had every stick of wood to engage, and to see to its hauling and splitting, and every squash to take off your garden vines yourself, you'd find the difference. You don't know how well off you are, with six great boys and girls to wait on you. But I work hard and want a little recreation, and so do you, Mrs. Kingsley. So why can't we meet round once in a while and see each other, and have some talk about somethin' b'sides copperas dye and diptheria? Upon my word, the last time I was at Mrs. Barnes's, old Mrs. Culpepper and Mrs. Linton were there, and all they talked of was coloring their carpet-rags and the health of the district, with stories spiced in between all bearin' to the same point. Salome says up to Adrian they have a Society, and have sociables every week, and change books and patterns and hear the news, and it's real agreeable."

"Certain! I should think it would be. My girls now find it terrible dull here, and are always wantin' to go off to Highrack or Matt's Ferry, where they can have a time. Miss Becket, you've got time, an' you can speak a good word for yourself—why don't you stir round and get up somethin'? I'll go in for it. I tell Anna Maria I believe I'm as smart as any of my girls yet, only I hain't no chance to show it!" and the tea-tanned face broke into a smile that made it ten years younger. "But do I smell somethin' burnin'? or is't my nose? Those tomatoes is on the stove a-doin', and they're burnin', sure's I live! Good-by, Miss Becket! now do run in often, won't you?" And the prim cap-border flew into the house like an aged hen after her chickens, agile as any girl.

Miss Becket could have thanked the old lady for giving her, ex officio, these sort of credentials for her mission. Not alone in her own name could she offer the project; so when she found six ladies with their work seated in the ministerial parlor she was brave at heart, and being pressed to stay to tea with the others, ere long managed to slide her topic into conversation.

"I wish there was something going on in this dull old place," said Mrs. Steele, biting the end off her thread—she was stitching a shirt-collar for her husband. "I tell Steele I shall grow fat and lazy if there isn't something to stir me up once in a while, and then he will have to support me! I just get through my work after dinner and lie down and go to sleep. There's nothing else to do. Steele came home the other night and found me fast asleep in the bedroom. 'Well,' says he, 'Mary Jane, the next board I put a saw into will be a cradle for you. Can't you get sleep enough goin' to bed at half past nine?' And with that he went to ticklin' me to wake me up, and I took the pitcher of water and chased him all over the house, and Bob stood on his head and screamed, 'Give it to him, mother!' I never cut such a foolish caper in all my life," owned Mrs. Steele, the corners of her roguish mouth much belying her assertion.

"But what would we talk about if we were together?" asked Miss Delia Prune, a sharp young lady, who, being past her twenty-seventh year, was admitted to matronly society at times, as a compliment to her general shrewdness and discretion. "Conscience! there's mischief enough going on now from women's tongues, chattering gossip from morning till night. I heard the other day that Sue Hosford had gone crazy up at her father's place, and he had been seen chasing her round the house with a willow switch as long as he was himself to keep her quiet, when the truth was, she had pretended to be crazy one night, just for the fun of it, when some of the young folks were there."

"And what about the story of the whip?"

"Susie says she don't know what started that nonsense; unless it was that she and her father were chasing a horrid old cat off the place, that had got into the pantry and eaten half a chicken. Her father had a long switch, and they were both running, she laughing because she ran fastest, and shouting, 'No, you don't!' when he tried to catch up with her."

"My mother used to say, truth would stretch tied to a woman's apron string! But now, Mrs. Williston, don't you say it would be nice if we could have some sort of meeting to elevate the moral and social condition of the women of Swampsideam? Give us bread to eat, and we won't live on cheese parin's. Give us something to think of besides gossip, and we'll talk of something else."

"H'm!" sniffed a person who had, unobserved, been listening to the talk at the open door—Mr. Silas Williston, a bachelor brother of the minister's who lived with him and farmed the parsonage glebe, which eked out the salary the parish gave quite comfortably. The saying was that "Sile Williston was odd as Dick's hat-band that went half-way round and tucked under." And as it is impossible to amend this dialect, either for originality or expressiveness, it shall stand till Silas illustrates it further.

"Silas! How are you?" said the lady nearest the door.

"I'm well enough to do as much ill as my neighbors. What's this you're talkin' about? Delia, I wish I had a water-power as lively as your tongue."

"Then you'd have to sell it out very sudden, Uncle Silas, or it would be too much for you to take care of! I wish somebody would give me a brood of chickens as deliberate and slow as you are. I wouldn't have such a time catching 'em when I want one."

"Pity some other bipeds weren't as slow as I am, too, and you mightn't find 'em hard to catch as you seem to," responded Silas, provoked to a closer thrust than usual by the damsel's pertness. "Miss Becket, what mischief are you puttin' in these women's heads?"

"Want to have a social meeting once in a while, that we can see each other, and talk about somethin' improving, Mr. Silas. That's what you won't object to, I hope?"

"Improvin'? Well!" There was a world of unspoken comment in the old man's word.

"Now, what does that mean, Mr. Silas? Don't you think we're worth improving, or don't need it?" asked Mrs. Steele.

"Need it? As cabbage plants want water! But the improving you want is the very sort you won't strive to gain. Women don't want somethin' to make them vainer, and puff them up with pride of wisdom as they are with pride of their virtue and quickness now. They don't want power and place, to use the refuse of men's slang, and imitate their vices at a safe distance, as some of 'em seem fond of doing nowadays; but they want setting down a good deal. They want to learn to keep secrets—their own as well as any body's else, and not to measure their own faults with a half-pint cup and their neighbors' with a three-quart basin. They want to learn enough generosity to stand having another woman praised and preferred before themselves without wanting to snub her for it. They want to learn respect for themselves and their husbands, and some knowledge of justice and obedience."

By this time feminine instincts, which are opposed to hearing any one speak longer than they do, made revolt. "Uncle Silas!" "What a husband you'd make!" "The women would be a sight too good for the men then!" and such comments were lavished upon him.

"It's easy to see, Silas," spoke one of them, with country delicacy, "that some girl has given you cause to dread women."

"H'm!" said that philosopher. "She kindly refused me. It might have been as you say if she had accepted me. Ask your own husbands, and they'll tell you the truth in a joke."

"My husband would tell you that it's the other way at our house," said Mrs. Joy, a pretty blonde, with large, soft blue eyes. "If any man is lord and master, he is. There isn't a thing in this world I wouldn't give up for him, and he won't give up cigars for me, not to save my happiness."

"Does he know you dislike them?" asked Delia Prune, with a mixed expression on her quiet, shrewd face.

"Yes, indeed. I've told him so a hundred times, in every way I could think of. I'm sure it makes me unhappy weeks at a time, and he knows it, too. Men are such selfish beings."

"So there's one thing you can't give up to your dear husband," grimly observed Silas.

"Miss Becket," said Mrs. Williston. "Don't you think Franc Ferris would assist materially in proposing some scheme such as you suggested? If there's a girl in this town with practical ability it's Franc."

"And she knows it, too," said Mrs. Hill.

"Any one with such superior judgment, and opportunities for improving it, can be excused, we are sure, for showing that she knows what every one must admit," from the blonde, suavely.

Now the unconscious effect of this speech was to make every woman in the room feel set against Franc Ferris. This delicate Mrs. Joy intuitively felt. There are women born dissimulators, who never approach any thing in a straight line, and never, unless by a shock of electricity, are startled into the truth to themselves or others.

"Wouldn't it be a good thing to put her forward," suggested Mrs. Joy, feeling the impression she had made. "Dear girl! any such little attention goes for so much with her. And those who are out of the way of receiving such things value them more than you or I would."

"Yes, by all means," said candid Mrs. Williston. "I think that Miss Ferris needs neither your praise nor mine. Her fitness to lead is evident—born in her."

Vinegar on nitre was this provoking speech, spoken so plainly no one could misunderstand—so quietly no one could attack its meaning.

So it was agreed that Swampsideam should have a Woman's Society—the word Club being suppressed as alarming to the conservative part of society, and the title Association being summarily voted down by the younger members.

"Association!" said Franc Ferris, with spirit. "One would think we were all hairless and cappy by that three-legged word. Sounds like a board of cemetery directors. A thing can't be an association while I'm in it." Franc had all the vim and disregard which belong to the "girl of the period," with many underlying fine qualities.

"Now if Miss Ferris has the direction here, I don't see but the rest of us may as well take seats," said Mrs. Barnes, who had come to the meeting in her currant-colored velours, while most of the ladies wore sea-side poplins.

Franc was tinder to this spark. "I think I have just as much a right to speak and to rule here as any other member," she said, dauntlessly; "and I'd like to see the one who will deprive me of it," holding her head very straight.

"I wish I was strong-minded and could assert myself," sighed Angela Joy. "It looks so grand to see a young lady younger than any of us stand up in self-defense—put herself so forward, so to speak. I so admire it."

Perhaps Miss Ferris felt better after this balm of Gilead.

"Suppose we put it to vote?" said Mrs. Hill.

"An excellent idea." This rapturously from the Joy. "Thank you, Mrs. Hill; just the suggestion to help us out of our trouble. Only let little me suggest—though I hardly dare speak"—veiling her eyes modestly through their long lashes in a way that was Madonna-like and entreating—"before so many ladies of more experience and talent than myself. Only it seems to me so formal to put a question to vote, so stiff and masculine. Why can't we ladies just discuss matters in a friendly way, and find out what we think without formality?"

"There might be some trouble getting at the result," said Mrs. Williston, and she took care not to say it dryly, though she wanted to. "We will only use voting as a convenience."

"I understood," said Mrs. Hill, who was an ardent politician, "that one object of this society was to vindicate the rights of woman, the down-trodden and oppressed. One of her first natural rights is understood by the most enlightened half of Christendom to-day to be the ballot, and are we to see one of our own sex deny this privilege? We must use it as a sacred responsibility; and"—the speaker paused for a brilliant peroration—"there's nothing like getting used to it."

"I withdraw my view of the case."—Mrs. Joy.
"I sejest."—Mrs. Kingsley.
"Wouldn't the Cestus be appro?"—Miss Willard.

Trio performed at this moment, with pizzicato accompaniment, under the breath, through the room.

"I see," said Mrs. Williston, smiling, "that for convenience sake we shall be compelled to call parliamentary laws to our aid, and decide that only one lady shall speak at once, and no one more than three minutes. Miss Willard made a proposition, I think?"

"Oh, nothing," said the schoolmistress, flushing and blushing. "I was going to suggest the Cestus as a pretty name for the society, expressive of the mutual union of all the joys and graces we hope to find in this circle, and the sweet fellowship of the members one with another." Miss Willard subsided very meek and agitated.

"I suppose Mrs. Hill is one of the joys, and Mrs. Kingsley one of the graces," said Franc Ferris to herself.

"Mrs. Joy, did you invite Squire Stearns's daughter to jine us?" asked Mrs. Kingsley. "She is a very well informed girl, and writes a good deal, and I should particular like my daughters to meet her here."

"I did," said the fair lady. "But the answer given, as I understood it, was that she declined joining unless one of the principal offices was assigned her; that she had always been used to lead in any thing of the kind, and could not consent to take a lower place—she should feel no interest in it."

"Why, Anna Maria was talking with her," said old Mrs. Kingsley, with frank surprise, "and Miss Stearns spoke very different from that. She did say she had seen a good deal of these Societies, and headed one or two, and had sort o' lost her interest in them, 'count o' the way they were conducted; and she said, laughin', that she didn't know how it would seem to be a member—she should want to be President, at least—Cæsar or nothin'; but I took that all for a joke, and so did Anna Maria."

"I don't think," said Mrs. Barnes, "that Sabrina Stearns would ever say such a thing as reported. If she wanted the best place, and said so, she was a fool, and every body knows Sabrina ain't of that year's brood."

"I may have misunderstood the dear girl's meaning," said Mrs. Joy, unabashed, with great sweetness. "I'm so apt to be mistaken in small things—I never trust my own judgment; but it seemed so natural that she who has always been used to lead should dislike a lower place, and, with her rare independence of spirit, be frank enough to say so. I admired her for it."

"What shall we say the object of this society is to be?" was the next question in debate.

"The Amelioration of Women," was a succinct reply. When Silas Williston heard that he lifted up both hands. "That's too much for one society," was his comment.

"To have a good time," was Franc Ferris's low-voiced answer.

"To vindicate the rights of women," suggested Mrs. Hill.

"Very good," said Mrs. Williston. "Only don't let us have too much of the wrongs of men along with it."

"I thought it was to give us a chance to see each other and have a little sensible talk on useful things," said Mrs. Steele.

"That's about it," said the chairwoman pro tem.; "only we'll fix the idea up with words a little."

And Miss Willard was assigned that duty.

"What topics shall we discuss?" asked the chairwoman. Mrs. Hill was prompt to assert that she should like to hear the question either of the equal rights of women to the ballot, or the moral and mental supremacy of women over the other sex, enlarged upon. With her various domestic duties as a wife and mother she had found time to prepare essays on each of these subjects which she would like to lay before the society. Woman, as a rule, was ignorant of her station and her privileges, and should be enlightened.

"Well," said Mrs. Steele, brightly, "I always thought I knew what my privileges were, and had about all I wanted. Steele thinks I do, any how, when I lie abed of a morning and have him put the tea-kettle on and the potatoes in the oven. If I've a right to let him cook the steak and make coffee I'd like to know it," with a roguish eye. Several members of the society frowned at this levity. Mrs. Steele was only a mechanic's wife.

Mrs. Barnes, instructed beforehand by Mrs. Williston, suggested that they should discuss the advantage of having women made familiar with business forms. Several lips looked scorn at this dry topic, and Mrs. Hill found breath to propose that they should, as the meeting objected to political discussion, take up the subject of the Social Evil.

"And send for a few copies of the Police Gazette," said Franc Ferris, sotto voce.

"I think we can let that subject wait a while," said the sagacious chairwoman. "Will some one suggest a topic more adapted to popular discussion?"

Miss Willard presented "The Contrast between the Condition of Women in the Nineteenth Century and the Middle Ages." It may be mentioned that this was the title of an essay read six years before with much applause during the commencement exercises at the county academy by Miss Willard at her graduation, and the copy still reposed, tied in faded blue ribbon, in that damsel's escritoire.

"There's one comfort," said Mrs. Williston to herself, "whatever subject is proposed they won't stick to it." So the "Contrast," etc., was allowed to be chosen, and the minutes of the meeting read before closing, after a most primitive fashion of parliamentary proceeding:

"This Society shall be called the Cestus of Swamp-sidam."

"Its object is to afford an opportunity for its members to enjoy unrestricted social intercourse, commune with one another, and participate in seeking for information on varied and important topics. Also, to vindicate the privileges and duties of women."

"The topic for the next meeting will be the Contrast between the Condition of Women in the Nineteenth Century and the Middle Ages."

"The next meeting will be held at the house of Mrs. Salmon Barnes."

"Mrs. SETH WILLISTON, President.
"Miss FRANCES FERRIS, Vice-President.
"Miss GERTRUDE WILLARD, Secretary.
"Mrs. SALMON BARNES, Treasurer."

BY-LAWS.

"Each member must pay 50 cts. admission." ("Children half price?" whispered Mrs. Steele.)

"The Society is to meet at all the houses of its members." ("At once?")

"The meetings will be opened with prayer."

"For the privilege of being absent each member shall pay ten cents."

"Politics are not an object of this institution."

"Most of the members are in favor of suffrage."

"The meetings will be closed with singing; also, with supper at the house of the member with which it meets."

"No member is to have a luxurious supper. The course prescribed is one kind of cold meat, pickles, sauce, tea and coffee, bread or biscuit and butter, and one kind of cake. Any member having more than these articles will be liable to a fine."

This rule had been the subject of a long discussion, Mrs. Steele affirming she didn't want a great fuss cooking supper for the convention, as she styled the Society, and Mrs. Barnes saying she didn't consider the meetings would come to any thing without they had a nice cup of tea afterward. It wouldn't seem like business at all, in her estimation. So the moderate and beneficent rule above was adopted. The by-laws continued:

"No member shall speak more than three minutes at once, unless by permission."

"Law! I couldn't begin to say nothin' in three minutes," said Mrs. Obed, the flushed, cushiony wife of one of the deacons.

"No member shall speak ill of another."

"That breaks up the society," was Silas Williston's comment when he heard of the rule.

"Perfect courtesy and good understanding is to be observed in this society."

"Shall we let the gentlemen come to tea?" asked Mrs. Steele.

"No!" This was promptly vetoed by Mrs. Hill and others following her lead. "Men wouldn't let us into their Masonic lodges, nor billiard clubs, and they shouldn't come to our meetings, nor have a bite of supper."

"H'm!" said Silas on hearing this. "Jennie, I want you to press my cloth coat for me. I haven't worn it for three years. I expect to be asked to tea in about three weeks with your Cestus, and I'm goin'."

"Shan't I just let my husband run these rules over?" said Mrs. Williston, with great moderation. "Men put these things into rather better shape. We are not well up in the usual forms as yet."

This was agreed to, and the meeting put on its sun-bonnet and went home.

Miss Becket breathed serenely. "Under her efforts a brighter day had rolled upon Swamp-sidam," the old maid wrote to her married sister Selina, with quaint mixture of expression. "She felt to be thankful, and hoped some good would be done." After which she turned her currants in the sun to dry, and went to picking her gooseberries.

The new organization might be set down in its records as the "Cestus;" but its name in all the households of Swamp-sidam was "Miss Becket's Society."

Perhaps we shall see some day how it conducted itself.

TOADIES.

I HAVE often wondered what could be the origin of the term toad-eater, from which we get the now more commonly used toady, and its derived verb toadying. A toad-eater means a flatterer, I believe; but at first I imagine it meant one who put up with the ill-humor, gruffness, and disobliging speeches of another for an interested object. For this species of servility we have in French the expression, avaloir les couleurs de quelqu'un—swallowing a person's snakes—which is curiously on a parallel with the English phrase, substituting one reptile for another. I venture to conjecture that both figures of rhetoric have a common origin in the fairy tale about the amiable girl who was kind to an old woman whom she met in her walks, and received in reward the gift of dropping pearls as she spoke; while her churlish sister, for her contumelious treatment of the same old party, was judiciously visited with the misfortune of emitting toads and snakes mixed up with her conversation. So, ill-conditioned people who grumble and scold may be said to drop toads and snakes, and those who endure their tempers and thrive on it are toad-eaters and snake-swallowers.

LINCOLN.

[Extract from Vol. II. of Dr. DRAPE'S History of the American Civil War, published by HARPER & BROTHERS.]

WITH infinite labor and anxiety, Lincoln had at length organized his administration, and settled its domestic and foreign policy.

One of his Illinois neighbors, who had long known him, says, "This tall, gaunt, melancholy man floated into our country in 1831 in a frail canoe down the North Fork of the Sangamon River, friendless, penniless, powerless, alone—begging for work in this city—ragged, and struggling for the common necessities of life. This man, this peculiar man, left us in 1861 the President of the United States, backed by friends, and power, and fame." Notwithstanding his rustic manners and want of social polish, there was something in his demeanor which made even those who were greatly his superiors in these respects, but who looked only to the good of the country, feel that its administration was safe in his hands. Such as were hoping for the overthrow of the government regarded him with hatred and disgust. When Mr. Seward desired to present to him Mr. Mason, who subsequently became one of the agents of the Confederacy in Europe, that senator, with a scowl of horror and scorn, shook his head and declined.

But Lincoln soon found that there was a sustaining power behind him on which he could securely rely—the people—the plain people, as he affectionately called them. They cared nothing about his fashionable short-comings; they looked only to the greatness of his purposes. If he chose to speak in parables, they knew that it was not the first time in the world that that had been done, and that parables have been delivered which will instruct the human race to the end of time. When it was said in foreign countries Davis is creating a nation and making history in Richmond, and Lincoln is telling stories in Washington, they were content to await the event. They knew that for nations splendid talents are not always the safest guides. While Davis was driving his rivals from his presence, and throwing into obscurity or exile the ablest men of the South—those who could have made the rebellion successful, had that been possible—Lincoln was selecting his advisers from his political opponents. Davis was exasperating the passions of his people, and teaching them revenge; the weakness of Lincoln was benevolence. And the issue was such as might have been expected. The enthusiastic devotion which had welcomed Davis to power was succeeded by distrust, dissatisfaction, hatred. The wreck of the Confederacy, the ruin of the people, were at last imputed to him. On the other hand, the misgivings which attended Lincoln's accession were replaced by confidence; he ended by becoming politically omnipotent.

Clad in black, the ungainly-looking President might be seen, after the hour had come for visitors to be excluded, pacing to and fro past the windows of his apartment, his hands behind him, his head bent forward upon his breast, lost in profound meditation, a picture of sorrow, care, and anxiety. The artist Carpenter, who enjoyed frequent opportunities of thus observing him in his moments of retirement, says, "His was the saddest face in repose that I ever knew. His eyes, of a bluish gray tint, always in deep shadow from the upper lids, which were unusually heavy, gave him an expression remarkably pensive and tender, often inexpressibly sad. A peculiar dreaminess sometimes stole over his face."

As is not unfrequently observed of Western men, there were mysterious traits of superstition in his character. A friend once inquiring the cause of a deep depression under which he seemed to be suffering, "I have seen this evening again," he replied, "what I once saw before, on the evening of my nomination at Chicago. As I stood before a mirror, there were two images of myself—a bright one in front, and one that was very pallid standing behind. It completely unnerved me. The bright one, I know, is my past, the pale one my coming life." And feeling that there is no armor against Destiny, he added, "I do not think I shall live to see the end of my term. I try to shake off the vision, but it still keeps haunting me."

He began to receive threatening letters soon after his nomination. He kept them by themselves, labeled, "Letters on Assassination." After his death, one was found among them connected with the plot which had succeeded.

"I can not help being in this way," he said; "my father was so before me. He dreamed that he rode through an unfrequented path to a strange house, the surroundings and furnishing of which were vividly impressed on his mind. At the fire-side there was sitting a woman whose features he distinctly saw. She was engaged in paring an apple. That woman was to be his wife. Though a very strong-minded man, he could not shake off the vision. It haunted him incessantly, until it compelled him to go down the unfrequented way. He quietly opened the door of what he recognized to be the house, and saw at a glance that it was where he had been in his dream. There was a woman at the fire-side engaged in paring an apple. And the rest of his dream came to pass."

"There will be bad news to-night," he said on another occasion. "Why, how do you know that, Mr. President?" "I dropped asleep, and saw in a dream what has often before been the precursor to me of disaster. I saw a ship sailing very fast." And that night bad news came!

Perhaps, in the opinion of the supercilious critic, these idle stories are unworthy of the page of history. The materialist philosopher may say, "Had Lincoln taken the trouble to hold up a candle before his mirror, he might have seen a dozen pale images of it!" That is very true. But does not history record that some of the greatest soldiers, statesmen, lawgivers—men who have left ineffaceable marks on the annals of the human race—have been influenced by like delusions? There was connected with the most important of all proclamations ever issued by an American President—the proclamation of slave emancipation—an incident of the kind: a vow that in a certain contingency it should be put forth. Lincoln implicitly believed that it is the Supreme Ruler who determines our fate. Trifles though these may be, it is not for the historian to hide them from his reader, who perhaps may add the reflection that it is better to have the childlike, innocent dreams of Lincoln, than the guilty and appalling midnight visions of the conscience-stricken Davis.

Under a weight of responsibility and care pressing upon him unceasingly by day and by night, Lincoln instinctively felt the necessity of momentary relief. An anecdote well told, an amusing incident, would rescue him from deep depression. A strip of steel must be pulled back before it can spring forward. And so it was with Lincoln's mind—it must be relaxed before it could display its force. Perhaps this was never more strikingly seen than on the occasion of his submitting the Proclamation of Emancipation to his cabinet—declared by himself to be the great and central act of his administration. He introduced it by reading some of the grotesque sayings of Artemus Ward.

JAPANESE BOOKS.

JAPANESE books are printed from wooden blocks, metal type being unknown, on thin paper, one side of the sheet only being used. The leaf is doubled and the edges uncut; and the letters are arranged in vertical columns, beginning, like Hebrew, at the right-hand side of the page, and, as we should call it, at the end of the book. The covers are generally very plain, made of dark-colored paper, somewhat thicker than the interior sheets; and the gilding which is put on the outside on the edges of our books, usually adorns the inside of the cover, and what may be termed the fly-leaves, in irregular patches. The origin of the art of printing is lost in the obscurity of distant ages: it has been handed down from one generation to another without any trustworthy record of its discoverer being preserved.

Cheap common books are often badly printed, the characters being indistinct and blurred, a defect frequently arising unless special care is taken when printing from wooden blocks. Mind your stops, an injunction so often enforced on American juveniles, can not be needed in Japan, where punctuation is but rarely used. A simple alphabet is also wanting, various systems being in use, according to the style of literature. For instance, ordinary works, romances, histories, etc., are written in characters of a comparatively easy nature, representing syllables. Songs and popular poems have these easy syllabic characters mingled with others of a more complex kind. Works of science, religious treatises, some dictionaries and prefaces are written in ideographic characters, i. e., characters representing ideas, not sounds, derived from the Chinese alphabet; and in many cases these are easily read and understood by educated Chinamen. In others only the roots of the words are given in ideographic signs, the Japanese inflections being written in the syllabic character and the Japanese arrangement of words followed, which renders such sentences almost unintelligible to one who has studied Chinese only. When the pure Chinese character or a modification of it is made use of, this has often a running commentary at the side in Japanese cursive writing, as an explanation of the text. There is also a system made use of only by the priests, called Bou-zi. Inscriptions on tombs and altars are engraved in these characters. Signatures and seal inscriptions are frequently written in a peculiar style of Chinese writing. All these diversities of method create great difficulty and confusion, and render the printed literature very puzzling to a learner, whether native or foreign.

The Japanese dictionaries contain more than 38,000 characters, each of which has a name derived from the corrupted pronunciation of the original Chinese; this is of one syllable, in accordance with the spirit of the Chinese language, and to it is added several words of Japanese origin, which translate it into the vernacular.

Pictures cut in wood have been also used to illustrate the text for many centuries; and printing in colors, an art of late development in Europe, has been practiced in Japan during many ages. Specimens of printing in colors have been brought to England. The colors are brilliant without being gaudy, the drawing is somewhat rude and conventional, and the perspective imperfect; but there is a certain life and animation in the figures and scenes which redeems them from being mere caricatures.

Periodicals are issued at certain intervals, giving tales and narratives in parts. As yet this system has not been extended to works of instruction or to newspapers. The power of the press is entirely undeveloped, public opinion being formed only by the interchange of ideas at the baths and other places frequented by the common people. Books and pictures are inexpensive, and booksellers' shops numerous: they appear to have plenty of customers.

Of late the habits and manners of foreigners have afforded a fertile topic for the native artist and author. Pictures of ladies in bright-colored dresses, with largely-developed crinolines, carrying parasols, may be seen in the shop windows; and naval captains, in bright blue uniforms and gilt buttons, are favorite subjects for representation. Sewing-machines and pianos, christening, wedding, and dinner-parties, children playing at tip-cat and hoop, and every thing European at all strange or new, are seized upon and depicted with sufficient accuracy to render them recognizable.

"LOVE UNDER DIFFICULTIES."

"THE course of true love never did run smooth" is an observation of a great authority which has probably been heard before by some of our readers. Of the justness of the observation we have a confirmation from the experience of the happy or unhappy pair of lovers, the Spanish Romeo and Juliet, figuring in the capably-painted picture by an able Flemish artist—M. J. Worms—an engraving of which we give. But, then, what are all such petty obstacles to true love? Has not Love ever made mockery of them, and is not the word "impossible" unknown to the vocabulary of lovers? Have not all the amatory poets told us that "stony limits can not hold love out;" that Love is not to be caged or imprisoned; that he can scale the very walls of heaven; that he reigns every where and under all circumstances Amor Triumphator; that he is one of the oldest as well as the youngest of the gods; that he is stronger than Fate, and will survive the rudest and last stroke of Old Chronos? But what need of quoting the poets or Lempière? Have we not before us an illustration from real life of the utter futility of attempting to keep lovers asunder? Here is space absolutely annihilated by means of a little love-prompted ingenuity and agility on the one side, and by watchfulness and "making a long arm" on the other. But, stay! A dreadful suspicion flashes upon us. Is the difficulty in the way of that so-much-coveted kiss entirely vanquished? Can that dreadful four-inch gulf be scaled? The arm of Dulcinea can stretch no lower; the Don or Mayo—whatever he may be—can raise himself, apparently, not a hair's-breadth more; the convenient though undignified accomplice (he of the rueful visage below) can evidently hoist his neither lean nor light-weighted friend not a fraction higher. What is, then, to be done? Is this, after all, to prove only a prosaic illustration of the old proverb, "There's many a slip between the cup (of bliss) and lip?" By "cup of bliss," be it noted, we, of course, mean the fair one's hand—a metaphor quite sufficiently appropriate in the language of love; besides, does not "bliss" suggest "kiss" as well as rhyme one with the other? Alas! we know we are writing of no poetical romance, but what seems to be hard, melancholy fact. Our poor caballero will be defrauded of the treat he so richly deserves. Fie! ye lying poets amatory! Love takes a long time to reduce a man's weight by even one stone, and he never yet raised a friend's stature by one inch, however unfortunately and inopportunistly dwarfish that friend was ungallant enough to be. Fie! too, ye equally unvarnished painters and sculptors! Love is certainly not always provided with wings; at all events, they are of no service to this poor fellow or to any body but himself; so forthwith, when making your portraits of him, clip them or cut them off altogether.

TEARS.

Would some kind angel give me tears—
It seems a little thing,
A child's first need—I would not ask
The gems that crown a king.

The glad peace-bringers after storm
Are drops the sun smiles through;
The healer of the parching rose
Is but a head of dew.

Yet what am I, an atom sole
In Heaven's creative plan,
That I should ask the tenderest gift
God ever gave to man?

UNMASKED.

ALMOST as soon as Mabel Ross had come into the world with her silver spoon in her mouth it was known that sooner or later she was to marry Post Harvard, who had already been eating with his silver spoon eleven months lacking a day. Sooner or later, sooner probably, for the Harvards always married young, and so did the Rosses when they married at all.

Post Harvard's father was a man who believed heartily in foreordination and election; himself being invariably foreordained and elected. He was a man who always mapped out his journeyings from the hill-top of each new day and year, and then kept right on in the mapped-out course whatever obstacles came in the way. Every body's convenience and every body's wishes were inexorably bent to the fulfillment of these pre-arrangements, and even the elements of the air became their ministers.

So after once deciding that the little Post should in due season become the husband of Mr. Ross's baby, the marriage was as fixed as the north star, although the children did not meet after the day when Mabel cut her first tooth until she had cut the last—excepting the wisdom-teeth.

"Post, my son," said the elder Harvard, "you are to go to Chicago to-morrow."

"Yes, Sir," replied Post.

"There is a bill of Fletcher's to be collected, and that account of Ducharme's to be looked after. He charges too much for the last rose-pink, and you must make him abate something on it. Then there is a bill for ivory-black that we never have ordered at all, and there are two or three things more to be straightened. Bodkins will explain them to you. After you have got full instructions from him come back to me."

"Yes, Sir," replied Post again, immediately going to the outer office where the book-keeper and confidential clerk, Bodkins, sat behind his books, smelling of ink and paper, and looking, in his leather-colored suit with his lined and dotted face, like an old forgotten ledger that should have been balanced and locked up long ago.

"Well, Bodkins, how about those Chicago accounts I am to look after?" said Post, leaning upon the office railing and plucking at the growth of corn-silk upon his chin.

Bodkins put his pen behind his ear, and, straightway looking as mathematical as the Rule of Three, sprung open at once like a much-used book.

So and so. So and so. So and so. Dear me! how dull and dreary to every body but the parties concerned! But they were so much concerned that it was a full hour before Post went back to the luxurious inner office where Papa Harvard sat with his silver ice-pitcher, his gold-headed cane, his revolving arm-chair, and his Decrees.

"You have your directions all right from Bodkins, have you, Post?"

"Yes, Sir."

"Well. And after settling satisfactorily with those parties you are to call upon Miss Mabel Ross. I wrote Mr. Ross by the morning mail, and you will be expected. I saw the young lady last winter, and found her very modest and pleasing. She is suitable for you in family, in property, and in person; and in this casket you will find a costly diamond ring which you may present her in token of your engagement."

"Yes, Sir," replied Post; and went off to buy his ticket for the sleeping-car to Chicago.

But Post, although accustomed to this patriarchal government, had, under the rose, tastes and habits of his own; and acting on the principle that obedience consists in doing nothing which has been forbidden, went in pursuit of many an undecreed pleasure, asking no questions and telling no lies. Of this class was a masquerade on the evening of the day he arrived at Chicago.

"Never in my life have I heard father say a word against my masquerading," said Post to his conscience, when a young man with whom he had some slight business acquaintance asked him to join the party.

No! And neither had Post ever heard his father say a word against his having leprosy; or his going to look up Dr. Livingstone. To tell the truth, Post's conscience was made of alternate layers of oak and India rubber, and the rubber had it this time.

So he turned into a Christopher Columbus, and then went around all the evening discovering things.

Presently he came appropriately upon "America"—a graceful figure, crowned with stars and dressed in sky-colored crepe, covered with sprays of Southern palms and Northern cedars, and shining with gold and silver and bright feathers. Happily, for once, history did not repeat herself, and there was no Vespucci to follow and supplant him; so all the evening long he enjoyed the glory of his beautiful discovery, lingering about her as though she were what he had spent his life in looking for. And this America was by no means so coy and uncertain as the receding America that baffled the great Discoverer, and broke his heart centuries ago. In fact she was a flirt, and a bold one; and young Post Harvard flirted with her outrageously. They danced and ate and drank and talked together; till at last, sitting apart in a curtained alcove, Post proposed to open their masks.

At the suggestion America, with a certain hoydenish grace, unclasped hers, and showed for an instant a pretty girlish face, then sprung the mask in place again.

"Now I must see if your eyes are really the color of my dress," she cried, gayly, "and if your mouth is just as much like a red rose as I thought."

So Post, secure in distance from home and acquaintance, dropped the storm-beaten face and pointed beard of Christopher, and looked out with his own flossy mustache and smooth forehead. Then they flirted again, played at making love as children play at keeping house.

When the evening was at an end America made no objection to being kissed good-by by the red-rose lips; and so they parted forever, going out each their way into the whirling, hungry city that waited quickly to divide and swallow them.

"Well, I've had fun any way, and as nobody knows me, and I know nobody, where is the hurt?" said Post, as he tumbled into bed and tried to pretend he did not feel somewhat humiliated at having encouraged a young girl to behave with such indecorum toward a stranger. Any how his humiliation, if he felt any, was not deep enough to keep him awake or to distract his mind, as he went the next day about the duties of the business for which he came in part.

Neither did they disturb him with any sense of unworthiness as he went at evening with the costly diamond in his pocket to see Miss Mabel Ross.

Her home was a high stone-house looking out upon the lake; and as he walked through the deep yard Post thought, complacently, what a nice estate it was to belong to one's father-in-law!

Mr. Ross was at home, and so was Miss Mabel. Mr. Ross was expecting him, and received him cordially in a charming little room full of flowers and work-baskets and books and pictures.

"So home-like and sweet!" thought Post. "Just the way I want my rooms to look."

Then there was a flutter and a footfall as in floated an embroidered white dress with mermaid-green ribbons and a few moss-rosebuds.

Post looked up to see the sweet, shy face that should peep out from among the ribbons and roses, but saw instead, with a shudder of consternation, the black eyes and bright cheeks of the mask, "America."

The bright cheeks brightened, the black eyes dropped, the embroidered muslin turned to sackcloth, and the roses to ashes, as the young lady came forward and said the passing civilities of the day.

"What ails the girl? I never saw her so stiff and still in my life. Makes her bashful to see a handsome young man? I'll go out and leave them alone; young folks always get on better alone," mused Mr. Ross.

So he went out, but the young folks did not get on any better alone. He did not take the awkwardness and constraint with him, and when Post went home to his father he carried in its casket the diamond ring.

Mr. Harvard would have been less surprised to see the stars begin to fall instead of dew; but he found the time that comes one day to all had come to him, when instead of the fathers shall be the children; for it seemed that with his father's nose Post had inherited his father's firmness.

"She is well enough to play with for an evening, but I should not like to know my wife had ever flirted that way with any one," said he, looking more like Papa Harvard in this sudden self-assertion, than Papa Harvard did like himself.

So Mabel Ross is yet unmarried, and as she is now no longer young, according to the habit of the Rosses, she will never marry; but remain all her life a pointed illustration of the policy of behaving just as well when under a bushel as when upon a candlestick;

"For the gods see every where."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A DISTRESSING account comes from London of the murder of a baby eight months old. The child was absolutely starved to death by the woman in whose charge it had been placed by the mother. The day before it died the babe was left alone, without food, locked up in the bedroom from ten or eleven in the morning till between six and seven at night. A witness stated that the child was seldom fed, and then with unsuitable food.

This instance has its parallel in this country. Only a short time ago a wretch living in Wyandotte, Kansas, took his little step-son, two years old, out into the suburbs of the town, and deliberately killed him. It appeared at the inquest that he had been trying for some time to kill the child by almost every possible cruelty. The indignation of the citizens of Wyandotte could scarcely be restrained from breaking out into open violence.

According to the latest accounts from the Cape of Good Hope, great excitement prevails in regard to the gold discoveries beyond the Trans-Vaal Republic. Some of the stories are of the wildest description; but a sober-minded merchant declares the reports to be fully corroborated, and writes thus: "In fact, it is thought the ancient Ophir has been struck. What do you think of gold in heavy veins imbedded in white quartz—auriferous quartz—in thirty different localities, and immense surface strata, rich in gold, the one 22 miles broad and the other 60 miles long, with parallel veins, and width of from two to three miles?" Such wonderful expectations as have been excited almost invariably end in disappointment.

A French journal states that an adventurous English lady, Miss Rosa Glarkins, has successfully accomplished the ascent of the Grand Cervin (Valais). This daring "Miss" is said to have strangled with her own hands, a couple of years ago, a wolf "dans la forêt de Burchase (Angleterre)," and is now about to travel in Central Africa for the purpose of shooting panthers!

In the "Memoirs and Letters of Jenny C. White Del Bal" there is a little passage in one of her familiar home letters which contains a great lesson. She is speaking of her everyday life and surroundings: "The servants here are what they call 'mucha calma,' or they are regular Topsyies flying around in the wildest manner imaginable. Mine are all of the 'mucha calma' order, which I think far preferable, although it is a trial to one's patience sometimes. I have made up my mind never to expect any thing done quickly by them, and in this way live easily." There are many necessary evils in life—inconveniences which can not be remedied, but must be borne. Could we "make up" our minds to expect them, and endure them patiently, fretting would soon be out of fashion, and we might all "live easily."

The latest scientific exploit is said to be by a Prussian chemist, who has invented (if it is not all a joke!) a new method of warfare on the battle-field; it is a powder that makes a whole regiment sneeze for just half an hour. The sneezing powder is to be put in a packet with a handful of gunpowder, the whole to be shot off when at a calculated distance; the packet will explode, and its contents disappear. The result is very effective as well as affecting.

What would become of conversation if by some strange meteorological change, variations in weather should be abolished? As some poetical pen observes:

It is worthy of note when two friends meet together The first topic they start is the state of the weather— It is always the same, both with young and with old, 'Tis either too hot, or else 'tis too cold, 'Tis either too wet, or else 'tis too dry, The glass is too low, or else 'tis too high; But if all had their wishes once jumbled together, No mortal on earth could exist in such weather.

Would gentlemen like to know a novel method of obtaining a nice dinner? A jocosé husband took it into his head the other day that he would like a first-rate dinner. So after going to his office he sent his wife a note informing her that a gentleman of her acquaintance—an old and true friend—would dine with her that day. Of course the house was put in the nicest order, a sumptuous dinner prepared, and the lady herself arrayed in her best attire. On hearing steps at the door, she opened it with a smiling countenance, and saw—her husband only.

"Why, my dear," said she, in an anxious tone, "where is the gentleman of whom you spoke in your note?"

"Why," replied the husband, complacently, "here he is."

"You said a gentleman of my acquaintance—an old and true friend—would dine with us to-day."

"Well," said he, good-humoredly, "am I not a gentleman of your acquaintance, an old and true friend?"

"Oh!" she cried, "is there nobody but you?"

"No."

"Well, I declare this is too bad," said his wife, half angrily; but finally both joined in a hearty laugh, sat down cozily together, and for once had a good dinner without having company.

Glycerine, if freely applied to mosquito bites, is said to relieve the irritation and swelling at once.

The Red Sea is said to be the hottest place in the world. The atmosphere for about sixty miles in that sea is steamy and sticky. Every thing in the shape of iron or steel about a ship takes on a coat of rust. During the summer months no one travels on the Red Sea unless compelled by business or military orders to do so. In the winter and spring the passage is delightful. Yet navigation in that body of water is always attended with many dangers. The Red Sea is long and narrow, with sunken rocks and projecting reefs; and counter winds prevail, which produce dangerous currents. There are three light-houses in the sea, which must be kept by salamander-like men, since the thermometer runs up to 120 degrees in July, and approaches 90 in early spring.

The stereoscope is generally supposed to be a modern invention; but it has been found that the fundamental principle of this instrument was known to Euclid; that it was distinctly described by Galen 1500 years ago; and that Baptista Porta in 1599 gave a complete separate picture seen by each eye, and the combined picture placed between them. It has been shown that the stereoscope is a valuable aid in detecting the minute shades of difference between true and counterfeit bank-notes.

Education is steadily making its way among the masses in England, although it may be slowly. Twenty-five years ago, according to reports of the Registrar-General, 33.3 per cent. of the men who married in England, and 50 per cent. of the women, signed the marriage-register by making their mark instead of writing their names. In 1866, the number who signed by their mark was only 21.6 per cent. of the men, and 30 per cent. of the women.

The French have some very queer notions about the use of names for business purposes. For example, one establishment in Paris is known as the "Store of the Child Jesus;" and a competition concern, not to be outdone, has adopted the appropriate title, "Store of the Good Devil." We once remember to have seen a large transparency in front of a mountebank's tent illustrating the birth of our Saviour. A company in France manufacturing steel pens have adopted the very singular trade-marks which represent the crucifixion of Christ and the descent of the Holy Spirit. Each pen is being stamped with these devices.

HOW TO GET INTO A LONDON CLUB.

THAT blustering and ferocious rascal, "Fighting Fitzgerald," who was introduced to Louis XVI. as an Irishman of good descent, who had fought no less than eighteen duels, and always killed his man, once forced his way into Brookes's, and tried to cow the club. The impudent scoundrel, who it was afterward found wore steel cuirasses, and coats quilted with paper, had requested Admiral Keith Stewart, who dared not refuse, to put him up at Brookes's. The ballot was soon over, but not even one white ball was found in the box. The Admiral refused to carry the news to such a desperate madman, and tremulous Mr. Brookes was at last sent to inform Mr. Fitzgerald that unfortunately there had been one black ball in the box, and that there could not be a new election for another month.

Fitzgerald was delighted; he shook Mr. Brookes's damp hand: "I'm chose, I'm chose," he cried, "and I give ye joy; I shall be the best customer ye ever had; but as there has been a slight mistake of one ball, just step up and make my compliments to the gentlemen, and ask them to waive all ceremony and re-elect their humble servant while he is finishing his coffee."

The members were panic-struck; some horrible catastrophe was evidently impending. At last the Earl of March (afterward Duke of Queensbury) said, "—his Irish impudence, let's try two balls this time."

On Mr. Brookes informing the dangerous intruder of the result of this second balloting, Fitzgerald sent up and told them to try again, but bedad to make no more mistakes, as it was getting late.

A third time Mr. Brookes descended, at the request of General Fitzpatrick, and told the duelist that this time he was blackballed all over, and it was therefore hoped by the club that he would not persist in thrusting himself into society that begged to decline his company.

"I see it's a mistake altogether, Mr. Brookes," Fitzgerald said, "and there's nothing like daling with principals. I'll step up at once and put the thing to rights."

In vain Brookes, "the man who blushed to be repaid," protested against this subversion of all etiquette. Fitzgerald threatened to throw him over the balusters for daring to stop a "jontleman." He strode into the room and made a low bow, when the members rose indignantly.

"Your servant, jontlemen. I beg ye will be sated."

He first walked up to the fire, and addressed poor Admiral Stewart. "So, now dear Admiral, Mr. Brookes informs me that I have been elected three times?"

"You have been balloted for, Mr. Fitzgerald, three times, but I am sorry to say you have not been chosen."

"Well, then, did you blackball me?" flared out the duelist.

"My good Sir, how could you suppose such a thing?"

"Oh, I supposed no such thing, my dear fellow; I only want to know who it was who dropped in the black balls—by accident, of course."

Fitzgerald then went up to each individual, and put the same ordeal question seriatim:

"Did you blackball me, Sir?"

In every case the Admiral's courteous and jesuitical answer was returned. Every one was silent as Fitzgerald stood in the midst and addressed them as if they had been frightened children.

"You see, jontlemen, as none of ye blackballed me I must be chose, and it's Misher Brookes that has made the mistake. I was convinced of it from the beginning, and I'm only sorry so much time has been lost. Waiter, come here, you raschal, and bring me a bottle of Champagne till I drink long life to the club, and wish them joy of their unanimous election of a raal jontleman by father and mother" (here every one laughed), "and a jontleman that never missed his man." (Here every one grew more serious than before.)

There was but one remedy—to send the scoundrel to that quiet, cool place, Coventry; and so every one did. Admiral Stewart stole off as soon as he could. The rest sat down to their whist-tables, and made no reply to Fitzgerald's observations and nods and toasts, over his three bottles of wine. At last the ruffian rose, made a low bow, and took his leave.

"Jontlemen," he said, "I bid you all good-night, and I am very glad to find ye so sociable. I'll take care to come earlier next night, and we'll have a little more of it, please God."

The moment the vamping bully and assassin left, it was unanimously agreed that half-a-dozen strong-armed constables should be in ambush on the next evening, to lay the Irishman by the heels, and bear him off to the watch-house if he intruded. He never showed himself again; but he boasted every where in town that he had been unanimously chosen a member of Brookes's.

AN ARAB LOVE-SONG.

I HAD my love, when near you,
My pain for your sweet sake;
But now that you are absent,
My heart must speak or break!
God save you from such passion!
It never knows despair;
For whether kind or cruel,
You are the only fair!

You will not see me, sweetest!
Nor answer, when I call;
But I will follow, follow
Beyond the giant's wall!
Go, shut your door against me,
I will not doubt or fear;
God still leaves one door open—
The door of hope, my dear!

Could I have loved another,
That time is now no more:
I cover with my kisses
The threshold of your door!
Open the door of pity,
And hear my burning sigh,
For absent from you longer
Is sadder than to die!

Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh.

CHAPTER VII.

HOW I BECAME AN ORPHAN.

I WAS pacing the long corridor of the upper story in a despondent frame of mind, when the door of my lady's dressing-room opened, and Mrs. Grimshaw emerged, more than usually sour of visage.

"You are wanted by my lady," she said on seeing me. "I have been urging upon her that such an idle life as you are leading is not the way to fit a young man for earning his living, and she is so good as to acknowledge the wisdom of my remarks."

"You are very obliging with advice that has not been invited," I answered; "but since I doubt if you have ever wished me well, I should be grateful if you would abstain from all interference with my affairs."

I knew that whatever influence this woman brought to bear upon my fate would be of an adverse nature, and I could not patiently brook her calm tone of patronage and superiority. She gave me a malignant glance, muttered something about a beggar on horseback, and passed on, while I went to Lady Barbara's dressing-room, a spacious and cheerful apartment, hung with prints and chalk drawings, and furnished with japanned cabinets containing shells, dried flowers, Indian china, and many valuable curios of the monster tribe. It was the room my lady had occupied as a girl, and which she preferred to any other apartment at Hauteville. A large embroidered screen in tent stitch, representing the meeting of Joseph and his brethren, testified to Lady Barbara's girlish industry, and half a dozen dogs of the pug species sprawling on a rug before the sunniest of the windows, revealed the hobby of her childless matronhood.

She was writing as I entered, but closed her desk immediately, and looked up at me with an affectionate smile.

"Sit you down here, Robert," she said, pointing to a stool at her feet; and I seated myself there, and took the hand which she offered me. Thus seated, we seemed like mother and son.

"Robert," she began, presently, "I think you know that I love you."

"Yes, indeed, dear Madam; and your affection has made me very happy."

"Will you cease to believe in that affection if I should be obliged to make you unhappy?"

"I can not believe that you will ever act unkindly."

"Not willingly, Robert, God knows. But you remember what Shakespeare makes his Hamlet say: we must sometimes 'be cruel, only to be kind.' Dear boy, I think we have all been too happy here; you and I and Dora Hemsley. Do you remember what I told you about Dora when we first came?"

"I am not likely to forget it," I answered, gloomily.

"It was my manner of warning you, Robert. I can not thwart my husband's wishes with reference to his niece and ward; I can not, Robert, even to serve you. He was very generous when I asked leave to adopt you, poor orphan child; and it would ill repay his goodness if you became the instrument to bring about the disappointment of his favorite scheme. He has set his heart upon his son's marriage with Dora, and it must take place; or, at least, you and I must do nothing to prevent it."

"God forbid it should ever come to pass!" I cried.

"Why, Robert, have you any thing to say against Everard Lestranger?"

"Not much, except that I do not like him; and I can scarce tell you wherefore. Non amo te, Sabidi, nec possum dicere quare—"

"Heavens, how like that was said to your father! Ah, Robert, I doubt you inherit his headstrong, impetuous disposition."

I smiled, remembering how quiet and submissive had been my youth; and yet I was inclined to doubt whether under certain exceptional circumstances a fiery spirit, to which I was at present a stranger, might not reveal himself as my master. Surely if for every man there watches and prays a good angel, so each has his familiar demon, an invisible director stronger than himself, who leads him where he would not go, and urges him to deeds he would fain leave undone.

"Robert," said my benefactress suddenly, after a little pause, "I have watched you and Dora together, and I think it would be well for the peace, nay, indeed, for the honor of both, that you should part."

"I am ready, Madam," cried I, springing to my feet with a start. "I know that there is a gulf between that bright angel and me. Send me away this day, this minute. I am ready to go."

I dashed a tear from my eyes as I spoke. My lady watched me with a sad, perplexed face.

"Oh, Robert," she cried, "has it come to this?"

"Yes," I answered. "Your warning has been forgotten; I love her. I will not come between your step-son and his fortune. I love her; but I am not so base a viper as to sting the breast that has warmed and sheltered me. I will not bring trouble on you, dear lady. From these lips Dora Hemsley shall never hear that she is beloved. Oh, let me go; let me leave this dear place, where for the last few months I have tasted such dangerous, such fatal happiness!"

"Yes, Robert, you must go. It will be wisest and best that you should begin life at once; and your future will be my care, dear boy, do not doubt that. And so my gentle Dora has won your heart? 'Tis but a boy's love, a brief fever, more easily cured than you can believe while the disease rages. But do you know, Robert, that I have heard of another passion of yours?"

"How, Madam?"

"That pretty brown-eyed girl at the warren-er's lodge, Margery Hawker—what of her, Robert?"

"She is my foster-sister, and as dear to me as ever sister was to brother; who told you she was more than that, Lady Barbara?"

"I have been told nothing; but I have had hints."

"Shame on the hints, Madam! People who mean well can afford to speak plainly. I can guess who is at the bottom of this."

"Perhaps there are more than you think, Robert. Do not be so angry. If you have pledged your heart to poor little Margery, keep your faith with her. Better to have a peasant-girl for your wife than a guilty conscience and the bitter memory of having broken an honest woman's heart."

"I swear to you, dear Madam, that Margery has never been more to me than my foster-sister, and never will be. I know that she is beautiful—lovelier than Miss Hemsley; but she has never touched my heart, as one look of that young lady's touched me on the first night of her coming here. I think there must be some element of magic in such spells, innocent as they seem."

"I can not doubt you when you speak so boldly. But oh, Robert, let there be no broken hearts—no ruined lives. There has been too much of that already."

I looked at her wonderingly, and she answered my inquiring glance.

"Your father's heart and mine, Robert—your father's life and mine—both broken, both ruined, for want of a little more candor, a little more patience, a little more constancy. I loved him so dearly! Yes, that is why you are as dear to me as ever only son was to doting mother. I can not tell you how happy we were as boy and girl together, or how devoted he seemed to me. I know that in those days he was all truth, all goodness. There was no hidden evil in that proud young heart. He had his faults, perhaps, but they were the failings of a knight-errant. Who can say that Sir Philip Sidney was faultless? and we know that Raleigh was a sinner. His errors were ever those of a great mind. O God, how easy it is for me to pardon and pity him now; I who was so unforgiving then, when my pardon could have saved him! When he came from the University I thought him changed, and there was one about me who took care to call my attention to the change, and by-and-by to assign a cause for it. Martha Peyton, now Martha Grimshaw, my conscientious, confidential, trust-worthy maid, discovered an incipient intrigue of my cousin's, and brought me speedy news of it. Mr. Ainsleigh was always hanging about Parson Lester's vicarage, she told me. Mr. Lester was a hunting-parson, renowned for his knowledge of horses and his veterinary skill, and this might fairly be the magnet that drew Roderick to his house. But my confidential maid would not have me think this. Mr. Lester had an only daughter, a pretty, empty-headed girl, and Martha hinted that it was for her sake my cousin haunted the vicarage. I had seen the girl at church, and had invited her to tea in my dressing-room, and given her a cast-off gown now and then, to the aggravation of my confidential Martha, who was inclined to be jealous of intruders. I knew that Amelia Lester was weak, and frivolous, and pretty, and I believed my informant. I had no civil word for my cousin after this, and would hear neither explanations nor apologies, which at first he fain would have made. The breach grew wider day by day. Oh, Robert, I was madly, wickedly jealous. I hated my rival, my false lover, myself, the whole world. One day I met Roderick and Amelia together in the park, the girl simpering and blushing under her hat, my cousin with the conqueror's easy, self-satisfied air. He did not even blush on meeting me, but passed me by with a cool nod and smile of defiance, while Miss Amelia dropped me a low courtesy, with her eyes cast modestly to the ground. After this meeting I scarcely deigned to speak to my cousin, and suffered unspeakable torments with a haughty countenance. Women have a genius for self-torture. I would have given worlds to bring Roderick to my feet, to be assured that I alone was beloved by him. Yet I obstinately repelled his advances, and neglected every opportunity of reconciliation."

"Your mind had been poisoned, dear Madam," I said; for I knew but too well Mrs. Grimshaw's hard, cruel nature, and could now perceive that her hatred was a heritage that came to me from my father, whom she had pursued with that fury which the poets tell us to be worse than the hate of hell.

"Yes, my mind had been poisoned," replied my lady; "my confidante, from pure conscientiousness, no doubt—but there are no people can wound like these conscientious friends—kept me informed of my cousin's doings. His visits to the vicarage were notorious. Miss Lester had boasted every where of her conquest. 'Every where' is a vague word; but I was too angry, too miserable, to insist upon particulars. And then, was I not heiress of Hauteville? and should my cousin affect the most ardent devotion, how could I believe him? My confidante took occasion to remind me of my wealth; these prudent people have such sordid notions. Had I known the world then as I know it now, Robert, I should have valued your father so much the more for the pride that held him aloof from me after my numerous repulses had chilled and wounded him. But I believed myself deserted and betrayed for a person whom I considered my inferior; and when my father's anger was aroused by the discovery of certain debts which Roderick had concealed from him, I made no attempt to act as peace-maker. Then came a long and stormy interview, which resulted in my cousin's abrupt departure from Hauteville, never again to sleep beneath this roof. He went without a word of farewell. My father declared he would return, and I too hoped long in the face of despair. Oh, Robert, for me those were the days of retribution. What a long heart-sickness, what weary agony! For a year I listened and watched for Roderick Ainsleigh's return. Every sound of a horse's hoofs in the distance, every sudden stroke of the great bell, every messenger or letter-carrier who came to this old place, raised a hope that was awakened only to be disappointed. My confidential maid fell ill of the small-pox soon after my cousin's departure, but that fatal malady passed me by, though I would fain have courted any death-stroke. Within six months of Roderick's disappearance Amelia Lester left her father's house, secretly, as it was rumored, though the parson affected to know where she was. She had gone to some relations in Somersetshire, he said, and as no one but he had any right to be angry the assertion was suffered to pass unchallenged; except by Martha Peyton, who contrived to extort the truth from a servant at the vicarage. The young lady had been missing one morning, and the father had raged and stormed for a while, and then had cursed her for a worthless hussy, saying that no doubt she had run after Roderick Ainsleigh, about whom her head had been turned for the last three years. This was the story Martha told me, and she wanted to bring the vicarage servant to confirm it. I told her I required no confirmation of my cousin's baseness, and that she need trouble herself no more about my affairs. But the blow struck none the less severely because I was too proud to show the pain. I was so steeped in misery that my father's sudden death shocked me much less than it would have done at any other time; and when it was suggested that I should visit an aunt in London, I consented listlessly, with some faint sense of relief in the idea of leaving Hauteville."

"And there came no tidings of my father, even on the death of his benefactor?"

"No; but I have since had reason to believe that Roderick attended his uncle's funeral. A black-cloaked figure appeared among the group around the mausoleum in the park. The funeral was celebrated at night, and the stranger, who kept aloof from the rest of the mourners, drew upon himself the notice of the torch-bearers. One of these afterward declared that he had seen either Mr. Ainsleigh or his ghost."

"And did you never see him again, Lady Barbara?"

"Never, Robert, never. No sign reached me to tell if he were still among the living. I will not enter into the manifold reasons that prompted my marriage, which was never in any sense a love-match. Sir Marcus knew that I had no heart to give, and was content to accept my esteem and obedience. Nor have either of us, I believe, had reason to repent our union. Sir Marcus has ever proved a kind and indulgent husband, and my life has been happier than that of many a woman who marries for love. But I have not forgotten my girlhood, Robert, and all my old hopes and dreams and troubles come back to me when I look upon your face."

She opened her desk and handed me an oval morocco-case, containing a miniature. I recognized the countenance I had seen in the oil-painting shown me by Anthony Grimshaw, that dark strongly-marked face which bore so close a resemblance in feature and complexion to my own.

"You grow more like him every day," said my lady. "That miniature was his only gift to me. 'Twas taken before doubt or anger had arisen between us."

"And did you never hear more of him, Madam?"

"Yes, Robert. Six months after my marriage a letter reached me—a letter from my cousin Roderick. It was long and wild, telling me how I had been beloved, and how my coldness had angered that proud heart. I have the letter in this desk, but every word of it is burned into my memory, ineffaceable as the graver's work upon metal. 'If I could not be happy with her I loved, I could at least be wretched with one who loved me,' he wrote; 'and I found a faithful creature, Barbara, who was gladder to unite herself to my broken fortunes than a wiser woman would have been to follow a better man.' And then my poor proud Roderick went on to confess that he had fallen very low, so low that his sole hope for the partner of his wretchedness rested on my compassion. 'And you showed a great contempt for this poor creature once, Barbara,' he added."

"He had married the parson's daughter, then?"

"Ay, Robert, she was the sharer of his sorrows."

"Will you let me see my father's letter, Madam?"

My lady hesitated for some few moments, and then took the paper from a secret drawer of her desk.

"I know not whether I am wise, Robert," she said, "but perhaps it is best you should learn all that I can tell you."

She handed me the letter, written on tavern paper, in a bold clear penmanship, which was not without some family resemblance to my own.

Together Lady Barbara and I read the faded lines:

"I stood among the crowd that watched your wedding, cousin," continued the writer, "as I had watched unseen on a former occasion. I needed not the confirmation of that ambitious alliance to prove that you had never loved me. You but yielded to your father's wish that his sister's son should share his daughter's fortune, and were but too glad to find an excuse for breaking my heart. Great Heaven, what a wretch am I to reproach you!—a tavern-haunting, plotting reprobate to dare upbraid my lord ambassador's lady because she is cold and cruel, and severed from me by a gulf that fate, or her pride, or my folly has dug between us! Ah, Barbara, I am very tired of this wearisome struggle, this muddled dream of a drunkard, called life. If I should make a sudden sinful end of it, wouldst thou have pity on a poor faithful wretch starving in a lodging near St. Bride's Church, Fleet Street? 'Tis at a dyer's, 17 Monk's Alley, a narrow court betwixt the church and the Temple—hard for a fine lady's footman to find, but not beyond the ken of charity. Go to her soon, Barbara Lestranger, if thou wouldst have one poor woman and her infant snatched from the many who perish unknown under the gracious sway of our beneficent Hanoverian ruler. A helpless woman and an infant cry to you, cousin. The child is of your own blood. But the messenger waits, and my paper will hold no more. I bribe him with my last sixpence to carry this letter to St. James's Square. God grant he may be faithful! God grant Amelia and my child may find you kind! 'Tis perhaps the last prayer of your wretched humble servant,

"RODERICK AINSLEIGH.
"Rose and Crown Tavern, Soho, November 15, 1731.

"N.B. Inquire for Mrs. Adams. I have spared the pride of my family, and am only known to the companions of my poverty as Robert Adams."

"As our evil fortune would have it—and there seemed ever to interpose a cruel fate between Roderick and me—I was away from London when this letter was brought; and the shabbiness of the messenger bespeaking no respect from the porter who received it, the poor letter was laid aside with bills and petitions, and other insignificant papers, to await my return. The date of my cousin's appeal was a week old when I received it, and prompt as I was to seek Monk's Alley, I was too late to see him whose face I so longed to look upon once more. I found only a dying woman—the very ghost of that vain village beauty whom I had known as Amelia Lester—and a sickly child. This poor, wretched soul was too far gone in fever to recognize me. She raved deliriously of her Roderick, and it was piteous to hear her imploring him to come back. Even in this dying state she tried to nourish her child; but the dyer's wife, a decent, charitable creature, who had received no rent for many weeks, took the babe into her care. For a week your mother lingered, Robert, and I visited her daily, and gave her such succor as was possible. She was past cure when I found her."

"And my father, had he deserted her?"

"No, Robert. From the dyer's wife I learned that your father had ever been kind to his companion in misery. He had come home intoxicated sometimes, roaring tipsy songs about wine and women, but had never been harsh to the poor soul, who watched and waited for him, and loved him with unchanging fidelity. Sometimes he had staid at home gloomy and brooding for days together. The woman believed that he had lived by writing political pamphlets for the cheap book-sellers. Once he had written something treasonable, and had been threatened with a prosecution, and had lain in hiding for weeks together. For a year and a half he had lodged in this mean, stifling alley, in this bare, wretched garret, while all Hauteville, of which he was to have been master, lay dark, and empty, and desolate for want of him. There never was a stable-help in my father's service lodged so meanly as this once-beloved nephew. Ah, Robert, the thought of this stung me to the quick. 'Let him come back, and I will share my fortune with him,' I said to myself, forgetting that my fortune was no longer mine alone, and that I had given another the right to counsel, if not to dictate, my disposal of it."

"SHE OPENED HER DESK AND HANDED ME AN OVAL MOROCCO CASE, CONTAINING A MINIATURE."

"And he never came back?" I asked, breathlessly.

"Never. He had been missing a week when I found Amelia. He must have disappeared on the very night when his letter to me was written. But the dyer's wife was not alarmed. He had often absented himself for two or three days at a time, it appeared. Yet 'twas strange, she owned, so kind a gentleman should desert a dying woman. He might have been taken to some prison, for debt, or libel, or treason. I caused the lists of every prison in London to be examined, but did not find my cousin. I sent my agent to the booksellers to inquire for such a pamphlet-writer. One among them knew him well as Mr. Adams of Monk's Alley, and had given him frequent employment, but had of late found no work for him. 'The town was beginning to tire of patriotism spiced with treason; Church and State had been reviled and ridiculed till not a rag was left from which to spin an essay. If a new Butler had arisen to write a new 'Hudibras,' the book would scarce have sold. I knew by this that Roderick's means of livelihood had failed him before he had written to me; and taking this in conjunction with that hint of a sudden sinful end to his wretchedness, I could but fear that my unhappy cousin had destroyed himself."

"Was he so miserable as to commit that sin?"

"No, Robert, he did not perish by his own hand; yet I know not if his end were less sinful. He fell in a midnight brawl at the tavern where his letter was written, and on the very night on which it was dated—a most wretched, profligate haunt near Soho Square. He had been buried ten days when my agents traced him; and so wretched is the manner in which the poor and friendless are buried in that vast wealthy city, that when I fain would have had the corpse exhumed, that I might look on the familiar face once more, and convey the remains to some more fitting resting-place, I was told that this was impossible. Into those festering charnel-houses where the obscure dead are thrust it is death to enter; nor could the men who buried the nameless stranger remember into which grave they had flung his unknown remains. It was only by means of a letter found upon him that my wretched cousin was traced. This letter—addressed to Mrs. Adams, of Monk's Alley—had been preserved by the keeper of the dead-house where the corpse was carried after the miserable drunkard's brawl in which your unhappy father perished. The man who slew him escaped in the confusion that followed his death. I doubt not that in such places they favor the escape of a murderer rather than be called to bear witness at his trial."

"And the letter, dear Madam—did that tell you much?"

"But little. 'Twas only a few lines of farewell to the unhappy Amelia. It convinced me, however, that my cousin had left her with the intention of never returning. He bequeathed her and his child to my compassion. Whether he had indeed meditated self-slaughter, as his letter hinted, or whether he had intended to seek new fortunes abroad when death by an assassin's hand overtook him, I know not. His ashes rest among the bones of paupers in St. Anne's churchyard, Soho, in which parish is the tavern where he fell; and all that affection could do for his memory was to put up a little tablet in the church, inscribed with his name and the date of his death."

"Affection for his memory has done more than that, dear lady; it has cherished his orphan son."

"That is but a poor atonement, Robert, from her whose pride helped to destroy him. If I could have brought him back to life by the sacrifice of my own I would have done it; but I could do nothing for him, though but two short years before one word of mine might have saved him. 'This is what makes the burden of our sins so heavy—there is no undoing them. Pride is a luxury that is apt to cost us dear, cousin."

"Did you find a certificate of my mother's marriage among my father's papers, Madam, which I presume you examined?"

"No, Robert. I did indeed ransack an old leather portmanteau crammed with papers, and poor ragged clothing, and tattered books. The papers were for the most part rough proofs of pamphlets and odd pages of manuscript, so scored and blotted as to be almost illegible. Scattered among these were a few tavern-bills and notes from boon companions, signed but with Christian names or initials, and all bespeaking the wild reckless life of him to whom they were addressed."

"And there was nothing more?"

"Nothing. Any more important papers your father had doubtless destroyed, not caring to leave the evidence of his former estate behind him. As he had suppressed his real name, it was natural he should do away with all documents revealing it."

"I am sorry you can give me no record of my mother's marriage," I answered, sadly.

Lady Barbara was silent, and I knew thereby that she doubted whether any religious ceremonial had ever sanctified the luckless union to which I owed my birth.

I inquired presently where my mother was buried.

"In the grave-yard of St. Bride's Church, near which she died," replied Lady Barbara. "Her father had been dead six months when I discovered the poor creature; and to have carried her remains to Pennington, where he had lived, would have been only to cause scandal. It was better that the poor soul should rest in the great city, where all private sorrows and domestic shipwrecks are engulfed and hidden beneath the stormy public sea."

"All that you did was for the wisest, dear Madam," I replied, kissing the beautiful white hand which was the bounteous giver of all my blessings.

"And now, dear Robert, I want to act wisely in the planning your future," my lady said, gently. "I can not give you a fortune, but I hope I may help you to make one. I have concluded that with your learning the Bar would be your best profession; and I would have you proceed to London without delay and enter yourself at the Temple, where you can study at your ease under the direction of a respectable gentleman to whom I can recommend you, and of whose kindness I have no doubt. I shall give you a starting sum of two hundred pounds, and will give you as much every year until your profession shall afford you a comfortable livelihood, since I wish you to live like a gentleman, yet with strict economy. I will not weary you with the hackneyed warnings against the perils of London life, but I will only bid you to remember the sad end of your father's reckless career. If you will not take counsel from that awful lesson, you will be warned by nothing. But I hope much from your love of learning and the natural steadiness of your disposition."

How could I find words to acknowledge so much goodness! I knelt at my cousin's feet and kissed the dear hands, which I bedewed this time with grateful tears.

"Come, come, Robert, you take these things too seriously," cried my lady, with affected gayety. "Let us talk of your journey. Foolish boy, I am in haste to be rid of you! Shall you be ready to leave us in a week?"

"It is my duty to be ready whenever you please."

"Ah, Robert, do you think it pleases me to banish you? But Sir Marcus would have no mercy if you came between him and his ambition. Yes, in a week, dear child; it will be best and wisest."

I was still kneeling at the generous creature's feet. She laid her hand lightly upon my hair, and bent her stately head until her lips touched my forehead; and with a tender motherly kiss she dismissed me.

DJOMBA FATOUMA, QUEEN OF MOHILLA.

WE give herewith a striking illustration of the Queen of Mohilla, Djomba Fatouma, who is just now creating a great sensation in Paris, whither she has gone on a diplomatic mission, to settle some differences which have arisen between her government and the commandant of a French frigate, who lately bombarded her island in retaliation for some slight affront. This African queen is in many respects a remarkable woman. She has four ministers, and a general, who commands an army of fifteen hundred men, equipped in the European fashion. This army she reviews herself, to the sound of guitars, fifes, and tambourines. She rules supreme in her island, where she and her family are the only free persons, all the rest being slaves, including the four ministers and the general. The whole island belongs to Queen Fatouma, who is the daughter of the Prince of Madagascar. She is thirty-one years old, and has been married twice, the first time, at fourteen, to an old Arab, a relative of the Sultan of Zanzibar. She has three children, the eldest of which holds the reins of government during his mother's absence.

Queen Fatouma is possessed of considerable personal beauty. Her features are regular, her hair thick, soft, and glossy, and her complexion very dark. She has received a European education, and speaks French without accent. Her singular jewels, and the bright colors of her dress, in which red and yellow predominate, help to make her conspicuous: it is said that the fashion of the former dates back to the primitive ages of Egypt and Ethiopia, from which races she is supposed to have sprung. She clings to her crown with strange tenacity, wearing it every where—in the cars, at home, and at the opera. At Paris she resides at the Grand Hotel, where she is accompanied by her general, several ladies of honor, and a suite of domestics, chief among whom is the sacrificer, whose duty it is to kill all the animals served on Queen Fatouma's table. She is the lion of the day at Paris; crowds flock together to see her as she passes, and Fatouma skirts, bonnets, and cravats are displayed in all the shop-windows. She has been received at Fontainebleau by the Emperor and Empress with great kindness—this graciousness being the sole atonement she is likely to gain for her affront. Mohilla, the domain of the Princess, is one of the Comoro Isles, situated in the Mozambique Channel, and remarkable for its delightful climate and exquisite fruits and flowers. It is styled by travelers a natural orchard and flower-garden.

DJOMBA FATOUMA, QUEEN OF MOHILLA.

GEORGE SAND.

ABOUT six hours from ancient and sombre Chateauroux, the capital of the Indre department, in the former Duchy of Berry, there lies, on a beautiful knoll, the charming Château Nohant. The windows of this château—which is not a very old structure, and partly built in the rococo style—look brightly upon the excellent turnpike leading past a small and exceedingly neat-looking village, behind which extend the meadows, the park, and garden of the château.

Here lives the greatest authoress of France, Madame Aurora Dudevant, better known as George Sand. Here she passed already the earliest years of her life; here her grandmother, Madame Dupin de Francueil, gave her the most singular education, teaching her horsemanship, swordsmanship, and marksmanship; and during the numerous excursions which she made in those years through the neighboring country, young Aurora filled her imagination with the pictures of those châteaux, villages, and personages we meet with in so many of her works. Her grandmother finally deemed it best to send the willful and impetuous young girl for several years to a convent, in order that, under the influence of that monotonous life, her exuberant spirits might cool down. But nothing of the kind had yet taken place when she was called back to Nohant to bid a last farewell to her dying grandmother. Soon after—she was scarcely sixteen years of age—she was married to a Captain Dudevant, who was neither a marquis, nor even descended from a good family, but head over ears in debt, and enamored more of Aurora's wealth and of her handsome château than of his young wife, who, it is true, was not beautiful, but wonderfully accomplished and gifted, and possessed of a heart longing to be loved and appreciated. Lansac, in her novel "Valentine," is a striking portrait of M. Dudevant, who pursued the same course as Lansac toward his unhappy wife. When his young wife spoke to him of the grief that filled her ardent heart, he scorned and derided her; when she wept and complained, he sought to amuse himself elsewhere; when she finally determined to separate from him, he raised no objections whatever, provided she should leave him in the undisturbed possession of her fortune and of Château Nohant. He allowed her twelve hundred francs a year, and upon this small sum Aurora Dudevant lived with her two children in a garret in Paris until, in 1832, she began to earn money and fame by entering the path of literature.

Poverty made her an author, like so many others who subsequently obtained great celebrity. At the outset of her literary career she wrote for the Paris Figaro. Henri de Latouche, then editor of that influential journal, a gifted poet and especially renowned and revered as the kind-hearted mentor of so many struggling young authors, introduced the poor deserted wife of twenty-seven to the literary public. He discerned at once her latent talent, and told her not to lose heart when all her earliest articles proved to be below mediocrity.

GEORGE SAND.

It was not until Jules Sandeau assisted her in her literary labors that Aurora Dudevant acquired the necessary routine. Sandeau was her friend, not to say her lover; he accompanied her every where; he took the utmost pains to promote her interests, and he lent her his able pen to impart more polish and fluency to her literary efforts. She confessed afterward that she did not love him, but esteemed him as a friend; however, she treated him somewhat ungratefully, for she separated from him as soon as she had reached the top of the ladder of fame, which he had helped her to climb. Be this as it may, it was together with Jules Sandeau that she wrote the novel "Rose and Blanche," which was published in 1832, and for which the two authors obtained from the publisher, not without a great deal of trouble, the wonderful remuneration of one hundred francs. The author's name, as stated on the title-page, was "George Sand," which Madame Dudevant henceforth adopted as her nom de plume, and on which she was not long in shedding a lustre completely eclipsing its father, Jules Sandeau.

"Rose and Blanche" had but a small sale, and met with a rather discouraging reception at the hands of the critics; but kind-hearted M. de Latouche urged her not to despair, but to try again and again. George Sand then wrote the novel "Indiana," which appeared first in the Revue des Deux Mondes for 1832, and "Indiana" rendered George Sand famous.

The extraordinary sensation which this work created in literary and social circles was enhanced by the lawsuit which she had commenced against her husband. This lawsuit had socially almost the same importance as the famous suit brought by Baron Beaumarchais against Goetzman, the parliamentary counselor, had had politically. Behind Beaumarchais, as well as behind Madame Dudevant, stood a great principle. We must bear in mind that at the time when this gifted and unhappy wife demanded of her unworthy husband the restoration of her fortune, of which he had robbed her, society, literature, and especially the female world, both in France and Germany, were full of the teachings of Saint Simonism, and the ideas of emancipating society, and above all, reforming the relations between man and wife. Le Père Enfantin still haunted the minds of a great many, Saint Simonism preached its theories, woman and her position became subjects of profound philosophical investigation, emancipation clubs were formed—"Young Germany," Gutzkow's "Wally," Mundt's "Madonna," the writings of Wienberg, Laube, and Kühne advocated the same principles, and frightened even the sleepy German Diet. And now there arose a woman, an authoress, who carried all these theories into effect, and boldly struggled for the rights of her sex against the pretended superiority of the "Lords of Creation." George Sand gained her lawsuit, and the excitement of society subsided. The courts granted her a decree of perpetual separation from M. Dudevant, her fortune and château were restored to her, and now she was generous enough to grant, in her turn, a considerable pension to her former husband.

MORNING DREAMS.—[SEE POEM, PAGE 702.]

Thus she went back as châtelaine to Nohant. She had left it as a fugitive wife; she returned to it triumphant, and as a celebrated authoress whose novels filled all Europe with astonishment and admiration, and rendered her even during her lifetime, and young as she still was, a veritable myth. George Sand! That name had become the designation of an audacious woman, rebelling against the laws of society, defying the dictates of conventional morality, and representing the incarnation of female emancipation. Great Heavens, what stories were told about her! She rode on horseback, she fenced with broadswords, she practiced at pistol-galleries like a young lieutenant of the line. She had promenade in male attire on the Boulevards of Paris, boldly blowing the blue smoke of her cigarette into the faces of shocked young ladies, loafing on the corners arm in arm with young Bohemians, brandishing her riding-whip, laughing as loudly and defiantly as a captain of dragoons; in short, horribly eccentric in every respect—a sort of female monster!

Hundreds of anecdotes were related to characterize her singularities, and to illustrate the fantastic turn of her genius. Mice were converted into elephants, and slander, falsehood, and the proneness of men to make what is singular look even more singular, finally created a George Sand that did not exist at all, but was a mere myth. Paris, gossiping, scandal-loving Paris, was the hot-bed of all the strange rumors circulating in regard to her, and abroad people repented and even magnified these ridiculous stories.

The pamphleteers and feuilletonistes never tired of relating fresh traits, mostly fictitious or grossly exaggerated, about her, and a great many people looked upon her as an audacious virago, mocking and defying public opinion. Indiscreet curiosity constantly dogged her steps. No means were left untried by silly Paul Prys to gain access to her, even though it were but for a moment. All sorts of disguises were resorted to for that purpose; nay, one exceedingly inquisitive individual donned the sooty garb of a chimney-sweep in order to penetrate into her house. As the châtelaine of Nohant was not disposed to exhibit herself, like another Miss Pastrana, to all eccentric Englishmen, literary tourists, and impertinent intruders generally, she kept within the circle of a few intimate acquaintances, and it was not very easy to gain access to her without excellent recommendations. When the impertinence of these intruders became almost intolerable the authoress not unfrequently resented it by mystifying them in a very ludicrous manner. Thus a lawyer, who insisted on forming the acquaintance of George Sand, was solemnly introduced to her femme de chambre, while Madame Dudevant and her daughter, concealed in an alcove, laughingly witnessed the amusing spectacle. The lawyer spoke a few days afterward in terms of ecstatic admiration of the wonderfully interesting interview he had with the celebrated authoress, and came near being challenged to mortal combat for remarking in a tone of sincere regret that George Sand had already lost her teeth. On another occasion her son Maurice donned his mother's dress, and then walked past a number of English tourists who were lying in wait for the lady of Nohant on the terrace of a neighboring inn.

The original of the fanciful portraits which have been drawn of George Sand differs very widely from them; nay, it is by far less interesting than they would indicate. When I visited her I had really thought that she was a sort of Amazon, and that she rather delighted in showing her eccentricities. How greatly was I surprised to see before me a lady looking like a good, simple bourgeoise and housewife! Every thing about her was natural, unaffected, and in good taste. She was plying her needle very busily, even during the animated conversation in which six or seven persons participated, and told us with charming frankness that she and her daughter always got up the costumes for their little amateur theatre in the château, which, she said, added considerably to the pleasure which those theatricals afforded her. It is one of the favorite pastimes of George Sand to perform in conjunction with some of the peasants of the little village, which belongs to her, such of her plays as have met with a cool reception at the hands of the Parisians. Besides, all her new plays are performed on this stage. She tests them in this manner, and does not permit any Parisian theatre to play them until they have been tried at Nohant.

So the impression she made upon me was that of a very sensible lady—a model of propriety and common-sense. On another occasion a visitor found her cutting a dress pattern, and when he looked at her in amazement, she burst into laughter and exclaimed: "Oui, c'est moi, cela vous étonne?" Nay, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe she is a better housewife than a great many women who have no other vocation than that. Not only does she sew, embroider, and knit; she also attends to the kitchen, makes delicious sweetmeats, and the coffee which she prepares has often thrown Alexandre Dumas, that prince of gourmets, into an ecstasy of delight. That she is an excellent châtelaine may be ascertained by a chat with any of her villagers. All of them love and revere her as a mother, and she is lavish in her charities to the poor. Agriculture and horticulture are carried to a high state of perfection on her estate; and the numerous allusions in her works to such subjects are based on facts and on her own experience, and not, as has been generally supposed, merely drawn from her wonderful imagination. Leggards and want do not exist in the neighborhood of Nohant; and there is not a villager, not an humble servant, but whose name she knows, and whom she treats as a member of her family. Not a wedding is celebrated in the neighborhood until she has returned from Paris to the château; and when she is at Nohant she is present at every baptism and funeral.

As people generally entertain entirely erroneous opinions in regard to her manners and conduct, so they have formed very ridiculous ideas concerning her personal appearance. She does not look like a fantastic and eccentric woman; on the contrary, she makes such an impression of simplicity that those who see her can at first blush scarcely believe that she is George Sand, the great George Sand! Her face looks so quiet, so sober, so dull, that some of her enemies declared her to be a sheepish-looking woman, which she herself laughingly said was quite true. At all events, he who meets her for the first time is certain to be greatly disappointed. She is of medium height and quite corpulent. Her once jet-black, now gray hair, which she wears in a very plain manner, does not add to the intellectual expression of her head. Her nose is large, almost too large for the face, whose fine, soft lineaments indicate infinite mildness and kind-heartedness. Her mouth bears the same masculine expression as her nose, and her lips and chin seem to point to a rather sensual nature. But her fine, smooth, and expansive forehead, surmounting her round face, shows that her brains may bring forth mighty thoughts, however dull her countenance may look at first blush. Her eyes, too, seem to grow more and more remarkable the longer you look at them: they are so shapely, so gentle, so grave; there is trembling in them a melancholy which must have risen from the depths of her heart.

The longer we gaze into these deep eyes the more distinctly we feel that we have to deal with a woman of genius, whose plain outward appearance must not mislead us. This impression grows more and more irresistible when her lips open and the sonorous tones of her voice fall on our ears, and pour forth words of wondrous beauty. The fire of her thoughts then flashes and sparkles in her eyes, the housewife, as it were, vanishes from our view, and in her place appears a Muse—George Sand. The weak and mild, too mild expression of her features undergoes a marked change during our conversation with her; the face loses its former character, and grace is now enthroned on it instead of simple, unaffected kind-heartedness—genius, bright, radiant genius, instead of dull prosiness—the various lineaments are blended in a harmonious whole, and an expression of mild dignity and gravity beams from her countenance.

George Sand dislikes talking about herself, and even about literature. In her whole demeanor there is not a trace of the pains which so many French authoresses take to say sharp and witty things on all occasions. George Sand, who, in her novels, is the most sensitive and, withal, the most revolutionary, fiery, and defiant authoress, is in social intercourse perfectly dispassionate, conciliatory, and amiable. Her conversation, so far from being pretentious, is always modest and almost timid, although she can be very eloquent. Contradiction never exasperates her, and when it becomes too imperious, she repeats her previous argument in kind and calm, but somewhat peremptory language. She knows not only how to write and speak well, but also how to listen and keep silence. She dislikes debating and expatiating at great length on any subject, but pronounces in a few words in favor of an opinion, or as briefly declares her dissent.

Madame Dudevant and George Sand, in effect, are widely different characters, both in their principles and feelings. Madame Dudevant is a model mother and housewife. George Sand is a demoniacal nature that has thrown a blazing torch into society.

ORIGIN OF THE TEA-PLANT.

THE Chinese tell the following curious legend concerning the origin of the tea-plant:

Darma, a very religious prince, son of Kasinwo, an Indian king, and the twenty-eighth descendant of Tiaka, a negro monarch (1023 B.C.), landed in China in the year 510. Probably a Brahmin or a Buddhist of great austerity, he employed all his care to diffuse a sense of religion, and for this purpose denied himself rest, sleep, and relaxation. He lived in the open air, and devoted himself day and night to prayer and contemplation of the nature and beneficence of God, aiming at eventual absorption into the Divine Essence when purified by long prayer, fast, and vigil. Flesh is flesh, however. After several years, worn out by want of food and sleep, Darma the great and good involuntarily closed his eyes, and after that slept soundly, reckless of any thing but rest. Before dawn he awoke, full of sorrow and despair at having thus broken his vow, snatched up a knife and cut off both his offending eyelids. When it grew light he discovered that two beautiful shrubs had grown from them, and eating some of the leaves, he was presently filled with new joy, courage, and strength to pursue his holy meditations. The new plant was the tea-plant, and Darma recommended the use of it to his disciples and followers. Kempfer gives a portrait of this Chinese and Japanese saint, at whose feet there is always a reed to indicate that he had traversed seas and rivers, and had come from afar.

The legend seems to prove that from the earliest times tea was known among students and austere people as a dispeller of drowsiness. Its first use was no doubt accidental, as was that of coffee, the virtues of which, the Arab legend says, were discovered by some goats who had browsed on leaves of the coffee-plant, and became unusually lively after their meal. It is a singular fact, too, that Jesuit writers who visited China in the reign of James I. expressly state that they used the herb tea common among the Chinese, and found that it kept their eyes open and lessened the fatigue of writing sermons and hearing absolutions that lasted late into the night. No doubt the figure of Darma and his reed could be found on old China.

MORNING DREAMS.

ALL the rosy chamber
Noontide glory dyes;
Like an infant sleeping
Still my lady lies.

Softly midnight slumbers
Weary eyelids close;
But the dreamful morning
Sweetens sweet repose.

Dark are dreams of darkness,
Gloomy with the night;
But the morning vision
Brightens to the light.

So, my lady sleeping,
Softly, sweetly smiles,
As a dream of rapture
All her heart beguiles.

She awaits her lover,
And the hour is late;
But how sweet the waiting
When for one we wait!

In the garden shadows
They embrace again:
Ah, the happy meeting!
Ah, the parting pain!

But she clasps his letter,
Clasps it to her heart;
Wherefore, then, this anguish,
Why this waking start?

From her breast its treasure
Some one snatching takes:
"Ah, my stolen letter!"
Moaning, she awakes.

"Chocolate, my lady?"
Betty softly cries.
"My letter!" "Here, my lady,
On the ground it lies."

Fallen from her fingers,
On the ground it gleams;
So end my lady's troubles
And her morning dreams.

THE TROOPER'S STORY.

Do I plead guilty to it? yea, I do;
For I have never lied, and shall not now;
But give me a dog's leave to say a word
Touching what happened, and the why and how.

The night-guard went their rounds that night at one;
My post was in the lower dungeon range,
Down level with the moat, all slime and ooze,
And damp: but there, 'tis fit we change and change,

We sentinels. Besides, 'twas in a sort
The place of honor, or of trust, we'll say;
For in the cell there with the mortised door
The young boy-lord, guilty of treason, lay.

Well, with my partisan I'd tramped an hour
Down in the dark there—just a lantern hung
By the wet wall—when close at hand I heard
My own name spoken by a woman's tongue.

My hair was like to lift my morion up,
For the keep's haunted; but I turned, to see
A woman like a ghost—white face, all white,
Ready to drop, and not a yard from me.

How she had come there God in heaven knows.
However, long before my tongue I'd found,
She tore out of her hair the white pearls, big
As pigeons' eggs, and then dropt to the ground.

"One word!" she said, "only one word with him;
He dies to-morrow! See, my pearls I give,
My bracelets too!"—she slipt them from her arms—
"One word, and I will bless you while I live!"

"Your face is stern. Oh, but one word, one word!"
With my big hand I set her on her feet;
But she clung to me, would not be thrust off,
Still pleading in a bird's voice, soft and sweet.

"Only one word with him!" that was her plea;
One word; he would be dead at break of day!
She wept till all her pretty face was wet,
And my heart melted: yea, she had her way.

They spoke together. Did I hear? Not I;
Best ask me if I took her bribes. Well, there,
You know the rest—know how yon Judas-spy,
Yon starveling cur, crawled down the winding-stair;

And how he caught the bird fast in the cage,
And made report of me with eager breath,
For breach of duty. Right; it was a breach,
And that means, in our soldier-fashion, death!

Well, I can face it: I'm no craven hound
Like yonder Judas-spy. Nay, had I leave
To slit his weasand for him, as I'd slice
An onion, I'd meet death and never grieve.

KING GEORGE'S CHERRY-TREE.

A REMARKABLE cherry-tree is found in the gardens at Windsor, which was planted there by George I., the head of the reigning dynasty, who mounted the throne of England in 1714. The monarch grafted this cherry-tree with his own hands about 1725. He was extravagantly fond of fruits, and died of a fit of indigestion, caused by eating melons, in 1727.

This cherry-tree is almost entirely hollow, but its branches still bear very large and excellent cherries, which are served only on Queen Victoria's table. The Queen, however, often sends a few of the Windsor cherries to those whom she designs to show especial favor. Lord Palmerston often received them from her.

George IV., who, like his ancestor, was particularly fond of cherries, set a standing guard of several men around the Windsor cherry-tree to keep off the urchins of the neighborhood, and the fruit wall which supported it was guarded from the passers by a special sentry, who was relieved only at night. These minute precautions are no longer observed, though the venerable tree still continues to be guarded with the greatest care.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

INQUIRE.—Nothing can be more poetical, as you say, than the definition: "Gratitude is the memory of the heart." You are wrong, however, in supposing that La Rochefoucauld is the author of it. It has not the least resemblance to his cynical aphorisms. Its origin is generally attributed to a deaf and dumb pupil of the celebrated Sicard. His scholars having been requested, on the occasion of a public exhibition, to define gratitude, one of them wrote on the black-board: "La reconnaissance est la mémoire du cœur." As there is nothing new under the sun, it will not surprise you to learn that Cicero had, in entitling gratitude animus memor, anticipated Monsieur Sicard's deaf and dumb pupil.

Mrs. C. S. B.—We are sorry that we are not able to tell you of a method for concealing crimping-pins. They are unbecoming, and no lady should venture out of her chamber when her hair is on pins. Small tongs or shears are used to crop the hair. These are convenient when it is desirable to dress the hair at short notice, or in the afternoon when the moisture on the forehead has destroyed the crimps obtained by wearing pins all the night before. They are sold at from $1.50 to $2. We do not recommend them for constant use, as they make the hair very brittle, aside from the danger of scorching it. Make a Marie Antoinette fichu to your piqué suit, trimmed with narrow cord fringe, with wide braid or cluny edging and medallions. If your figure is not slender enough for a fichu, make a gored sacque that may be worn either with a belt or without. To curl is to knit backward. Net stitch is not used in crochet. It is very difficult to remove coffee stains from silk; grease may sometimes be taken out by grease-balls, a species of soap-stone, or benzine; but much depends on the color.

ELISE.—Après nous le déluge—"After us the deluge," was not first said by Louis XV. but by Madame de Pompadour. It was caught up, however, by the king and became a favorite saying of the monarch, who seemed, amidst all his frivolity and debauchery, to have a sombre anticipation of the coming revolution.

MARY D. BURKE.—In dry stamping a perforated paper pattern is laid over the stuff to be marked, over which a blue powder is rubbed with a pounce, thus making the impression desired.

A CONSTANT READER.—The braids of which you speak can be obtained from any of the parties named at the end of the New York Fashion article. They are easily kept in order.

HISTORIOUS.—Tar-water, though not such a cure-all as the good bishop of Berkeley would have us believe, is, notwithstanding, a useful remedy, which is not infrequently prescribed by the French physicians. With Berkeley's faith in tar he gave it not only in all human diseases but administered it to his plants and trees. "In his garden was a winding walk, nearly a quarter of a mile in length, inclosed for a considerable part of the distance by a myrtle hedge, six feet high, planted by Berkeley himself, each plant having a large ball of tar at the root."

R. O.—The meaning of Pascal's remark: "If the nose of Cleopatra had been shorter Antony might have kept the world," is obviously that if the Egyptian queen had been less beautiful the Roman conqueror would not have been seduced from the path of glory.

H. Y.—

"Where ignorance is bliss
'Tis folly to be wise."

These words are Gray's, but were suggested, probably, by the following lines of Prior:

"From ignorance our comfort flows,
The only wretched are the wise."

Mrs. M. N.—The best remedy for mosquito bites and all insect stings is hartshorn and water.

B. Y.—The chignon or "waterfall" is decidedly bad for the hair, as the heat and pressure of the foreign substances of which it is composed are sure to produce baldness. It has the same effect as constantly wearing indoors and out, a cap or any covering on the head, which is, as is well known, very hurtful to the most vigorous growth of hair.

GUSTAVE.—You should answer all invitations, especially dinner ones, whether R. S. V. P., Repondez s'il vous plaît, is written on the card or not.

MABEL.—You will find the principal part of your question answered in Bazar No. 41 in a reply to another correspondent. The bran and oat-meal baths may be continued.

Mrs. HELEN S.—Trim your dress with tassel or cord fringe about three inches wide, with a heading of two narrow folds of silk or satin with piping in the centre. If you do not want an outside garment make a tight-fitting basque, but we advise a plain waist instead, with a fichu or a scarf-shaped mantle looped in the back with rosettes. You are safe, we think, in going the front and side widths of your skirt. Our best modistes continue to gore all but the back widths. There is always a risk in making up handsome materials in an intermediate season.

H. B. L.—Standing collars are still adhered to by ladies with long necks because they are becoming, but the Oxford collars are most stylish. Lace collars of the Oxford and Cardinal shapes are made for afternoon and evening wear. Linen is only suitable for morning toilettes. It is not a fixed custom for a bride to furnish the household linen. The bridal trousseau is usually marked with her maiden name. It is never good taste for a lady to make a display of jewelry, but a watch and chain are articles of necessity, worn more for use than ornament, and scarcely to be considered jewelry. Hence it is not considered objectionable to wear them on the outside of a street dress.

EDA.—Braid your hair and wind it about the crown of your head. Young girls do wear bows at the throat. A knot of ribbon with fringed ends is considered more distinguished. Half a yard of ribbon is required to make it. Lemon juice used night and morning will remove tan.

A SUBSCRIBER.—There is no new style for engagement rings. A solitaire diamond or a large pearl with but little gold in the setting is most generally preferred. Every thing depends on the taste and purse of the donor.

M. C.—Green and white are the most fashionable colors for evening dresses at present. Pale buff, French gray, and white for street and house. Skirts are still gored in front and at the sides, and are quite full in the back, being frequently looped up in paniers. The wide Spanish flounce is more fashionable than three narrow ones. Cambric and grenadine are selected for neck-ties for gentlemen.

Our readers will notice the advertisement in our columns to-day of LAPORTE'S PARIS KID GLOVES, and will, no doubt, recall the name of LAPORTE, whose peculiar signature they have seen in the beautifully-cut and elastic kid gloves brought home by many a returning tourist from London.

The introduction of these admirable and widely-known gloves into the United States deserves more than a passing notice. LAPORTE'S Kid Gloves have been in use for nearly a quarter of a century by the Queen and Royal Family of England, and also by many of the most noble and distinguished families of that and other countries. It is noted for its beautiful shape, giving to the hand that graceful outline so rarely seen in ordinary gloves, heightening the effect of a handsome hand, and concealing in a measure any natural defect in those that are otherwise.

Our enterprising merchants will not be slow in availing themselves of the advantages which have already been derived by European dealers in this glove. One house in London (the well-known firm of J. & R. MORLEY) sell annually 30,000 dozen of LAPORTE'S Gloves.—Times.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

LAPORTE'S PARIS KID GLOVES. No. 15 Rue Pierre Levee, Paris, July 1, 1868. Messrs. FISK, CLARK, & FLAGG, New York.

GENTLEMEN.—It has occurred to me that in introducing my Gloves for sale in your market, a few facts in support of my claims upon the consideration of your customers would be very opportune at this time.

Upon the introduction of a Glove into a foreign market, it requires a certain number of years of trial to establish its reputation. This has been the case with most Gloves heretofore offered for sale in America, as the public had no other means of judging of their merits.

Desiring that my fabrication should be placed in its proper position before your people, as a first-class Glove, without undergoing the usual tedious process of cautious trial to which all new makes have to submit which (unlike my own) have not an established reputation, I feel fully confident they will at once, upon their own merits, obtain that high position in the estimation of the American public to which they have attained in England.

In consideration of the foregoing facts, I deem it advisable to forward you a list of distinguished personages in England who, among many others, have worn my Gloves for several years, and whose special measures for a supply of the same are now in my possession, having been forwarded me through my London agents. I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, LAPORTE.

Personages above alluded to who are supplied with the "LAPORTE KID GLOVE," made from their special measures forwarded to Monsieur Laporte:

HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA.
THE ROYAL FAMILY OF ENGLAND.
THE PRINCESS ROYAL OF PRUSSIA.
LADY PALMERSTON.
COUNTESS OF STAMFORD.
BARONESS DE SAMUEL.
LADY BOUGHEY.

HON. MRS. CULPEPPER.
THE DUKE OF MONTROSE.
THE EARL OF YARBOROUGH.
THE EARL OF LISTOWELL.
THE EARL OF DALKEITH.
THE EARL OF SEFTON.
LORD ASHLEY, M.P.
LORD WALTER SCOTT.
VISCOUNT BOYLE.
VISCOUNT NEWARK.
VISCOUNT EVERLEY.
SIR CHAS. STEPHENSON.
LORD BURGESS.
BARON DE GLUCKY.
THE HON. A. H. VERNON.
THE HON. MAJOR SOMERSET CALTHORPE.
THE HON. F. G. CALTHORPE, M.P.
THE HON. A. G. CALTHORPE.
THE HON. J. M. H. MAJOR.
THE HON. HARRY TEMPLE.
THE HON. A. W. GREVILLE.
THE HON. W. W. VERNON.
THE HON. H. J. ADEANE, ESQ., M.P.
SIR ARTHUR ASHTON.
SIR THOMAS WHICHCOTE, BART.
SIR ARTHUR LAMB, BART.
COUNT CORTI.

It is needless to add that the above list comprises some of the most noble and distinguished families, who, for many years, have patronized Mons. Laporte's establishment.

The undersigned are American agents for these celebrated Gloves, and have now in store a full stock of New Styles and Colors for the Fall Trade.

FACETIÆ.

THE QUEEN OF TERRORS.—"Are you alarmed at the approach of the King of Terrors?" asked a man of a dying neighbor. "No," was the emphatic reply; "no. I've lived six-and-thirty years with the Queen of Terrors, and the King can't be worse 'n she, I'll be bound."

An incorrigible idler being taken to task for his laziness, replied, "I tell you, gentlemen, you are mistaken. I have not a lazy bone in my body; but the fact is, I was born tired."

Crossing the ocean with Mr. H—, his readiness at repartee attracted the notice of all on board, and a wager was laid that he could not be caught napping, but would give not only a prompt, but witty reply. Next morning Mr. H— was observed looking through the telescope, the atmosphere being damp and cold. The interested party, determined to win, touched Mr. H—'s arm, and asked, "What ship is that?" "Don't know; but I hope it's a Peruvian bark, for I'm in a perfect chill." There was a Champagne dinner.

HOW THEY DIFFER.—Jones has discovered the respective nature of a distinction and a difference. He says that "a little difference" frequently makes many enemies, while "a little distinction" attracts hosts of friends to the one on whom it is conferred.

THE LATEST FASHIONS.—As a lady of fashion now spends so much time and labor on her dress, it may be very fairly designated her "toilette!"

Mrs. Partington wants to know, if it were not intended that women should drive their husbands, why they are put through the bridal ceremony.

OBJECTIONABLE FEMALES.—Miss Ann Thropy, Big Amy, Polly Gamy, Charlotte Ann, Sally Vation, Carry On, Mr. Lady, Sophy Stry, Una Vailing, Bet Rayer, Vic Timise, Fan Tastical, etc.

BEST.—The best thing to give your enemy is forgiveness; to your opponent, tolerance; to a friend, your heart; to your child, a good example; to a father, deference; to your mother, conduct that will make her proud of you; to yourself, respect; to all men, charity.

COMPASSION WASTED.—Two young ladies were examining a statuette of Andromeda, labeled, "executed in Terra Cotta." "Executed in Terra Cotta," says one; "where is that?" "I am sure I don't know," returned the other; "but I pity the poor girl, wherever it was."

A friend remarked the other day that there was a storm brewing. "What kind of a storm do you think it will be?" "Well, I think a 'all storm.'"

WANTED.—A fresh covering for the bells that have pealed.

"Buy Bulwer's last work?" said a sharp newsboy, the other day, to a gentleman on the ferry-boat. "No," said the man; "I'm Bulwer himself."

"Well, buy the 'Women of England,' Sir; you're not Mrs. Ellis, are you?"

A young candidate for the legal profession was asked what he would do first when employed to bring an action. "Ask for money on account," was the prompt reply. He passed.

GOOD MEN TO ATTEND AUCTIONS.—Men whose faces are forbidding.

ONE BAD THING ABOUT GOLD.—Not having it.

A school-girl went through her calisthenic exercises at home for the amusement of the children. A youthful visitor, with interest and pity on his countenance, asked her brother "if that gal had fits?" "No," replied the lad, contemptuously, "that's gymnastics." "Oh, 'is, hey?" said verdaunt; "how long has she had 'em?"

OUR NEAREST OF KIN.—Mosquitoes. They are our blood relations.

"Sambo, did you ever see the Catskill Mountains?" "No, Clem; but I've seen the cats kill mice."

A CHEAP PRESENT.—Giving the lie.

AMOR PATRIÆ.

BUFFLETON. "Who's that?"

SNUFFLETON. "Well, I hardly know; she lives close by. Half American and Half French, I'm told."

DEFINITION OF A LOVER.—A lover has been pithily described as a man who, in his anxiety to obtain possession of another, has lost possession of himself.

An orthodox divine, in the town of P—, in this State, who was in the habit of playing with his notes while the choir were singing, accidentally dropped them in a crack in his desk. After trying for some time to recover them without success, he arose, and addressed the congregation as follows: "My dear friends, I brought my notes with me this morning—have got them into this provoking crack and can't get them out—but I will read two chapters in the book of Job, which are worth two such sermons, if I had them."

A small boy stepped into a book-store and inquired the price of a spelling-book. On being told that they were twelve cents apiece, and being possessed of but nine cents, he was completely nonplused. At length an idea seemed to have struck him. Says he, "Mister, can't you find me one that is torn that you will let me have for nine cents?"

The clerk looked in vain. The boy was dispirited. At length another idea seemed to strike him. "Please, Mister, can't you tear one?"

MAXIMS.

[BY IVAN THE IMMORALIST.]

To Intending Elopers.—Don't run away, when staying will do as well.

With fair words butter some parsons.

Never do any thing of which you would be ashamed—when any one is looking.

Consider your wife as an angel—a recording angel.

Never speak ill of a friend, as one day you may be seen walking with him.

QUITE RIGHT.—The gentleman who, a week or two back, "spoke against time" at a public meeting, has been obliged to apologize.

WEATHER WISE.—Always be particular in observing where the wind drops; you may be called on to raise it at a moment's notice.

MAN WHO HAS A TURN FOR MUSIC.—An organ-grinder.

Why is a New York omnibus like a lithograph?—Because it's drawn on stone.

CAUTION.—Ladies who wear long dresses, and dislike their being trampled on, should wear upon their backs a card with the inscription, "No followers allowed."

A TRANCE ACTION.—Walking in one's sleep.

TO REFORMERS.—The man who would "mend the age" must put a "stitch in time."

The only tolerated murderers are the lady-killers.

HUB BUB.—A Boston boy.

POPULAR NETS AT SARATOGA.—Brunettes.

An exchange says the great demand for microscopes is occasioned by the ladies desiring to use them in finding the latest style of bonnets.

AN ACT OF GRATE POLITE-NESS.—Polishing a stove.

A VOUCHER.—A man once went to purchase a horse of a Quaker.

"Will he draw well?" asked the buyer.

"Thee will be pleased to see him draw."

The bargain was concluded, and the farmer tried the horse, but he would not stir a step. He returned, and said, "That horse will not draw an inch."

"I did not tell thee that he would draw, friend; I only remarked that it would please thee to see him draw, and so it would me, but he would never gratify me in that respect."

An enthusiastic old fellow and his wife recently visited Niagara Falls. They worshiped the Falls all day from the piazza in front of their room, and retired talking over its wonders. At an early hour next morning the old gentleman was on the qui vive, and as soon as he saw the Falls again he sang out, "Wife! wife! I'll be durned if the water ain't still gurned over the dam!"

Is a mantua-maker amenable to law for hooking ladies' dresses?

ALL READY CUT AND DRIED.—Sandwiches at a railway station.

The embroidery is worked in green, yellow, and red silk twist, with fine black and fine Turkish braid. Another illustration gives the pattern of a quarter of the cover with the design for the embroidery. On each piece of red cloth the points are embroidered in point Foot-Stool.

THE foundation of this foot-stool consists of a round flat cushion four inches in height by ten in diameter, which is shown in the illustration, with a round cover of blue silk, 21 inches in diameter and scalloped on the outer edge. Four slits, each two inches long, are cut in the edge of the cover at regular intervals, and the edges of these four slits are also scalloped. The silk cover is embroidered in the manner shown by the illustration, and consists of four large flaps, which are made of crescent-shaped pieces of red and white cloth, and embroidered in point russe with green, yellow, and red silk twist. The four flaps are joined in pairs by means of a similarly embrorusse with yellow, green, and orange-colored silk, the long fringe-like stitches with yellow silk in long chain stitches, which are fastened by means of an additional short stitch. On the white pieces of cloth the points are worked with orange, green, and red silk, the long stitches with the orange. Every single piece of cloth is scalloped, and a steel bead is sewed on each scallop. On the point between the flaps the long stitches are worked alternately with green, red, and orange silk. A small ball of red wool is arranged on the point of each point as well as on each flap. An illustration gives still another design for the central part of the cushion. This is worked in appliqué and chain stitch.

MARRIAGE VERSUS CELIBACY.

THERE is no room for doubt that the married life is higher than the celibate. Churchmen, for some reasons not easily to be comprehended by those who are not students of theology, exalt the single life, and assert that wedded happiness, as a rule, is incompatible with saintliness. St. Elizabeth of Hungary affords, however, a very sufficient reply to this objection; and the lives of the many hundreds of good women who adorn modern society confirm all that can be advanced by her admirers, to the fullest extent. Yet valuable though it undoubtedly is, and high though the aims and aspirations of those who enter upon it may be, it were well that it should not be lightly undertaken. Mr. Kingsley, among some other crotchets, has a fancy that it is the duty of every man to marry as early as he possibly can. Other writers, of possibly greater authority, have taken a different view. Sir Walter Raleigh, for example, expresses an opinion that no man ought to marry before the age of thirty; "for as the younger times are unfit, either to choose or to govern a wife and family, so, if thou stay long thou shalt hardly see the education of thy children." The same view has been taken by a vast number of writers on the subject since Sir Walter's time, and it must be indorsed by every one who reflects on the condition of things in the present day. It is not until about that age that nine men in ten have learned to "know their own minds;" or, what is in some cases of even greater importance, it is not until then that they have the means of properly supporting the wife of their choice. A long engagement is not a matter for much dread. Two young people who love one another are not likely to go very far astray, provided only that their principles are sound, and that their education has been decently cared for. The pause will be well filled up if the expectant bride busies herself in acquiring a knowledge of household matters, in which, to say the truth, women in this nineteenth century of ours are sometimes lamentably deficient. But, after all, a man does not want to marry a cook or a housekeeper. He wants a wife; in which word may be summed up all the perfections of the feminine nature. In the oft-quoted words of Jeremy Taylor, "A good wife is Heaven's last, best gift to man; his angel and minister of graces innumerable; his gem of many virtues; his casket of jewels. Her voice is sweet music; her smiles his brightest day; her kiss the guardian of his innocence; her arms the pale of his safety, the balm of his health, the balsam of his life; her industry his surest wealth, her economy his safest steward, her lips his faithful counselors, her bosom the softest pillow of his cares, and her prayers the ablest advocate of Heaven's blessing on his head." The words of the good bishop are as true now as ever they were, and to them it is impossible to add any thing.

SERENADE.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

SLEEP, Darling, sleep!
The dark is deep;
Orion mounts his guard to keep;
And crystal-clear
From sphere to sphere
The spaces open: Dearest, sleep!

Sleep, Heart's Delight!
The shadowy flight
Of silent hours rounds into light;
O'er lucent rims
One planet swims
To heavens of silence through the night.

Up from the deeps
In flashing heaps
The midnight tide its music sweeps;
The tuneful tone
With drowsy drone
Across thy slumber croons and creeps.

So sleep, sweet Saint!
My words are faint,
My wishes fail thy bliss to paint;
Diviner powers
Shall shape thine hours,
And God Himself shall keep His Saint.

And, sleeping, dream!
Around thee stream
Heaven's visionary veiling gleam!
Sleep, while I wake,
And, sleeping, take
My song, and so forever dream!

METAPHORICAL CORNS.

THERE are a great many people, kind enough at heart, who are unconsciously responsible for a good deal of human torture. These apparently are of opinion that that complex structure, known as man, woman, or child, is composed solely of flesh and blood. The wounding of the one or the spilling of the other is all that constitutes, according to their notion, human cruelty. Happiness consists, they think, in a body well fed, clothed, and protected against injury. All the ills that flesh is heir to appear to them but so many corporeal ailments, for which remedies are to be found in every apothecary's shop. They would have us believe that "The sovereign'st thing on earth

Was parmaceti for an inward bruise."

Such people are often endowed with a benevolent disposition. They are, in fact, not seldom found among the most liberal ante and post mortem patrons of dispensaries, hospitals, and other institutions for the cure of bodily disease. They are, moreover, frequently possessed of the tenderest sensibility to bodily pain, and the quickest sympathy with the suffering it inflicts. Generally themselves of a hearty animal robustness, they have the nicest regard for ease and comfort, and are careful neither to suffer nor to inflict a corporeal hurt. Here, however, their benevolence ends, and seemingly unconscious of the existence of a human spirit, or, at any rate, of its capability of being bruised, they are constantly hurting it in the dark, or making it the open butt, as if it were an insensible thing, of their rude blows or tearing shots.

There is many a person who, fastidiously careful to keep off his neighbor's real corns, is constantly treading on his metaphorical ones. Yet the sensibility to pain of the latter is infinitely greater than that of the former. There is a dame we know of such delicate sympathy with corporeal suffering that she will faint at a pin-scratch of a neighbor's finger, but not hesitate to touch on the very raw of her sensibility with the sharpest lash of scandal. Her tenderness in the first case may be very woman-like, but it is worse than useless; and the want of it in the second, though deemed feminine too, is not necessarily so, but is positively cruel and hurtful. Women are far less regardful of each other's feelings than might be inferred from their natural gentleness of disposition. They are not so much disposed men to lessen the obvious social distinctions which exist even in our land of supposed equality. How quickly one woman shows her consciousness of the presence of an humbler sister! There is an unmistakable indication, though not easily expressed in words, which flashes at once upon the face of the superior dame at the first glimpse of a sham fur, a cotton lace, or any other evidence of relative poverty. The ill-concealed scorn, moreover, is at once felt—for none so soon to feel as well as give offense as women—by its unfortunate object, whose womanly sensibility is quick to suffer.

Again, what unnecessary torture women inflict by a superfluous exhibition of their superior advantages in the face of those who may be less fortunate! How "my" cashmere, "my" French bonnet, and "my" carriage and pair, are made to display their splendor, wave their feathers, and step their paces again and again, before the startled eyes of the poor cousin, humble dependent, or chance visitor! These wounds are inflicted most often thoughtlessly, and therefore it is well to remind our dames, young and old, that they should be careful in their course through life to avoid not only treading upon the real, but the "metaphorical corns."

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Clothes and Little Stitches.

MY DEAR TOM,—Shall we have a few words upon dress this fine morning, for I observed yesterday in church that you had donned the fall fashions, as they are called; and—I hope I may be forgiven—but as I watched you the good parson's voice seemed to subside into a kind of dreamy hum, and I asked myself who is it that invents the fashions, and what is the necessity that causes us all to submit to the fashionable law? You have remarked, of course, that it is curious how painfully a certain part of the world conforms to the changes in dress, and yet in what light esteem that same part holds the worthy artificers who enable it to conform. The contemptuous proverb alleges that a tailor is but the ninth part of a man; now the tailor is certainly the most important of all the artists who are responsible for that kind of personal appearance which depends upon clothes, much more important, for instance, than the shoemaker or the hatter. But St. Crispin is an honored saint despite the ne sutor, or the unhandsome Latin proverb which advises the shoemaker to stick to his last. And is it because the hatter covers the crown or superior part of the man that he is free from the obloquy that rests upon his brother craftsman who garnishes the body and legs?

The art of tailoring, I confess, never seems to me so historically impressive as when I read of the Merchant Taylor's Company in London. I am not sure that it is not also called Worshipful, and I am quite sure that it is worshiped. Hogarth somehow invests the profession with dignity. But if you ask me how, I can make no better answer than that his two famous apprentices always seem to me to have been bound to Merchant Taylors. It is a Merchant Taylor's daughter that the good young man marries, and a Merchant Taylor that he becomes. He also spells cloth with an a, and clothes in that Merchant Taylor's books are always clothes. Yet, however closely you and I, my dear Tom, might study that Taylor's work, or indeed that of any of our immediate fellow-citizens here in the great city, I doubt if we could find any good reason for the change of fashion in clothes, except the desire of novelty. Why should not George Fox's suit of leather satisfy us? A stout and serviceable suit of leather, renewed when it became necessary by being cut upon the same pattern, why would not that answer? And what an enormous vexation of soul, and what vast expense it would save us all!

There is our young friend Alcibiades, to whom I was writing only the other day, and whose life is a kind of heroic pursuit of this phantom of fashion. It tasks all his acuteness of observation to keep pace with the changing forms of shirt collars: now upright, now turned over; now rounded at the corners, now pointed; now very long in front, now very short; but whatever the change, a momentous matter. So with cravats. What exercise and even torment of mind in respect of color and size, and the form of the knot and the breadth of the ends! I really believe that Alcibiades would rather be seen nodding in church than wear at a ball a cravat with long ends when cravats with short ends were worn by the models of fashion. And you may proceed step by step through the costume of that worthy youth, and at every step you shall find some point which arrests his attention and secures his most anxious thought. His sister Aspasia said to him one day, as she told me: "I wish I were a man, so that I need have no bother about my dress!" His only but impressive reply was, "Aspasia, I have been trying all the morning to decide upon a proper plaid for a pair of trousers." And again he observed, with the gravity that the matter demanded: "The very limitation of color and form makes a man's dress a subject of very much more consideration than a woman's."

It is indeed surprising, and Alcibiades says, sadly, that it is positively painful, to remark how little women know of a man's dress. Of course, if he wears a bright purple cravat with a bright blue waistcoat, their delicate eye is offended; but I doubt if they can distinguish the morning from the evening waistcoat, or know when to wear peg-tops or splay-bottoms is to be out of the fashion. Yet they know, as I shall show you presently, when a man is properly dressed, although without comprehending the details. If, when bob-skirts are the thing, Alcibiades should by any chance—it could not happen, but I suppose it—appear in a long drapery, Aspasia would see that he was not right, while she would be unable to designate where he was wrong. "How contemptible it is to see a man giving his whole mind to his cravat!" exclaimed Melpomene Jones to me one day when Alcibiades passed and bowed. And the remark suggested to me this other and curious reflection, that while every body, Melpomene Jones with the worst of us, is properly obedient to the fashion, yet if any body is too obedient, if he becomes a devotee, an over-dressed woman, or a dandy, he does become liable to exactly the epithet of condemnation that Melpomene employed.

There was, for instance, Tyrtaeus Squid, afterward one of the most honored and honorable of our statesmen. How his early eloquence kindled the hearts and imaginations of those of us who were then young! How ennobling was his influence upon thousands of those who had never seen him, who knew him only as an influence and a power, as a man who restored the hope of a golden age, and who, like Goldsmith's pastor, allured to brighter realms and led the way! We all had Squid's autograph; we all read every word of Squid's orations; we all vaguely imitated Squid. But when one day some fortunate companion who had been to the happy city in which he lived, when we all eagerly asked for personal details of our idol, remorselessly replied, "Gentlemen, Tyrtaeus Squid wears the best-fitting coat of any man in Columbiopolis," the blank dismay that fell upon our souls was comical. That Squid should be thoughtful of his clothes, possibly a dandy, was so totally destructive of the ideal we had formed that I have never forgotten it. I learned in that moment, my dear Tom, that a too careful devotion to dress is a fatal weakness. Moreover, it can not be disguised, and if we have it, we must inevitably pay the penalty.

Or look at old Mrs. Mountain! There is a belaced, beribboned, bejeweled matron of seventy. She wears the bonnet of a Parisian grisette of eighteen. She wears such dresses as would become Aspasia; and she is so decorated in every way that the boys in the street turn and laugh at her. She springs and trips as well as she can. She says, with a ghastly gay toss of her old head, "I don't see why people should grow old." She studies the fashions and contrives trimmings and all the rest of it as if she were a dress-maker's apprentice; and every extravagant fashion appears first upon her poor old body. My dear Tom, it is not laughable, it is too melancholy. When I behold those old limbs tottering along, bedizened in all that finery, lace and ribbons seem to me an abomination, and artificial flowers the unpardonable sin. Peter Paul Pry exclaims, when she is out of hearing, "Get thee to a nunnery!"—and what can I do but cry Amen! Isn't that a dreadful spectacle? Could there be any more pitiful warning of the abject folly of devotion to fashion? Think of it, my dear Tom. She is a woman—but think of it!

But don't fall into the other abyss. The alternative is not Mrs. Mountain or Meg Merrilies; no, nor Madge Wildfire. I know sinners in the other extreme, both men and women. I know slovens who have dirty hands, and greasy clothes, and untidy shoes, and who say, with an air of lofty virtue, that they hate to be all the time thinking of their appearance; that it makes them vain, and is a wicked waste of time and substance. Indeed, my dear, I reply, if you say so, with those shoes and that dowdy gown, you merely wear a virtue to serve the devil in. Better a dandy than a sloven. My dear Tom, do you know why Bob Roberts and his wife separated? It was a great scandal, and every body, not knowing any thing, violently took sides. If you listened to one party Robert Roberts was the most infamous scoundrel that ever ruined a woman's happiness. If you trusted the other, Dorothy Roberts was the most tremendous Tartar that ever nagged an honest man's soul out of him. Turning to the right, Bob Roberts was the most surly and ill-tempered brute that ever infested a nuptial bower. Turning to the left, there were few saints since Anthony of Padua to be compared with the meek and long-suffering Robert Roberts. I think that I never knew Mrs. Grundy to be more exercised. But the wretched old woman could discover nothing whatever. To this day she has a hundred theories of that separation; but, thank Heaven! she knows nothing whatever. But I do know, and so shall you.

Robert and Dorothy were married, and every thing went smoothly and sweetly for a little while; until it began very slowly to dawn upon Dorothy's mind that her beloved Bob was very disorderly and not exactly neat. His dressing-room was a chaos. Every part of the house into which he went seemed to have been visited by an earthquake. Old stumps of cigars were in that house like seventeen-year locusts in the year of their return. And what he did, he encouraged his companions to do. Dorothy remonstrated sweetly but uselessly. "Oh, what's the odds, Dorothy? Don't vex your soul about my little comfortable ways. Don't let us be always upon parade." If she mildly suggested that such universal disorder was not only very distasteful and offensive to her, but that it took too much of her time to smooth up after him, Bob laughed in a jolly way and replied, "My dear, hen's time ain't nothing." So it went on, a very wearing and perilous friction, until the same indifference showed itself in his person. He wore the queerest old clothes; the shabbiest hats; his coats were out of fashion; his cravats and trowsers were painfully unlike those of other people. Grace, taste, almost decency, gradually disappeared. If Dorothy protested, she received for answer, "Drat the fashion! What are clothes for? You women always want men to be Brummels. You think of nothing but fashion, fashion, fashion."

"Well, but, Robert, I don't want you to be a dandy; but why be so unlike other men? Why not take a little pains?"

"Oh, Lord! I don't care."

"But I do; it troubles me and annoys me."

"Then don't let it."

"It isn't a matter of will, but of taste. A little change would cost you no trouble, and would be a great relief to me."

"Oh, you silly girl!"

This, you see, was the jolly modern Blue Beard: a great, selfish, contemptible lout, who would not renounce a single whim or habit even to please his wife. If Dorothy had tumbled overboard, and he could have saved her by reaching out a hand to her—I think he would have done it. But if it were evident that he must jump in all over and struggle for it—I don't feel so sure of it.

So it went on day after day. He stuck little nails in her shoes, as it were, for her to step upon. He put thorns in her clothes. He tripped her with invisible threads every where about the house. It was evident that there was some grave trouble in the Roberts household, but it was a mystery. "Bob is a little queer," said Mrs. Grundy, "but that's nothing. You may depend upon it that that quiet little Dorothy is a domestic snapping-turtle, and, for my part, I don't wonder that Bob can't bear it forever." The simple truth was that Bob would always dress offensively to his wife, would be personally unclean, would tumble the house into disorder continually, and to her remonstrances, which she knew to be reasonable, merely returned, "Pooh! pooh!" and "You silly girl!" for an answer. Dorothy saw that her husband loved himself very much more than he loved her; that he was a mere selfish boor, who would not yield a single fancy of his own to her evident wish, and who could see her forever vexed and worn by a hundred little things which he could easily have corrected, and which, if it cost effort to correct, he should not have spared it; and at last she said, "Very well! if you don't care enough about me to gratify any innocent wish of mine, while you expect me to sacrifice all my tastes and wishes to you, you shouldn't have asked me to marry you."

Bob's "Silly girl!" was not an adequate answer to that, but it was all he had to offer. Dorothy went home to her father's, and Robert to this day does not clearly understand why. "I really think," he once said to me, "that Dorothy left me because I don't dress in the fashion."

"Oh no, Bob!" said I; "but a man who resists personal cleanliness, domestic order, and the thousand nameless details of daily conduct, against the tastes, protests, and instincts of his wife, pricks her to death with pins."

Dress, you see, my dear Tom, is really manner. Our dressing is part of our manners upon the road. Our road is life. When you marry an even-tempered and sensible woman, and she asks you not to leave your cigar stumps upon the drawing-room mantle, and not to make yourself conspicuous either by dressing out of the fashion, or by giving your whole mind to your tailoring, is it too much of a favor for your High Mightiness to grant your slave?

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CRINOLINE.

THE rumor that crinoline is about to be discarded is untrue. The manufacturers are kept busy at work in filling the large orders of the dealers, thus proving that they at least are convinced that the reign of crinoline, and its fashionable adjunct the panier, will be a long one—as for the health and comfort of women we hope that it may. A return to the old fashion of wearing several heavy skirts instead of a light, flexible, supporting hoop, would be almost intolerable.

SHAPE OF CRINOLINE.

On visiting the factories and comparing the different styles of skirt worn since the revival of crinoline in 1856, we agreed with the proprietors that the shape to be introduced for the next season is admirable. In the first place, it is slightly larger than the shape worn during the summer. The heavy materials of winter clothing make this necessary. The panier fullness at the back is made to curve gracefully, instead of bulging out suddenly. The front of the skirt is perfectly straight, fitting smoothly over the figure, while in the back is a gradually sloping train, flaring out at the edge just enough to avoid coming in contact with the heels.

SIZE.

Promenade skirts, to be worn with short dresses, will be from two and a quarter to two and a half yards in circumference, for ladies of medium height. Skirts worn with trains on full dress occasions measure three yards and a half.

OPEN FRONTS.

The new open fronts, or "winged" skirts, are the novelty of the season. They give complete freedom for every motion, walking, sitting, dancing, or stepping in and out of a carriage. The upper part of the skirt is laced together, then comes a few hoops, and below there is the open winged front. It is an impossibility for the feet to become entangled in this skirt, as the limbs are free from hoops in front from the knee down. A spiral spring has been invented to hold the steels securely around the curved opening. This open front may be applied to any hoop, but the one with which we were especially pleased is called the "Winged-Lace" Skirt. The net or lace is similar to that used in the "Imperial Lace" Skirt, but of closer mesh. There are eighteen pliable hoops. The tournure is graceful. The skirt slopes toward the bottom, measuring eighty-five inches in circumference. The retail price is $3. This skirt may be put in the tub and washed thoroughly.

The Zephyrina Empress is a round skirt, slightly trained, and especially adapted to the short walking-dress. There are twenty-five exceedingly light hoops. The broad tapes are woven to receive the springs, which are of flexible, well-tempered steel. Two rivets in each tape hold the steel securely. The lower part of the skirt is lined or covered with muslin. The "winged zephyr" is larger, and has a more decided train, to be worn with full dress. A patented eyelet fastening penetrates the tape and the steel spring, holding them more securely than a rivet. Price $3 50. A walking-skirt à panier, called the "New Era," has a closed front. The panier curve is simply but perfectly formed by several springs almost contiguous to each other in front, but expanded to six or seven inches behind. The "Twin Spring," or indestructible skirt, derives its name from having two springs woven together in each hoop. In the fifteen hoops there are thirty springs.

The Duplex Elliptic skirt comes next on our list. The name Duplex is given because the steels in each hoop are double. The title Elliptic refers to the shape. We also saw a new walking-skirt made after the French model, with but few hoops at the hip and a great many at the bottom, or exposed portions of the skirt. This skirt may be bought with the panier shape very full at the back and beginning to enlarge just back of the point of the hip, or it may be plainly sloped, and supplied with a spiral panier to support the hoop and give the panier effect.

An excellent skirt, known as the Self-Adjusting, or Colby, has vertical wires, fastened by hinges to the lower hoop. This skirt is remarkably pliable, conforming as readily to the position of the wearer as an ordinary muslin skirt. It is very light, made of well-tempered steel, and is said to be very durable. A short skirt is sold at $2 75. Elaborate trains cost from $3 to $6.

FRENCH HOOPS.

The crinoline imported by modistes for their most exclusive customers are much more expensive than the American skirts. French skirts are always made of muslin, and contain only from five to ten hoops. A panier bustle is a part of each skirt, the hips are merely covered by muslin without springs, and the greater number of hoops, seldom more than ten, are between the hip and knee. There is usually an arrangement to lace the whole skirt back of the figure, leaving the front straight and plain. A skirt covered with net, in which the springs are woven, is marked $20. Another, of muslin, has a gored cover, trimmed with fluted ruffles. The cover may be buttoned on below, and will serve as a petticoat. This is an excellent idea for stout ladies with large hips, as the bulk is not increased by petticoats. Price $18. Another Parisian skirt, of very graceful shape, is covered with cambric around the outer edges, while the waist and hips have only tapes, with straps and buckles, by which the skirt may be shortened or lengthened for street dresses or for trains; $10 is the price. An American skirt has the front width without springs, and buttoned down the centre.

Muslin skirts, or those covered with net, are to be commended above the skeleton hoops, so productive of accident. Covers of muslin buttoned on the lower part of the skirt are absolutely necessary with the skeleton skirt. These covers do not fit every skirt, and are very clumsy-looking if badly fitted, consequently a set of covers must be made for each skirt. Net and muslin skirts are free from this objection.

PANIER.

We are constantly asked if paniers will be worn this winter, and which is the best style. They will certainly continue in vogue. There are at least twenty different patterns from which to choose. We advise our readers to buy a panier skirt with the tournure forming part of the skirt, as this is less complicated, and does away with the necessity of having two belts about the waist. If a separate panier is worn we think those made of puffed hair-cloth give the most natural contour to the figure. They are soft, round, and yielding, and by enlarging the appearance of the hips make the waist look much smaller. As hair-cloth is expensive, an excellent panier is made of muslin with flexible whalebones running from the waist downward, held in the position by tapes underneath. These are sold at $1. Hair-cloth paniers cost from $1 50 to $2. Spiral-spring bustles are used beneath the hoop to support it, and give the panier effect to old style skirts. A variety of other paniers are made with steel springs, to be worn outside of the crinoline. The Bon-ton, one of the best of these, is very full at the back, with the necessary graduated slope on the sides. The price varies from $1 to $2, according to the size.

CORSETS.

The subject of tight lacing has received much attention of late from English journals of fashion, but no new or definite conclusions have been arrived at. There are earnest advocates of small waists produced by systematic compression, while their opponents declaim against any kind of stays, believing them to be the source of physical discomfort and confirmed ill health. Common-sense, we think, is opposed to tight lacing. A properly fitted corset, not tightly laced, however, is a support to the body, improves the figure, and is not injurious to health.

Ladies should make it a rule to have their corsets made to order, instead of purchasing those ready-made. The ordinary cheap corset has neither beauty of contour nor compactness of construction. The steel busks are too narrow to support the figure or form a proper foundation for the front of the corset, and are often made of steel of so low a quality that it breaks easily. In giving an order for corsets it is necessary to send the measure around the chest below the arms, from beneath the arm to the hip, the circumference of the hips, and the waist measure.

French women, who are very particular about their figures, have their corsets made in three pieces, laced at the sides as well as the back. The busks and whalebones at the back are very long. An authority in matters of fashion says that the waist may vary from seventeen to twenty-three inches, according to the general proportions of the figure. There can never be a prescribed size for the waist, since fashion changes the length and position of it. A line drawn halfway between the hip and the lowest rib gives the point at which the tapering waist reaches its smallest dimensions. The panier as now worn produces the appearance of a small waist.

The material of the corset should be very firm and strong. Flimsy and elastic materials soon stretch out of shape. Fine coutil is expensive, but it is economy to buy it as it wears well. The corset should be large enough to meet in the back.

The popular glove-fitting corset is worthy of commendation. It is made without gores, and cut on a correct principle, by which a perfect fit is obtained. It consists of three pieces; the bust, waist, and hips are cut separately. The spring-latch fastening is a great improvement on the old-fashioned clasps. The lower hook is constructed with a spring, which is pressed on the latch opposite, adjusting the other hooks and studs in a moment. The busks, of flexible steel, adapt themselves to every undulation of the figure. The price ranges from $3 50 to $7.

An imported corset, that took a prize at the Paris Exposition, has a hundred whalebones. A French corset, called the "Bride's Own," is made of glossy coutil that looks like satin. It is edged with Cluny lace and insertion. Price $12. Others are embroidered with white and with scarlet. Imported corsets are also made of kid and morocco. Perfumed corsets are also made in London: these are moulded by steam, and are very flexible. Gauze corsets for ladies in hot climates are also made.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A new spiral bosom pad is a good design, but is objectionable on account of being partly made of rubber. Very natural-looking busts are made of wire netting, in a solid piece covering the front from arm-pit to arm-pit. A muslin cover conceals the wire. It is held in position by elastic shoulder-straps and belt. Price $1 50.

Garters impede circulation and injure the shape of the limb, especially when worn below the knee. A growing child should never be allowed to wear them. An excellent stocking, supporter consists of an elastic waistband with two long tapes on each limb connected with an elastic strap at the knee which is buttoned to the stocking. It is made in different sizes for ladies and children. Price seventy-five cents.

PERSONAL.

DR. BELLOW, the first volume of whose charming book of travels has recently been published by the HARPERS, is much in vogue with the clever people of England. The style of his addresses has taken cold English audiences by storm; and sets of people who rarely treat their own speakers to more than a hum of assent, vow that a prophet has come. Dr. B. has been courted by the ablest of English critics, and received the ungrudging homage of the ripest of English scholars.

—Young ROBERT LINCOLN seems determined to carve his own way to fame. His legal practice is larger than he can attend to, and he devotes himself to it with care, industry, and conscientiousness. He is said to be already a good and fluent speaker, and bids fair to take high position in that respect.

—Mr. J. GRAU, by means of his coupons and his suave way of doing things, has secured for the New York market some of the notable drolls of Paris, among them the excellent comic tenor, CARRIER, one of the most brilliant of his order; also M. BECKERS, who to an excellent voice joins culture and consummate acting; also M. BOURGON, a very funny member of the Bouffes Parisiennes; also, and better, he has engaged Mlle. ROSA BELL, the most popular of SCHNEIDER's rivals, with whom she divides the honors of the burlesque, and whom she excels as a singer. Persons of jocular temperament may, therefore, felicitate themselves upon much mirth during winter.

—A report is current that Mrs. HOEY is writing her recollections of the stage. She will be the first American lady to do it, and possesses every qualification to produce an exceedingly entertaining and brilliant book. Mrs. HOEY's immediate successor at Wallack's—Mrs. JENNINGS (née MADELINE HENRIQUES)—is much admired in London for personal beauty, and most delightful social and domestic accomplishments.

—Among the papers of the defunct M. LEON GOZLAN's was found an essay on the characteristics of the women of different countries, so far as love and that noble membrane, the heart, are concerned. A French woman, he says, will love her husband if he is either witty or chivalrous; a German woman, if he is constant and faithful; a Dutch woman, if he does not disturb her ease and comfort too much; a Spanish woman, if he wreaks vengeance on those who incur his displeasure; an Italian woman, if he is dreamy and poetical; a Danish woman, if he thinks that her native country is the brightest and happiest on earth; a Russian woman, if he despises all Westerners as miserable barbarians; an English woman, if he succeeds in ingratiating himself with the Court and the aristocracy; an American woman if—he has plenty of money; which last is inexact. The American woman disdains money.

—Mrs. CADDY STANTON has been on a visit to Mr. GERRIT SMITH, at Peterborough, and writes a pleasant letter about it to her Revolution. In athletics the coming women of Peterborough have already become quite spry. Miss NANNIE MILLER, Mr. SMITH's grand-daughter, is "captivating" of a girls' base-ball club, and on every Saturday afternoon, clad in white dresses and blue ribbons, the club has its game in the public square; young persons of the male species being permitted to look on. Mr. SMITH's place is a very fine one. The house, a spacious one, was built by his father nearly a century ago. About thirty acres of land immediately around it are tastefully laid out in orchards, lawns, gardens, etc. On the banks of the little stream running through, in a quiet and shady nook, stands a mysterious-looking, cone-like tabernacle, covered with bark, with stained-glass windows and a rustic door. In this spot Mrs. SMITH, who is a Spiritualist, comes to commune with the invisible world. Mr. SMITH has for several years been "throwing off the shackles of Calvinistic theology," as Mrs. STANTON phrases it, and embracing a more material philosophy. He is now having a theological discussion with the Rev. ALBERT BARNES on the origin of sin, the limitation of the Divine power, and the authority of the Bible.

—ROSSINI proposes to pass his name down to posterity as founder of a music-school in his native town, Pesaro, to which professors of the first class are to be attached. He has curious notions, this old gentleman: he is especially fond of asparagus, and tells his friends that nothing but asparagus shall be planted over his grave.

—Since Sir ROWLAND HILL retired from the management of the British Post-Office he is beguiling his leisure in literary pursuits, and is now engaged in writing a complete "History of the Post-Office," in aid of which the authorities have placed at his disposal all the official documents of the department.

—The Congressional, gubernatorial, and other WASHBURNs—that is to say, ELIHU, CADWALLADER, CHARLES, SAMUEL, and WILLIAM A. D., who pervade various States of the Republic—have erected a summer residence on the old homestead in Livermore, Maine. The surrounding scenery is superb. The house is large enough to contain all the brothers and their families, who meet there every summer, and remain two or three months, or until the mercury commences to succumb. WASHBURN, pere, now 80 and upward, is well and lively, and convenes with the boys.

—As potentate of a single island, the King of the Sandwich Islands is probably the best paid. They give that royal person $45,000 per annum, which, at the price of beef, vegetables, clothing, iron, etc., etc., is equivalent to $100,000 in this country. The Chief Justice of the Island receives $10,000, and his associates $8000, which is better than we do with Mr. CHASE and his Supreme brethren.

—Mrs. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE is employing her time this hot weather in writing a new novel at her country home in Stockbridge—at which place Mr. DAVID DUDLEY FIELD has a fine house and grounds. The latter are now being artistically graded and ornamented by a select party of fifty laboring gentlemen, who have temporarily exiled themselves from the metropolis for that laudable purpose.

—The reason, probably, why KOSSUTH has been so little heard of during the last few years is, that he has been engaged on a twelve-volume history of Hungary.

—Mr. JOHN BROUGHAM's play of the "Lottery of Life," which had a two months' run at Wallack's, has netted to Mr. BROUGHAM nearly $20,000, which is the best two months' work he has done. Mr. B.'s new theatre in Twenty-fourth Street, near the Fifth Avenue Hotel, is nearly completed, and the company engaged.

—The readers of the Bazar being mainly of the sex designed, happily, to be kissed, the following "personal" incidents relating to that slightly humid but charming contact of the male with the female lip will probably be approved:—GILBERT STUART, the portrait-painter, is said to have met a lady in the streets of Boston, who accosted him: "I Mr. STUART, I have just seen your likeness and kissed it, because it was so much like you." "And did it kiss you in return?" "Why, no." "Then," said the gallant painter, "it was not like me."—The Rev. SYDNEY SMITH's idea of how the feat should be accomplished was this: "We are in favor of a certain amount of shyness when a kiss is proposed, but it should not be too long; and when the fair one gives it, let it be administered with warmth and energy—let there be a soul in it. If she close her eyes and sigh immediately after it the effect is greater. She should be careful not to slobber a kiss, but give it as a humming-bird runs his bill into a honey-suckle—deep but delicate. There is much virtue in a kiss when well delivered. We have the memory of one we received in our mouth which lasted us forty years, and we believe will be one of the last things we shall think of when we die."—At Boulogne, during the reception of Queen VICTORIA, June, 1855, a number of English ladies, in their anxiety to see every thing, pressed with such force against the soldiers who were keeping the line, that the latter, in some instances, were obliged to give way, and generally were—to use the expression of our policemen—"impeded in the execution of their duty." The officer in command, observing the state of affairs, shouted out, "One roll of the drum—if they don't keep back, kiss them all." After the first sound of the drum, the English ladies took to flight. "If they had been French," said a Parisian journal, "they would have remained to a woman."

—The best sketch, in little, of Sir ROBERT NAPIER is contributed to Le Temps by M. LOUIS BLANC, who says: "There is but one opinion as to the ability shown by Sir ROBERT NAPIER—of his consummate prudence, his cool, judicious delay, and the rapidity of his movement when, all his measures being taken, it became necessary to strike the decisive blow. I have had occasion to make the acquaintance of Sir ROBERT NAPIER, to converse with him, and to observe him closely. The idea he at first gives you of him is that of calm power. The first time I ever saw him, what struck me in his person was the gentle expression of his features, the gentleness of his manners, and the softness of his voice. I remember hearing him say that he had always an aversion to sporting, from a repugnance to killing poor, defenseless animals. I know nothing more admirable than the love of humanity in an energetic nature."

—Mrs. HARRIETT PRESCOTT SPOFFORD is said to be near-sighted, tall, domestic-looking, and has for a husband a leading Democratic lawyer of Massachusetts (formerly a partner of CALEB CUSHING), and one of the handsomest men in New England.

—Paris and the rest of this amusement-loving world need not be anxious about the "coming artists;" for it is said that there are now in the Paris Conservatory two girls who will surpass, the one RACHEL, and the other Mlle. MARS. The tragic actress is Mlle. D'HERICOURT, a tall, majestic, well-made girl, of extraordinary beauty. The successor to Mlle. MARS is a fascinating blonde of great beauty. Both have taken the highest prizes at the Conservatory.

—Prince NAPOLEON is reported to keep the best private table of any gentleman in Paris. Six cooks conspire daily to please the princely palate, though the Prince himself is said to bend his gustatory energies mainly to roast beef and fried potatoes. His wife eats more ice-cream than any thing else, though her physicians tell her to abstain. She does not abstain. The kitchen of Queen VICTORIA costs, for "help," about the same as Prince NAPOLEON's, viz., $28,000 per annum. The chief cook has $3600, gold; the three maitres d'hotel, or stewards, $1800 each.

The chief cook has the privilege of taking four apprentices, whose premiums vary from $600 to $800.

—That most charming of letter-writers, "IRENÆUS," in a recent communication gives the following pleasant "personal" of GOETHE. "IRENÆUS" was wandering in an old grave-yard in Frankfurt, and came to one grave covered with wreaths and flowers, on the head-stone of which was cut:

"THE GRAVE OF THE MOTHER OF GOETHE.
BORN FEB. 19, 1731. DIED SEP. 13, 1808."

It was her request that this inscription should be put upon her head-stone. The mother's pride is in it, but so beautiful and so just! No man of this century has wrought himself more thoroughly into the German mind; and only one writer has led captive more minds in the world at large than JOHANN WOLFGANG VON GOETHE, whose mother lies under this brick wall, with deep shade trees hanging over her grave and fresh flowers lying on it, though she was laid here sixty years ago. "From my dear little mother," said the poet in one of his poems, "I derive my happy disposition and my love of storytelling." And she said of herself, "Order and quiet are my characteristics. I dispatch at once what I have to do, the most disagreeable always first, and I gulp down the devil without looking at him. I always seek out what is good in people, and leave what is bad to Him who made mankind and knows how to round off the angles."

If this last sentence had been put on her tomb-stone, and had thus become a popular maxim for the German and the Yankee mind also, it would be a blessed addition to our household literature. The beauty and goodness of the trait of character thus charmingly expressed commend themselves, but the trait is one that we are always ready to admire in others, very slow to imitate. If this saying of GOETHE's mother could be told in all the world as a memorial of her, it is quite likely it would do as much for the good of mankind as all that her son ever wrote, though he was the prince of German poets, and the master intellect of the age.

—Mr. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL's library is a small room at the rear of his house, the walls covered with book-shelves, on which are rare editions of the old poets and philosophers; histories, books of sketches and travel, political and literary pamphlets, evincing the variety of their possessor's interest. A large, open, old-fashioned fire-place, surmounted by a high mantle-piece, takes up nearly the whole of one side of the room; before this is a writing-table, whereupon are scattered books, pamphlets, letters, scraps of manuscript, blank paper, pens, and inkstands, by no means primly arranged. You will not fail to observe that pipes, cigars, and other convenient apparatus for smoking are distributed about here and there, hinting to you that LOWELL is wedded to "the weed." It is here usually that he receives his friends, and indeed all who call upon him. The ease of the host's manners, the utter absence of all snobishness, the readiness with which he enters into conversation and brilliantly sustains it, the new ideas which keep coming to the surface, the veritable poetry which constantly characterizes his conversation, and the great extent of his æsthetic learning make the hours pass so swiftly and agreeably that one always deeply regrets the moment for bidding him adieu.

Corsets.

WE call the attention of our readers to the numerous corsets, the patterns and illustrations of which we give in this Number and the accompanying Supplement. The descriptions and illustrations also show the manner of sewing the seams and the most simple and easy way of making the gores; and, together with practical instructions for making every corset pattern given, the proper size for any figure. The illustration of this may be found in the Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 33-39. The contour of the figures (the heavy line) gives the original size of the brown drilling corset; the finer lines outside the contour on Figs. 33, 37, 38, and 39, show on which side and in what manner the pattern may be enlarged; the pattern may also be made smaller on the same side. The front gores may also be made smaller, as shown by the lines on Figs. 34 and 35. In order to know whether the pattern must be enlarged or made smaller, to fit the figure, measure in the same manner as for a dress waist. We have frequently explained how this is done; it remains only to say that the upper width of the corset must be at least an inch wider, and the dress an inch narrower than is given by the measure. The length of the corset is best determined by that of those usually worn. Having obtained the measure, enlarge the pattern, or make it smaller, in the manner shown above, till it is of the same size as the measure. If, however, the corset needs to be very much widened, leave a surplus in addition on the front and back edges. If the pattern be too long or too short, lengthen or shorten it on the upper edge. In cutting attention must be given to the rows of small lines (≡≡≡) which are seen on the pieces, and are marked thread runs lengthwise. The backs must be cut straight on the back edges; on each piece from half an inch to an inch must be allowed for the seams, as the pieces run over and under each other when set together. Cut the upper, under, and front edges according to the pattern; the edges of the back may also be cut according to the contour of the pattern, or allowance may be made for a hem. In the latter case the hem may be stitched through, as shown by the dotted lines, to make a sheath for the whalebones and eyelets; in the former case linen tape of the requisite width is set under. For running in the busk or steel spring, and the whalebone which are not brought under the seam, set on the under side of the corset, along the dotted line, a piece of linen tape of the requisite width, and stitch it down from the right side. The tape sewed on for the steel fastening remains loose on the front edge, and after the busk is run in is fastened with overcast stitches. For the buttons of the busk work button-holes in the outside material in the proper place. In order that the whalebones may be easily run

Stitch the outside without taking up the tape, in order to preserve a neat appearance. If preferred, the whalebones may be fastened by means of long bias stitches, as shown by Fig. 1 on the second page of the Supplement. The back of the corset is usually finished by means of cord ends above the whalebones, which prevent the ends from being seen; these are stitched in as shown by the straight lines on pattern, and by Figs. 1 and 2 on the second page of Supplement. Work the eyelets as shown by the pattern; the cord is drawn tighter or loosened in the manner shown by Fig. 34. In the descriptions of corsets found in the Supplement the peculiarities and advantages of each model are mentioned, and the manner of setting together the pieces and sewing the seams are more particularly described.

Directions for Looping up Dresses. THIS new arrangement for looping up dresses is very simple and convenient. Sew three buttons on the skirt just below the belt, one behind and one at each side. Twenty-two inches below the belt behind, and sixteen inches below it at the sides, make loops, which are worked of silk the color of the dress, and are buttoned over the buttons when the dress is looped up. The distance of the loops below the buttons depends on the length of the skirt. The illustrations show the skirt before it is looped up and the front and back after it has been looped.

See illustration, p. 709.

THE manner of working this alphabet is new. The letters are especially designed for marking pocket-handkerchiefs, as they present precisely the same appearance on both sides. They may be worked with white cotton, colored cotton, or silk. An illustration shows a letter enlarged and worked on canvas, so that the manner of working can be distinctly seen. Each figure of these letters consists of four threads crossed. From the centre take the stitches straight and bias the length of two threads, draw the thread somewhat tightly, so as to form the small hole in the centre.

THIS border is embroidered with fine or coarse thread according to the object for which it is designed. The netted foundation must correspond in fineness. Begin the foundation on one corner, and work in backward and forward rounds, widening one stitch at the end of each round. The foundation may be worked in two ways: either widen till the number of holes is double that required by the width of the border; after which divide the number of stitches into two equal parts and continue to work on each for the sides as far as the next corners, in doing which add a stitch on one side and take off one on the other; work two such halves, which may then be joined to each other; or, net an entire square; after which cut out the inner part and work the inner edges with button-hole stitch, or work the middle portion to correspond with the border. Having completed the foundation, work the outer edge of the border in button-hole stitch in the manner shown in the illustration. Then work the corresponding squares of the foundation in point de toile, and the remainder, with the exception of those squares which form the centre of the flowers, in point d'esprit. The larger and smaller leaves which stand out in raised work on the foundation are worked in point de reprise.

JUST MARRIED.

A NEWLY-MARRIED man is like one who goes about as in a dream. His mind is perplexed, as it were, with a sense of added being. He has evolved out of something something more. He is surprised at finding the people in the streets jog by him with the same stolid indiffer-entism that they manifested before he was married. He imagines that every body must have seen the announcement of his marriage in the papers. Then, again, doesn't he look like a married man? Hasn't he considerably altered within the last few days? He may be wrong, perhaps, but it seems to him that marriage is deserving of more attention than it gets. It's a queer world, he knows, but not so queer as not to allow marriage to be a very queer institution amidst all its queerness. Yet nobody seems to think any thing of it, and particularly of him. His friends have collected round him, and, after their first expressions of congratulation and hopes for the future, have laid no more emphasis upon the subject than if he had been married thirty years. He can't understand it, he confesses. The world in its nonchalance seems to lay no significance at all upon marriage; but were the world to feel like he feels he guesses pretty truly that it would contemplate him with infinitely greater curiosity than it now evinces. Would you have a newly-married man not keenly feel that he has been just born into a completely new world? Let the servant happen to range a pair of his wife's boots alongside of his own: what curious emotions the sight must inspire! If his wife happen to have a little foot and he a big one, no spectacle can be more suggestive. How dependent the little boots look! how protective the big boots! Once having seen the little boots ranged alongside the big boots it would be hard to imagine it possible for the big boots ever to be able to stand alone again. After all, the details that go to make up a young married life are very full of poetry. Let there be but love as a nucleus, and you will find the nebulous surroundings very beautiful and very pure. Still, the life of a newly-married man is very dream-like. The circumstance of a young, lovable creature hanging on his arm and calling him husband may make the fact of matrimony very actual; but there is so much of what is visionary in the new existence, so much of what is new in the present life when contrasted with the life of even a few weeks before, that a man had need to possess, indeed, the vividest perception of the Real, not to suffer himself frequently to sink into a kind of wonder and doubt as to whether things be really as they seem. It is a provision in nature—a startling discovery made by a Scotch usher—that a man must be a bachelor before he can become a married man. Now, as a bachelor, it is inevitable that he should acquire certain habits and forms of thought which it is the business, or, rather, the mission of a wife to modify or to put to flight. It is the abrupt subversion of an accustomed state of being that makes a newly-married man look upon life for a time as a dream. To find himself being constantly reproduced in the presence of his wife may inspire him with much such emotion as may be supposed to have animated the fabled gentleman, who, having accustomed himself to a shadowless existence for some time, suddenly found his shadow restored to him. Oddness may perhaps characterize the aspect with which life presents itself to him. It is odd for him, for instance, to find himself seated face to face with a companion at breakfast; to find the tea-pot being employed by some other hand than his own; to find food set before him of which he had not the ordering; to find the servants no longer appealing to him; setting him aside, in short, as if he were grown suddenly inconceivably inconsiderable. It is odd for him to hear people asking after his wife in his own name, as if the contingency of a Mrs. ever entering into his share of the family name had remained wholly un contemplated. Then nothing can be more odd than the consideration he meets with at the hands of his wife's family—relations who had apparently before despised him, and treated him as if he had been an intruder and a robber. He is somebody now to them; but he can recollect the time when, in their eyes, he was the most emphatic nobody that ever entered a house. And what is very odd to him is the polite way in which he continues to treat these relations who had before abused him so warmly. He can not at all understand why he should, and yet he is constantly doing so. He feels perfectly sure that were they to ask to borrow fifty dollars he would lend it to them; he would tell you his motive was revenge—"nothing humiliates your enemy more than to lend money to him, Sir"—forgetful that, as a rule, men do not give away fifty-dollar bills to gratify a little personal malice, and forgetful, also, that he has taken unto himself a power which is silently and surely working him into all kinds of deeds—making him, in short, fulfill the matrimonial theory with a relentlessness of which there is every chance of his remaining for a long time ignorant. We have considered newly-married people from a man's point of view; we have presumed to say nothing of the emotions and sentiments with which a newly-married girl may be inspired. At all times a man is a far easier study than a woman, but during the marrying period he is ten times more so. You can never get at a woman's thoughts either before or after marriage, especially after; you will, perhaps, be able to tell that she is happy or miserable, but to what extent she is happy or miserable it is given to very few to ascertain. Hence, in the consideration of newly-married people we have discussed only the one with whom we have the liveliest sympathy, satisfied that our fair readers will not misjudge us for not attempting to explain the riddle which it seems their especial mission and delight to reveal to us in their characters, but which, be it said, we sometimes fail to guess correctly.

CORNER OF BORDER IN NET GUIPURE FOR COVERS, PILLOW SLIPS, ETC.

JUDGE NOT.

Do not rashly judge thy brother
If he stumble in the way;
Life's beset with sore temptation,
He has fallen—and we may.

Let us rather kindly help him
To regain the pathway lost;
Gentle words are never wasted,
Freely give—they little cost.

Take good heed unto thy footsteps;
Round thy walk lurks many a snare—
If like him thou shouldst be tempted,
Oh, my brother, watch, beware!

For we grope our way so blindly
Through the darksome shades of life;
And the best will err so often
Mid its tumult, toil, and strife—

That I think it ill becomes us
Thus to judge our brother's case;
Let us wait until we've triumphed,
Standing in the self-same place.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY;

OR, THE

Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh.

CHAPTER VIII.

I FALL INTO DISGRACE.

"T'WAS now late in October, and bleak autumn winds were fast stripping the park and woods of summer foliage. For some time past I had seen but little of Mr. Lestrangle, who spent the greater part of his time out of doors, and left Miss Hemsley free to follow her own pursuits, and to give as much of her company as she pleased to Lady Barbara and myself. She seemed happy with us, after a subdued fashion of her own, but was never beguiled into gaiety; and I could not refrain from the idea that her spirits were oppressed by the sense of a bondage which she had not the courage to shake off.

Mr. Lestrangle, for his part, appeared to take little trouble to secure her good graces. He treated her sometimes with a free-and-easy politeness, sometimes with an ill-concealed anger; and bitter and biting were the speeches which he occasionally addressed to her. His insults she received with a noble dignity; and nothing could be more cold than her acknowledgment of his compliments.

One day, in a moment of vexation against this dear young lady, the gentleman was so ill-advised as to betray his anger to me.

"She hates me," he cried, savagely, "and lets me see that she hates me, and knows that I see it. But what of that? she will marry me all the same. My father means it, and I mean it, and when the time comes her whims and caprices will serve her no more than the fluttering of his wings serves a snared bird. Do you think that weak, timid creature would dare set her will against my father's—her legal guardian and trustee to her fortune—and say no when he says yes? 'Tis all very well to give herself airs and graces with me, but she knows that her fate is as fixed as if she had been bought in the slave-market of Ispahan."

"That is a hard way to talk of a woman whom you pretend to love," said I.

"Who says I pretend to love her? I make no pretense; but I mean to marry her. Mark that, Mr. Ainsleigh, and let no puppy-dog who values his ears come between her and me."

Upon this we came to high words, and might have perhaps proceeded to blows, but were happily interrupted before we came to that extremity.

I can not describe the contempt which I entertained for Everard Lestrangle after this revelation of his character. I held myself as much aloof from him as possible, whereupon he affected to treat me with a haughty distance, and took no pains to conceal the fact that he considered me infinitely his inferior.

He had been absent from Hauteville several times during the summer and autumn, having business which compelled him to go to London, as he informed us; though I judged from his father's offended manner on such occasions that these visits were by no means so necessary as Mr. Lestrangle pretended.

He was absent at the time of my confidential conversation with Lady Barbara, and did not return until the next day, when he affected extreme surprise on hearing of my intended departure.

"And are you going to mount a stool in a scrivener's office, or to try your fortune in trade, Master Bob?" he asked, with a supercilious grin.

"Neither," I replied; "I am going to read for the Bar."

"Indeed! with a view to becoming Lord Chancellor, I suppose?"

"With a view to doing my best to prove myself worthy of the kindness I have received," I answered.

"Heavens! what a starched prig thou art!" cried Mr. Lestrangle; "but I'll warrant when once thou hast thy liberty in London thou wilt waste more time in taverns and run after more milliner girls than the wildest of us. For a thorough-going rakehell I will back Tartuffe against Don Juan, with long odds."

Miss Hemsley also heard of my plans with surprise; and I could not but think that her manner betrayed despondency. Our Spanish studies were abandoned.

"It is not worth while going on," she said; "a week is so soon gone, and you must have so many preparations to make. I fear you will soon forget your Spanish."

"Never; nor yet the kind mistress who taught me," I answered, warmly; and then we both stood silent, confused, and downcast.

"I hope we shall see you sometimes in town; we are to spend the winter there, you know," she said, at last.

"I hope so, dear Miss Hemsley."

"But surely you will come often to St. James's Square?"

"If Lady Barbara bids me, I shall be only too happy to come."

"And you—my aunt's cousin—will wait to be bidden? How ceremonious you have grown all at once!"

"Life has pleasant dreams, dear young lady; but sooner or later the hour comes in which the dreamer awakens."

"What does that mean, Mr. Ainsleigh?" she asked, with a timid, half-conscious smile.

"It means that I have been too happy here, that I have forgotten that the world is wider than this dear place, and that the time has come in which I must bid beloved friends farewell and go out to fight life's battle."

With this I left her, having already said more than I cared to say.

The first half of my last week at Hauteville passed only too quickly. I packed my trunks, which were amply furnished with the clothes supplied by the Warborough tailor, and a box of books, chiefly neat duodecimo volumes of the classics, which Lady Barbara bade me choose from the library.

My good Anthony assisted me to select these, and showed much regret at my approaching departure; while his sour wife expressed only one sentiment, and that a contemptuous surprise that a learned profession should have been chosen for me.

"I suppose you would rather starve as a fine gentleman than grow rich in a city warehouse," she said.

"I prefer a profession which befits my parentage, but have no more desire to become a fine gentleman than I have present fear of starvation," I answered, coldly.

"You carry yourself with a high spirit, Mr. Robert; but I have seen prouder spirits than yours brought to the dust."

As the time for my journey drew near I bethought me that I must bid good-by to my old friends of the warreners' lodge, and I blushed as I remembered how small a place those kind, honest creatures had of late occupied in my thoughts; nor had I seen them many times during the last few months, since I had preferred to absent myself altogether from the cottage rather than to go thither accompanied by Mr. Lestrangle, whose manner of "smoking" me, as he termed it, on a supposed secret attachment between myself and Margery, was to the last degree unpleasant.

When my trunks were packed, and while Everard Lestrangle was in London, whither he had gone suddenly and in hot haste a day or two before, I walked down to the dear old cottage where my childhood was spent. I found my foster-mother alone at her spinning-wheel, from which she rose to greet me. One glance at the familiar face showed me that its natural cheerfulness was exchanged for an anxious gravity, which at once puzzled and alarmed me.

"Oh, Robin, what a stranger thou art!" she cried, as we shook hands.

"And now I have come to bid you good-by, dear mother."

The good soul was grieved to lose me, little as I had of late done to prove myself worthy her affection. She talked of the wonderful change of fortune that had befallen me, and rejoiced in my altered prospects, even though good fortune was to carry me away from old friends.

"I shall always remember thee a babe in my arms, Robin," she said, tenderly. "I may call thee Robin still, may I not? though they tell me thou art called Mr. Ainsleigh at the great house. Jack and I always suspected as much."

"Suspected what, mother?"

"That thou wert Roderick Ainsleigh's son. Why, thou hadst his very face from a baby; and others suspected the same, or knew it, maybe. That is why Martha Grimshaw has always hated thee."

"Why should she hate me for being Roderick Ainsleigh's son?"

"Because she loved Roderick Ainsleigh. Yes, Robin, I was house-maid at Hauteville Hall in those days, and servants sometimes know more than their betters. Martha Peyton was mad for love of Mr. Ainsleigh, and was fool enough to fancy he loved her. I'll not say that he did not make her a fine speech now and then, or steal a kiss when he chanced to meet her in the corridor, but 'twas no more than such court as any fine gentleman may pay to his sweetheart's waiting-maid; and Roderick Ainsleigh had neither good nor evil thoughts about Martha, who was no beauty at the best of times. But she took it all seriously, and was always hanging about wherever her lady's cousin was to be met, and would run a mile to open a door to him; and when his marriage with Lady Barbara was talked of in the servants' hall Martha would laugh and say nobody would ever dance at that wedding. But one day she said something to Mr. Ainsleigh that let him know she thought he was paying serious court to her, and he burst out laughing, and told her the truth—that he had given her kisses and compliments and guineas because he wanted her good word with her mistress. I came upon him in the corridor as he was saying this, and saw Martha's face; 'twas black as thunder. She stood fixed like a statue on the spot where he left her, staring like one that was struck blind or foolish, and after this time I never saw her speak to Mr. Ainsleigh. If she met him she dropped him a low courtesy, and passed on. And I think from this time she began to plot mischief against him. When she found she couldn't have him herself, she was determined nobody else should have him."

"Why didn't you warn Lady Barbara?"

"I warn her? Do you think she would have suffered me to talk of her business? and could I turn informer against a fellow-servant? You don't know what the servants' hall is. Besides, I didn't think Martha could do much mischief, though I knew it was in her heart to try it. 'Twas only when Mr. Ainsleigh went away that I knew there was real harm done. Ah, Robin, 'tis a hard world we live in, and full of trouble."

She gave a heavy sigh, and I saw her eyes fill with tears.

"Yes, dear mother, for some of us; but God forbid trouble should come to you."

"It has come, Robin," she answered, gazing at me with an eager, scrutinizing look that I had never seen in her face before. "I have but one child, and to see her sad is the worst of sadness to me."

"Margery sad!" cried I; "when last I saw her she was as gay as a woodland fairy."

"When last you saw her? Do you see her so seldom, Robin?"

"Except at church, I have not seen her for weeks. You must not take it unkind that I have stopped away; I have had good reasons."

"Ay, Robin, good reasons I doubt not. But have you never met Madge by chance in the woods all this time? She spends much of her time in the woods. 'Tis hard to keep her indoors in fine weather, and she is not as easily managed as she once was. Oh, Robin, my child is wretched, and I can not find out the cause; and 'tis breaking this poor heart."

And here the good creature burst into tears. I tried to comfort her, but the tears flowed only the faster.

"She is wretched, Robin, and will not tell her mother the cause of her grief. Oh, if thou didst not love her, why didst beguile and deceive her with fine words and promises?"

"I beguile! I deceive! Mother, as God is my judge, I have never spoken to Margery but as a brother should speak to his sister. I have never loved her with more or less than a brother's affection, and I would not let the man live that should deceive or wrong her."

"Ah, Robin, thou speakest fair, but I know the child loves thee. Her father and I have joked her about thee many a time, pleased to see her blushes and smiles. We did not think thou couldst fail to love her, and we did not know they would acknowledge thee for Roderick Ainsleigh's son, and make a fine gentleman of thee. Yes, Robin, she loved thee better than a sister loves a brother, and I thought she was loved in return; others said as much."

"What others?"

"Martha Grimshaw and Mr. Lestrangle. He told me thou wert mad for her."

"He told a lie. Those two are my enemies both, and would be glad to do me a mischief. But, mother, I do love my little foster-sister, and if it will ease your mind to see her my wife I will marry her when you will. She is the loveliest creature I ever saw, and might turn the heads of wiser men; but 'twas my fate not long ago to see a face that bewitched me, and to give my love where it can never be returned. Shall I waste my life in weeping for a shadow? No, dear mother; give me Margery for a wife, and I will work for her honestly, and be as true a husband as ever woman had."

"Nay, Robin, I will not beg a husband for my daughter. Thou dost not love her as we thought thou didst. 'Tis ourselves we must blame for judging amiss. All I know is that the child has some trouble on her mind, and I thought thou mightst be at the bottom of it."

Again she scrutinized my face with anxious looks, and then turned away, shaking her head sorrowfully.

"There is something amiss," she said, "but I know not what."

"You spoke just now of Mr. Lestrangle," said I. "Has he been hanging about this place of late?"

"No, Robin; I'll have no fine London gentleman about my place. He came two or three times without you, but I gave him sour looks that told him he wasn't wanted; and the last time he was here, full two months ago, he told me he was going to London for the rest of the year."

"And since then you have seen him no more?"

"No."

"Yet he has not been all the time in town. He has run backward and forward, but has spent most of the time at Hauteville."

I remembered his broadly-declared admiration of the rustic beauty; I considered his hideous code of morals, and trembled for my little innocent foster-sister.

"God defend her from such a libertine!" I thought, and blamed the selfishness that had kept me so long away from the warreners' lodge.

I would fain have seen and talked to Margery before leaving Berkshire, and so waited for some hours in the hope that she would return, but she did not come. Jack Hawker came home to his supper, but his manner was cold and sullen, and I perceived that some dark suspicion had turned the hearts of these two friends against me. I left the cottage at last, disheartened and uneasy, and returned to Hauteville, there to spend a somewhat melancholy evening with my patroness and Miss Hemsley.

The next day returned Mr. Lestrangle, and soon after Sir Marcus, who had been on a visit to a nobleman's seat in the adjoining county. I spent the morning tête-à-tête with Anthony Grimshaw, while Lady Barbara and Miss Hemsley drove to the nearest town to pay visits and make purchases. It seemed sad to me to lose their company on this, almost the last day of my residence at Hauteville; but I felt it was a fortunate accident which divided me from Dorothea Hemsley. In her presence I found it hard to fester my tongue, and Lady Barbara's reproachful looks often reminded me of my imprudence. Soon, too soon, was I to be separated from her forever; for I felt that, once away from Hauteville, I should be as remote from her as if we had been inhabitants of different planets.

The day wore on; we dined in stately solemnity; and I was pacing the terrace alone, awaiting a summons to take tea with the two ladies in the long drawing-room, when I was accosted by a footman, who came to inform me that Sir Marcus Lestrangle wished to speak with me in his study. It was the first time he had ever sent for me; but I concluded that he was about to offer me some parting advice, or bestow upon me some farewell benediction. I therefore obeyed without any sentiment of uneasiness, regretting only that if the diplomatist should prove tedious I might lose my privileged half-hour with the ladies.

The study in which Sir Marcus spent so many hours of his life was a dark and somewhat gloomy oak-paneled apartment, furnished with book-cases containing ponderous folios, and with numerous oaken chests and iron cases, which I supposed to contain papers. A carved-oak desk occupied the centre of the room, and on this, though it was not yet quite dark, some half-dozen candles were burning in a brazen candelabrum.

My patron was not alone; a solemn assembly had been convoked in haste, and I found myself placed before these as a prisoner at the bar of justice. Lady Barbara sat opposite her husband, pale as death; Miss Hemsley close beside her, with an anxious, distressed countenance. Next to his father stood Mr. Lestrangle, and I thought he greeted me with a glance of triumph as I entered the room. At a respectful distance from the rest appeared Mrs. Grimshaw, and I knew her presence boded ill to me.

"Mr. Ainsleigh," began Sir Marcus, in a severe magisterial voice, "you have been rescued from abject poverty; you have been received into this house and liberally entertained for the last ten years of your life; you have enjoyed the education of a gentleman, and, finally, you have been admitted into the bosom of this family on a footing of equality, much to my regret, and all by the charity of Lady Barbara Lestrangle yonder."

"No, Marcus," said my lady, "I will not have it called charity."

"By whatever name would your ladyship call it? What claim, legal or social, had your cousin's bastard upon you?"

At sound of that bitter epithet my lady winced as if she had been struck. "It ill becomes you to call him by so cruel a name," she said; "we have no knowledge that his mother was not lawfully wedded to my cousin Roderick."

"Have we any proof that she was? Mr. Ainsleigh's reputation is against the probability that he would make an honest woman of a parson's runaway daughter, who left her home to follow him."

"I can not stay here, Sir, to hear my mother belied."

"You will stay here, Sir, as long as I please." "Not to hear you speak ill of the dead; that I will not suffer. I am fully conscious of the benefits I owe to Lady Barbara, and thank her for them with all my heart, and in my prayers morning and night; but I know not why I am called hither to be reminded of my obligations, or what I have done to deserve that they should be cast in my face with so much harshness."

"You know not what you have done!" cried Sir Marcus. "I suppose you are impudent enough to pretend not to know that John Hawker's daughter has left her home secretly, as your mother left hers?"

"Indeed I know nothing of the kind, nor do I believe that it is so. I was at the warreners' lodge yesterday afternoon, and heard nothing of this."

"And the girl ran away last night. Oh, no doubt you laid your plans wisely, and now you act astonishment as naturally as Garrick himself. But Hawker is in the steward's room; you will look otherwise when you see him."

"Indeed, Sir, I have nothing to do with this," she said; "I beg to be allowed to retire."

"No, Dorothea, I must bid you stay. This gentleman has been a favorite of yours, I hear; it is well that you should discover his real character."

"Oh, Sir, you are very cruel," the girl murmured, tearfully.

"If Margery Hawker has left her home, Sir Marcus," I said, "there is no one will regret it more than I; and there is no one less concerned in her leaving."

"What, you will swear to that, I suppose?"

"With my dying breath, if needs be. Yes, at the very moment when my soul goes forth to meet its God."

"I believe him," cried Lady Barbara. "It is not in my cousin's blood to tell a lie."

"You will have cause to change your opinion presently, Madam," replied her husband, coldly; and then, turning to me, he went on, "You are a perjurer and a blasphemer, Sir, and your own hand is the witness against you. Have you ever seen that before?"

He handed me an open letter, written in a hand so like my own, and with a signature so adroitly counterfeited, that I stood aghast with the paper in my hand, staring at it in utter bewilderment.

"Come, Sir, the play has lasted long enough, and 'tis time you answered my question. I think you'll scarce deny your knowledge of that handwriting."

"I know the handwriting well enough, Sir

Marcus, for it is the most ingenious forgery that ever was executed; but I never looked upon this paper before."

"Great Heaven, was there ever such an impudent denial! And you protest that you never saw that letter till this moment?"

"Never, Sir."

"Perhaps you will be so good as to read it aloud for the benefit of the company, and for Lady Barbara, who believes in your innocence?"

"I am quite willing Lady Barbara should hear this vile forgery, Sir," I replied; and then read the letter, which ran thus:

"DEAREST MARGERY,—For fear there should at least be some mistake about the coach, I write in haste to bid you remember that it leaves the George at Warborough at nine o'clock at night. Your place is taken, and you have nothing to do but alight at the Bull and Mouth in the City, where you will ask for Mrs. Jones, who will meet you there without fail. She is a good motherly soul, and will take care of you till you are joined by one who loves you better than life, which will be in three days at latest. And then, beloved girl, far from those new grand friends who would divide us, I will teach thee how faithfully this heart, which has long languished in secret, can love the fairest and dearest of women.—Ever and ever thy fond lover,

"ROBERT AINSLEIGH."

"What think you now, Lady Barbara?" asked Sir Marcus.

"As I have a soul to be saved, Madam," cried I, "no word of that vile letter was ever penned by this hand!"

"There are some folks to whom perjury comes easy, Sir," said the baronet. "You did not think that letter would fall into my hands; it was intended for your victim, who would have cherished the precious paper, and hidden it against her heart, I dare swear. Unluckily for you, the post played you false, and the letter was delivered this morning, twelve hours after the bird had flown. The wretched broken-hearted father of this weak and wicked girl brought it down to me, and calls upon me to punish the traitor who has ruined his child."

"That, Sir, I trust you will do, if Providence helps me to find him," I answered, looking straight at Mr. Lestrangle, who received my gaze without flinching. Was he not, by his own account, steeped to the lips in vice, and past-master in the art of dissimulation? "But as for that letter," I continued, "I again protest, and for the last time, that it is a forgery."

"And pray, Sir, is there any one so much interested in your insignificant fortunes as to take the trouble to counterfeit your handwriting?"

"It is always the interest of an enemy to work mischief, Sir; and there are few creatures so insignificant as to escape all enmity. Again, Sir, self-interest may have prompted the forging of that letter. The traitor who is really concerned in the flight of this dear girl would best escape the consequences of his crime by shifting it upon the shoulders of an innocent person."

"I have not condemned you hastily, Sir," said Sir Marcus. "Here is a sheet of Spanish exercises in your hand, with your signature scribbled at the bottom of the page. I have carefully compared the letter and the exercises, and I find the signatures agree to the most minute curve."

"Conclusive evidence that the letter is a forgery, Sir," I replied, boldly. "Experts in handwriting have agreed that no man ever signs his name twice alike; there is always some minute difference. A will was once pronounced a forgery upon that very ground—the several signatures at the bottom of the several pages were all precisely alike."

"I see, Sir, you have already learned to advance precedents and argue like a lawyer. Perhaps you will be less eloquent when confronted with the father of your victim."

Sir Marcus rang the bell, and ordered the servant to send John Hawker. There was a dead silence while we waited his coming. I heard the slow, shambling step of my foster-father on the stone floor of the passage, and my heart bled for him in his trouble.

He came slowly into the room, and stood among us, with his bare head bent by the first shame that had ever bowed it.

"Your foster-son denies that he wrote the letter which you brought me this morning, Hawker," said Sir Marcus, in his hard magisterial voice.

"I know naught of that, Sir; I can't read writing myself. I took the letter to the parson at Pennington, and he read it to me; and when he came to the name at the bottom, I'd as lieve he'd put a knife through my heart as have read that name to me."

"It is clear that some person has tempted your daughter away. Is there any one except Robert Ainsleigh whom you could suppose concerned in her flight?"

"Nay, Sir, the poor child had no acquaintance except Robin yonder, and your son."

"My son! Do you pretend to rank my son among your daughter's acquaintances?"

"Tis likely enough he'll do so," cried Mr. Lestrangle, with a contemptuous laugh: "Ainsleigh took me to his cottage once or twice to get some artificial flies for our trout-fishing."

"Ay, Sir, and you came many times afterward without Robin, and won all our hearts by your pleasant, affable ways, till my wife be-thought herself 'twas a dangerous thing to have a fine gentleman hanging about the place, and let you see that you wasn't welcome any longer."

"Why, fellow, it is three months since I crossed your threshold."

"And if you had crossed it but yesterday, Everard, I do not suppose this man would dare accuse my son," exclaimed Sir Marcus, indignantly; "and that in the face of a letter which proclaims the real delinquent."

"I accuse no one, Sir," replied Jack Hawker; "I only know that my child has left me and her mother, and broken two loving hearts."

On this I turned to my foster-father.

"John Hawker," said I, "you yourself have had as much hand in this miserable business as I have. I have ever regarded your daughter as my dear foster-sister, and my conduct to her has always been that of a brother. I told your wife as much yesterday before this trouble arose; I tell you so to-day. But if you can find her, and bring her to me, an honest woman, I will make her my wife, and cherish and honor her as such so long as I live; though I will hide from no one here that I have bestowed my heart elsewhere, where I have no hope that it can ever be accepted, and can never give her a lover's passionate affection."

"I protest that is an honest man's offer," cried Lady Barbara.

"Ay," sneered her husband, "your hopeful protégé promises to marry the girl if her father can find her; rely on it your honest man will take care she is not found; that good motherly soul, Mrs. Jones, will know how to guard her charge.—And now, Sir," he continued, addressing himself to me, "understand that you are found out, and stand convicted under your own handwriting, and that no cry of forgery will serve you, however impudently persisted in. You will therefore oblige me by quitting this house to-night at your earliest convenience, and you will further comprehend that Lady Barbara washes her hands of you, and that any communication which you may hereafter take the trouble to address to her will be returned to you with the seal unbroken."

"Honored Madam, my dear kinswoman, does this gentleman speak your will?" I asked, looking straight at my benefactress.

"There are circumstances, Robert, in which a woman's will must needs be that of her husband," Lady Barbara replied.

"In that case, dear Madam, I submit. No unconscious wrong which you may do me in the present can cancel my debt of gratitude for the past. I was doomed to leave this dear place. That I leave in unmerited disgrace can add but one more pang to the anguish of parting."

I bowed low to my lady and to Miss Hemsley, and turned to quit the room; but before going I approached my foster-father.

"Jack," I said, offering him my hand, "you can not think me so base a wretch as this vile counterfeit letter would make me? Shake hands, and bid me God-speed; and if it is possible for a man that's ignorant of the town I'll find your daughter."

"Ah, Robin, thou know'st but too well where to find her. 'Tis thy name that's wrote at the bottom of the letter. The parson said so, and he'd not tell a lie. I'll never shake thy hand again, Robin, for thou'rt a villain!"

This stung me more sharply than the abuse of Sir Marcus. I left the room hurriedly, ran to my own chamber, and packed a portmanteau in haste with my immediate necessities. The rest of my luggage was ready packed; but this I left to be sent after me, leaving it to Lady Barbara's pleasure whether I had the things or not.

With the small portmanteau in my hand I ran down stairs. It was now dark; the lamps were not yet lit, and the great hall but dimly lighted by a wood-fire. I was leaving the house, when a door in the hall was softly opened, and I heard my name whispered.

It was Lady Barbara who called me. She was standing just within the door of a small waiting-room near the grand entrance, which was ordinarily used by footmen and humble visitors. She took my hands in hers and drew me hastily into the room, which was lighted by one wax taper. Even in that dim light I could see she had been weeping.

"Dear child," she cried, "it is hard to part with you thus; but our enemies are too strong for us, and we must submit. My little child lies in the cemetery at Madrid, and I am not allowed to cherish my cousin's orphan son."

"Oh, dear Madam, you do not think me guilty? Say but that, and I am happy."

"I say it with all my heart, Robert. The letter is a forgery, and it is all a base plot against you, because I am mistress of my own fortune, and might bequeath it to you. What do I say? My husband is incapable of such infamy; but there are those who would hesitate at no villainy that would bring them wealth and power. You are my adopted son, Robert; remember that. Nothing can sever that tie between us—no, not even ill-conduct or ingratitude of yours—for I am more charitable now than I was when my pride slew your father. Do not answer me, I have but a few stolen moments to give you. Take this note-book; it contains all the ready-money I can command to-night, and there is a letter in it, a few hurried lines of recommendation, which you will carry to Mr. Philip Swinfen, of Paper-buildings. You will go straight to London, and you must write and tell me how things prosper with you. Write to me under cover to Mrs. Curtis, at 49 Long-acre—she is my milliner, and a good soul. And now, good-by. Stay, I am to give you this from Dora: it is a book she has used for the last five years."

It was a shabby duodecimo volume, which I put in my breast, too much moved for words. If it had been some jeweled box containing the relics of St. Peter it could scarce have exercised a more healing influence upon the sore heart that beat against it.

"God bless her and you, dear cousin, and farewell!" and with this I wrung my kinswoman's hand, and left her.

The autumn night was chill and bleak, and the full moon rode high above the sombre leafless woods as I left Hauteville. The little book in my bosom—a Spanish translation of the Imitation of Christ—and the memory of Lady Barbara's goodness were the only consolers that I carried with me into the world of which I knew no more than an infant. Once, and once only, did I look back at the old Elizabethan mansion, with lighted windows glowing in the distance. O God, how long before I was again to look upon those walls! What perils by land and perils by sea, what agonies of hope deferred and dull despair was I to suffer before I revisited that familiar spot!

NINETEEN.

I AM so filled with unrest to-night!

I sit by my window and watch the light grow dim and faint in the western skies, And my heart beats low, and my lips breathe sighs, For something so precious is floating away Just out of my reach in the twilight gray.

The last faint beam in the west has fled, The stars come forth, the day is dead. The wheels of time roll swiftly on, And nineteen years of my life are gone. I call to the sunbeam, "Return, I pray! You know what you are bearing away." But I watch, and weep, and call in vain, It never will come to me again.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

ALL that is required by the law of New York to consign any person to a private lunatic asylum is a certificate of insanity, signed by two physicians. This is placing rather too much power in the hands of two persons, who may be neither responsible nor incorruptible. It is certainly a shameful fact that individuals of fortune and position, both in this country and in England, have been immured in the cells of a lunatic asylum while in the possession of health of mind and body. Instances of this kind are occasionally brought to light, as the recent case of a lady of sound mind having been confined in the State Lunatic Asylum at Trenton almost immediately after her marriage. Nobody can know how many similar cases never come to the knowledge of the public. And until this law is modified, at least, we had better all be careful to do nothing in an impulsive moment, which our worst enemy—if we have one—could construe into an indication of an unbalanced mind!

The alterations now in progress at the French Theatre will be a comfort, bodily and mental, to all who purpose to countenance the new Opera Bouffe Company when the autumn season commences. The former arrangement of this building was inconvenient, uncomfortable, and unsafe. It is frightful to imagine the fatal confusion which an alarm of fire would have caused, in connection with the former circuitous and perplexing arrangement of staircases and doors of egress. It is believed that the changes being made will render the theatre comparatively safe.

It is stated that a well-known diamond merchant estimates the value of the precious stones worn in Saratoga at the present time at over $4,500,000, and groups them as follows: $750,000 at Congress Hall, $750,000 at Leland's Union, $350,000 at the Clarendon, $200,000 at the American, and the remainder at various hotels and cottages.

The railroad to the top of Mount Washington is just opened, and now the rush to the White Mountains will commence in earnest. As to Saratoga, the races have had the effect to send prices up to six dollars a day, and new-comers up to the sixth story at that. Those who have not plenty of the "wherewithal" had better not make themselves uncomfortable at Saratoga during August.

There is a delightful prospect ahead for the lovers of the strawberry. A gentleman of Newark announces that with twenty years' cultivation he can raise strawberries as large as pineapples, which will retain all the delicacy of the fruit now grown! If this wonderful cultivation goes on successfully, how pleasant it will be to say to a friend who drops in to tea on a June evening, "Will you take a slice of strawberry?"

Contrary to the ominous reports which are usually circulated at this season of the year, and before, it is now stated that the peach crop this year will be exceedingly large in some sections of the country. The great peach orchards on the east shore of Lake Michigan are loaded with fine fruit, which will soon begin to reach the market in that vicinity, and continue to supply it for a long time.

In this city before the war the highest salary for male teachers in the Public Schools was $1500, and $900 for females. At present it is $3000 for males and $1700 for females.

It may not be an agreeable consideration to those who are enjoying themselves at the seaside or among the mountains—yet it appears that burglars are pretty freely investigating the contents of closed houses in some parts of the city. Probably but few housekeepers were foolish enough to leave plate and similar valuables within their grasp; but nowadays bolts and bars avail little against the plunderers. It is to be hoped that the police will have their eyes and ears open.

It is a well-known fact that Southerners who come North feel the heat of summers here to be more oppressive than in their own homes. This seems singular; but it is stated that in midsummer the thermometer positively ranges higher in New York than in Southern latitudes, and sun-strokes are far more frequent. It is the long-continued rather than the excessive heat which is enervating to the Southern resident. The New Orleans Picayune says: "We have no doubt a Northern reader will smile when we tell him there is no city in the United States in which the months of July and August can be spent more comfortably than in the city of New Orleans. It is, nevertheless, true. Mountain air we can not give in this flat region, but the seashore is at hand, and its surfs and the breezes that come over the gulf from the south are as cool and refreshing as can be found anywhere else. A Northern man, who comes here for the first time in April, gets oppressed with the unwanted heat, and wonders, if such be the spring-time, what will it be when the Dog Star rises clear in the ascendency. If he remains, he is surprised that he bears the July and August heats so well; but in September and October, when he remembers how fresh and cool he used to find it in his own home, he is again panting under summer heats."

An immense skating-rink is now in process of erection in this city. Thirty lots were obtained for this purpose, between Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth streets, on Third Avenue. It will be finished by the middle of October, and will be 336 feet long by 168 feet wide, and 70 feet high. The sides will be of iron, supporting a roof on trestle arches. It will be handsomely decorated, and lighted by a patent magnesium illuminator. Around the rink a platform will be constructed, capable of seating eight thousand people. During the summer season the place will be used for public meetings, concerts, and balls. It is asserted that twenty thousand persons can find seats within the inclosure. Retiring-rooms, parlors, and refreshment-rooms will be provided.

During the month of July one hundred and twenty-seven lost children were found and restored to their parents by the police in Brooklyn.

Most of our artists are out of town, searching among hills and valleys for new material for their winter work. A few are at fashionable watering-places, but the majority prefer quieter resting-spots, where Nature may be studied in all her freshness and beauty. Some, however, are across the waters. Bierstadt is in London; Gifford and M'Entee are in Paris; Church is among the green hills of Tyrol; and Bradford is en route for Labrador and the icebergs.

Ladies will be wise to leave expensive jewelry safely under lock and key when they take a dip in the surf. A three hundred dollar ring slipped from a young lady's finger while bathing at Atlantic City the other day.

The Commissioners of Central Park are continually adding to its attractions. They have secured the services of a scientific gentleman, Mr. B. Waterhouse Hawkins, who will immediately commence the task of preparing a life-size group of the extinct animals which at a former period existed on the American Continent.

Recent developments show that it has been "a custom of trade" among Parisian makers of kid gloves to make four pairs out of skin considered sufficient only for three pairs by competent judges. A wholesale glover delivers to a workman a quantity of kid skin, which he considers enough for three perfect pairs of gloves. If, by his skill, the workman can contrive to turn out three pairs of marketable gloves from the skin, and yet reserve enough to make a fourth, he considers himself entitled to keep that fourth pair for himself. The Correctional Police have given a check to this practice by a sentence of fifteen months' imprisonment against some of the workmen, and of a year's imprisonment and more against several of the receivers of their stolen goods.

The Empress is organizing a Chinese Museum at Fontainebleau. All curiosities from the Celestial Empire contained in the Imperial palaces are to be forwarded thither.

The Free Reading-room of Cooper Institute, now closed, will be reopened September 1. It is furnished with 22 city, 24 country, and 9 European daily newspapers; 72 American and 35 European weekly newspapers; 41 American and 56 European monthly and quarterly magazines are already on the tables; and it is the intention of the Trustees to liberally add to this large supply before the reopening.

Report says there are one hundred and sixty-three children at the Gregory House, Lake Mahopac—but no crying! Also, report announces ten engagements at Long Branch—quite too small a number, and probably altogether incorrect. By-the-way, gentlemen who persist in smoking pipes on the piazzas of sea-side hotels are not at all in favor with the ladies.

A writer on "Words and their Uses," in a late number of the Galaxy, says that the proper form of a marriage announcement is not—Married, John Smith to Mary Jones, nor John Smith and Mary Jones, but—Married, Mary Jones to John Smith; that, properly speaking, "the woman is married to the man. It is her name that is lost in his, not his in hers; she becomes a member of his family, not he of hers; it is her life that is merged, or supposed to be merged, in his, not his in hers; she follows his fortunes and takes his station, not he hers. And thus, manifestly, she has been attached to him by a legal bond, not he to her; except, indeed, as all attachment is necessarily mutual. But, nevertheless, we do not speak of tying a ship to a boat, but a boat to a ship. And as long, at least, as man is the larger, the stronger, the more individually important, as long as woman generally lives in her husband's house and bears his name—it is the woman who is married to the man."

From late accounts we learn that for the last two months the Empress Carlotta has been subject to fresh attacks of delirium. On the approach of the anniversary of the tragedy of Queretaro, symptoms of internal agitation manifested themselves to such a degree as to occasion great apprehensions; and the excessive heat has aggravated her disordered condition. Her physical health is good; and she is able to feel the value of the care which is taken of her by the King and Queen of the Belgians, who watch over her with the most tender solicitude.

Nothing is secure from thieves and robbers in Paris. A short time ago several persons were gazing at a toy-shop in the passage Jouffroy, and among them a lady and gentleman with their little girl ten years old. On going away what was their dismay on finding that an adroit thief had cut off the child's magnificent crop of golden hair!

Fig. 2.—India mull dress with double-skirt and fichu. The under-skirt is edged with a quilling of the same. The over-skirt is gathered in a large puff behind, and is furnished in front with two rounded lappets, also trimmed with quilling. The fichu is crossed in front and trimmed behind with a large bow of mull, as shown in the illustration; the ends are laid in two pleats. Swiss muslin petticoat, edged with needle-work insertion. Pink lace bonnet.

Fig. 3.—Dress with double skirt of light green silk barège. The under-skirt is trimmed in front with three pleated flounces of the same material, surmounted with bias folds of green satin; the upper-skirt is caught up on each side with rosettes of green ribbon, and is edged from the sides, where it falls over the under-skirt, with a pleated flounce. Two sash ends of green satin, trimmed with piping and fringe, are fastened on the shoulder with rosettes of green ribbon, and are crossed under the belt.

Fig. 4.—Under-skirt of pink foulard; over-skirt with long casaque of pink Chambery gauze. The trimming consists of puffings and pleatings of the same material. Bonnet of white figured lace. White parasol with pink silk lining.

LINEAGE OF THORWALDSEN.

THORWALDSEN was half Iclander and half Dane. His father was the son of a clergyman in Iceland, by name Porvaldur. Thorwaldsen's mother was the daughter of a clergyman in Jutland. It is not certain whether Thorwaldsen was born in Iceland, or on the voyage from Iceland to Denmark, or at Copenhagen.

Most families in Iceland are able to trace authentically their genealogies from the first settlers in the country. This is also the case with Thorwaldsen's genealogy, which has been traced from one of the earliest settlers in Iceland, named Hoskuldr Dalakollsson. On a visit in Norway—about the beginning of the tenth century—this chief perceived a beautiful lady in the possession of a slave merchant, who thought she was mute, because she would not speak. Hoskuldr, struck with her beauty, at once prevailed on the merchant to deliver her over to him for a handsome sum. She turned out to be no less than a princess, the daughter of the Irish king Myrkjartan. Her name was Melkarka, and she had been taken prisoner by Scandinavian pirates. Hoskuldr afterward had a son with Melkarka, the celebrated Olafur Pa. When Olafur was about twenty he went to Ireland, and was recognized by the Irish king Myrkjartan as his grandson. This Olafur Pa, the son of the Irish Princess, was Thorwaldsen's ancestor.

PROMENADE TOILETTES.

Pompadour Fichu.

THIS fichu is very stylish, and is especially suited to young ladies. It is made of black lace, bordered, as shown in the illustration, with white blonde an inch and a half in width. Having cut the two fronts from Fig. 30, and the back from Fig. 31, join these parts on the shoulder from 72 to 73, lay the ends in pleats, \times on \bullet , and sew these to the sash ends, which are twenty-two inches long, the width of the ends of the front, on the upper ends, and ten inches wide at the bottom. Hem the edges on the right side and sew on the blonde. The front is ornamented with a bow of green ribbon. The ends are fastened outside the belt. This fichu is designed to be worn with a low-necked blouse or dress. The sleeves are made to correspond with the fichu.

Cap of Blue Ribbon and Lace Rosettes.

THE foundation of this cap consists of a straight piece of white buckram eight inches long by five inches wide, which is rounded off on one end to the width of two inches for the front, and bound with narrow blue ribbon. The back is finished by three ends of blue ribbon an inch and a half in width, which are ornamented with guipure rosettes in the manner shown in the illustration, while the lower ends hang loose and are notched. The front of this cap is ornamented with a large rosette composed of loops of narrow blue ribbon each an inch and a half long; this is arranged over a plain muslin foundation four inches long and two inches wide. The front of this is finished with a pleated frill of guipure lace an inch and a half in width. On each side of the foundation, as shown in the illustration, are strings of blue ribbon four inches wide and 23 inches long, which are fastened under the chignon. Instead of the guipure rosettes, rosettes in tatting, crochet, or netting, such as we have frequently described, may be used.

REMARKABLE DIAMONDS.

THE Mattam Diamond (367 carats, pear-shaped, and indented at the thick end) was found at Landak, in Borneo, and has been the cause of a sanguinary war. It still, however, remains in the possession of the Rajah of Mattam. He deems the fortune of his family to depend upon its retention, and refused two gunboats, with stores and ammunition, and fifty thousand pounds in money, offered for it by the Dutch governor of Batavia. The Koh-i-noor was taken at Delhi by the conquering Ala-ed-Din (some relation of our young friend Aladdin, no doubt, and perhaps his contemporary). Thence it came into the hands of the Great Mogul Baber in 1526. This prince estimated it at the sum of the daily maintenance of the whole world—a grand unit of measurement. It was beheld by Tavernier among the jewels of Aurungzebe, but reduced by the unskillfulness of the cutter (who, perhaps, lost his head over so tremendous a job, and nearly lost it afterward very literally) from 793 to 186 carats, the weight it possessed in the Exhibition in Hyde Park. At the capture of Lahore, during the Sikh mutiny, it fell into the hands of the British troops, who presented it to the Queen. This diamond has been recut by the famous Coster of Amsterdam, and reduced to 106 carats; but, instead of being a lustreless mass, scarcely better than rock-crystal, it has become a brilliant, matchless for purity and fire. The Cumberland diamond, bought by the city of London for ten thousand pounds, and presented to the conqueror of Culloden, was claimed by the crown of Hanover, and has recently been restored to it by the Queen. Perhaps Prussia has laid hands on it by this time. The Orloff is set in the sceptre of the Czars of Russia. It once formed the eye of an idol in a Brahmin temple—no unusual office for an Eastern jewel—a fact which forms the foundation of Mr. Wilkie Collins's interesting novel, "The Moonstone." It is also said to have been set in the famous peacock throne of Nadir Shah. At all events it was stolen by a Frenchman, and was eventually purchased by the Empress Catharine II., in 1774, for four hundred and fifty thousand rubles, a pension of twenty thousand rubles, and a patent of nobility. The tale of the Pitt Diamond is historical. It was bought by the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, of Pitt, the governor of Fort St. George, for one hundred and thirty-five thousand pounds. The stone then weighed 410 carats. Pitt, in a pamphlet published to clear his character, asserts that he purchased it in Golconda; but the couplet of Pope:

"Asleep and naked as the Indian lay,
An honest factor stole the gem away."

has probably been more extensively circulated. However, the gem was really stolen from the Garde Meuble in 1792, and restored in a mysterious manner. Its cutting cost three thousand five hundred pounds, and occupied two years. Napoleon I. wore it in the pommel of his sword. The Florentine Brilliant belongs to the Emperor of Austria. It is supposed to be one of the gems lost at the battle of Garmadon by Charles the Bold. It was found by a Swiss soldier, who sold it to a Jew for one florin. The Piggott Diamond was sold by lot for thirty thousand pounds, afterwards bought by Rundell & Bridge for six thousand pounds, and disposed of by them at the original price (no wonder some jewelers are rich!) to the Pasha of Egypt. The present possessor is not known.

HOME AGAIN!

HOME again! Spared the perils of years,
Spared of rough seas and rougher lands,
And I look in your eyes once, once again,
Hear your voices, and grasp your hands!

Not changed the least, least bit in the world!
Not aged a day, as it seems to me!
The same dear faces—the same dear home—
All the same as it used to be!

Ah, here is the garden! Here the limes,
Still in their sunset green and gold,
And the level lawn, with the pattern in't
Where the grass has been, newly roll'd.

And here come the rabbits, lumping along—
No! That's never the same white doe,
With the pinky lops and the munching mouth?
Yet 'tis like her as snow to snow.

And here's Nep in his old heraldic style,
Erect, chain-tightening all he can;
With Topsy, wagging that inch of tail,—
What, you know me again, old man?

The pond, where the lilies float and bloom!
The gold-fish in it, just the same,
Too fat to stir in the cool—yes, one
Shoots and gleams, and goes out like flame!

And yonder's the tree with the giant's face,
Nose and chin against the blue;
And the two elm-branches here, with still
Our famous swing between the two!

No change! Nay, it only seems last night
That I returned your fond "Good-bys,"
As I heard the rain drip from the eaves,
And felt its moisture in my eyes.

Only last night that you thronged the porch,
While I choked the words I couldn't say,
And poor little Jim's white face peeped out,
Dimly seen while I stole away.

Poor little Jim! In this happy hour
His wee, white face our hearts recall,
And I miss a hand and a voice, and see
The little crutch against the wall.

So all life's sunshine is fleck'd with shade,
So all delight is touch'd with pain,
So tears of sorrow and tears of joy
Welcome the wanderer home again!

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

SOVEREIGNS shift about like common mortals. The Queen of Belgium is at Spa, where she lives in a small house of modest appearance with a suite composed only of a lady of honor and an equerry. The Queen of England will soon go, under the name of the Countess of Kent, to Lucerne to dwell there for a time in a villa. The Empress of Russia, under the title of the Countess Borodinski, rises at six o'clock every morning to drink the waters of the Kissingen spring; and, lastly, the Empress of the French divides her time between presiding over ministerial councils and lunches on the river brink. On Saturday she went to Paris to preside over the council; she wore a pearl-gray trailing dress with a black lace baschlik, a toque of rice straw trimmed with black velvet, and a green embroidered parasol. On Thursday she promenaded in a Lamballe costume of batiste écar, trimmed with Valenciennes, with a toque of black straw trimmed with black feathers, and a large parasol écar.

It appears that the Empress is not insensible to the delights of a fishing party, and that she is fond of going to eat matelote at Platrieries, a little village near Fontainebleau, where matelote is made in an inimitable manner. It was Madame de Metternich that brought the inn of Platrieries into fashion. She took the Empress there once several years ago, and since then they have been there every time they have staid at Fontainebleau. They go out in a yacht strictly incognito, and without any display. Scarcely have they arrived at Platrieries when they jump into a boat, accompanied by a few chamberlains and ordnance officers; both take the oars, and they row about while the matelote is cooking by a bright fire in the kitchen. The inn is of the most primitive kind, with chickens and ducks pecking about the door. Mother Julienne, who is celebrated for twenty leagues around, insists on the honor of waiting with her own hands on her noble guests, whom she pretends not to know. They take their seats in a little papered room, with chintz curtains at the windows, from which they can look out on the Seine and the smiling landscape round about, and eat merrily from coarse earthen-ware, edged with blue, on a cloth of dazzling whiteness, the famous matelote, the celebrated omelette, and the exquisite fruits of the place, of which the celebrated Chasselas, the first grape in the world, is not the only one. Could Marie Antoinette return to the earth she would see all her memories and caprices of Trianon revived.

The splendid chateau of Beauregard, at Paris, is for sale. The Emperor superintended its entire construction. It is one of the most comfortable as well as the most luxurious residences in the suburbs of Paris. The marvelous furniture, objects of art, Sèvres china, and massive silver plate, with which the chateau is filled, are beyond description. Beauregard is built on a high hill near Versailles, half in the Louis IV. and half in the modern style. Two conservatories, wholly of wrought iron and glass chiseled like jewels, are placed at each extremity, and at once arrest the attention. The palace is celebrated for the admirable arrangement of its reception-rooms, and nothing can surpass its galleries. The lower end of the dining-hall is hung with a large Gobelin curtain, which, on being drawn aside, disclosed two columns of colored marble, between which is a white marble statue of Music. The galerie des fêtes is kingly. Twelve immense chandeliers, designed to give light to the musicians, are hung in basket fashion from the balcony below the middle dome. The ornamentation is composed of painted panels, representing allegorical personages larger than life, separated by pairs of columns of colored marble. The lofty porphyry mantle is supported by caryatides as large as life. The hangings for the reception-rooms were manufactured at Lyons especially for the castle; that of some of the rooms cost twenty thousand francs. Every where are seen the letters L. N., initials which consecrate the splendid gifts offered by the Emperor to Miss Howard, one of the morganatic queens who long held him captive, the most beautiful, and the most devoted to him, since she loved him at an epoch when, an exile at London, he was far from foreseeing the high destinies which awaited him in France. After the Emperor's marriage she espoused Sir Clarence Trelawney. She died quite suddenly two years ago, in all the lustre of a beauty which will remain celebrated. It was thought that the Emperor would marry her, and this might have happened if she had had children; but, despite the gossip which has confounded her with other personages, it is certain that she never had any by him. These details may be of interest at this moment, when the chateau of Beauregard is about to be sold. As by its splendor it could only belong to a prince or a Jewish banker, there is reason to fear that it will be dismantled. It is said that the King of Hanover wishes to buy it. The Count de Béchevet, to whom it now belongs, asks four million francs for it, and on seeing it, no one finds the price too high. It has a historic character of its own, and the interest of which will increase in proportion as time casts a shadow over the secret phases of contemporaneous history. Do not men visit Chambord, attracted most of all by the salamandres of King François I. and the croissants of the beautiful Diana de Poitiers; do they not even go to the pavilion of Louveciennes to seek some memories of the wretched Countess Du Barry, who was torn thence to lay her head on the scaffold. What is gossip to-day will be historical to-morrow, and a place must be given to those personages who are important from their position, for while there are sovereigns there will be favorites.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

BEEF BROTH.

FROM Gouffé's Royal Cookery Book, now acknowledged to be the first authority on culinary matters, we extract the following rules for making beef broth, that chief among wholesome articles of diet:

Beef Broth is the soul of domestic cookery; it constitutes the most nutritious part of daily food. Besides being extensively served as soup, it is also the basis of numerous preparations: such as stews, sauces, purées, etc. It is undoubtedly the best of broths; ranking far above other sorts, such as chicken, vegetable, fish, and game broths.

STOCK-POTS.

The two stock-pots in most general use are, a tinued iron one, and a tinued copper one; these are the best, being more easily cleaned—a consideration of great moment; the quality of the broth depending upon the cleanliness of the pot—two other very general stock-pots, one of cast iron, and the other of earthen-ware, are on that very account to be discarded.

INGREDIENTS OF A GOOD SOUP.

I make a distinction between a broth for everyday use and one for extra occasions.

For the first take:

1½ pound of beef (leg or shoulder parts), ½ pound of bone (about the quantity included in that weight of meat), 3½ quarts of water, 1 ounce of salt, 1 middle-sized carrot, say 5 ounces, 1 large onion, say 5 ounces, with a clove stuck in it, 3 leeks, say about 7 ounces, ½ head of celery, say ½ ounce, 1 middle-sized turnip, say 5 ounces, 1 small parsnip, say 1 ounce. Garlic is sometimes added. I do not recommend it; it imparts too strong a flavor to the broth, which would, for instance, make it unsuitable for the use of sick people.

For the second take:

3 pounds of beef, 1 pound of bone, 5½ quarts of water, 2 ounces of salt, 2 carrots, say 10 ounces, 2 large onions, say 10 ounces, 6 leeks, say 14 ounces, 1 head of celery, say 1 ounce, 2 turnips, say 10 ounces, 1 parsnip, say 2 ounces, 2 cloves in the onion.

The soup produced under the first recipe will be found amply sufficient for four or five persons; if there be only two to partake of it, the remainder will not on that account be lost, as it will do for a second time; it will also be useful to have at hand, to add to the sauce when warming up the beef.

THE MEAT FOR SOUP.

The pieces of beef best adapted for broth are: all the different parts of the leg, extending from the shin, and including the rump; the upper parts of the shoulder, known as gravy beef, are also very generally employed—besides producing a good broth they make a good bouilli. Nevertheless, it is admitted that the upper parts of the leg produce a more nourishing broth than the shoulder. Ribs of beef are also used for broth; they leave a good eating meat, but are not fleshy enough to give a savory broth.

In instances where the bouilli is not required, shin alone is sometimes used; but I do not recommend it, as that part, containing more gelatinous than nutritious substance, does not make a good broth. It is, however, well to add about a pound of shin when the rump or ribs are used, for it will increase the strength of the broth, while the latter will, when boiled, make good removes.

Perfect freshness of the meat is indispensable; a dried-up piece of beef would not make good broth, or leave a good bouilli.

MODE OF PREPARATION.

The first requisite is a good slow fire: feed your stove well with coal, so as not to have to replenish it for three hours; and, when you do have to renew the fire, be careful not to hurry the boiling, which should always proceed slowly. Do not close the pot hermetically, as this would prevent the broth being clear.

After boning the beef, tie it round with string, to keep it together and in shape; break the bones with the cleaver; put the pieces in the pot first, then the meat over them; add 3½ quarts of cold filtered water, and 1 ounce of salt, for the small pot; or, 5½ quarts of water, and 2 ounces of salt, for the large one; put the pot on the fire. When nearly boiling, skim, and add ½ gill of cold water for the small pot, or 1 gill for the large one, to accelerate the rising of the scum. Repeating this operation about three times will secure a clear and limpid appearance to the broth; add then the vegetables indicated above, and, as soon as boiling recommences, remove the pot to the stove corner, let it remain there simmering for four or five hours, according to the quantity. The fire should be kept steady all the time, so that a slight but continual ebullition take place.

When the broth is done, take out the meat, and put it on a dish; taste the broth, and, if any additional salt be required, add it—but only at the last moment, when the soup is poured in the tureen, it being best to keep the stock of light seasoning, as this will always increase in warming up and reducing for sauces.

SKIMMING THE FAT.

Freeing the broth from fat is one of the essential points to be observed for its preservation; it should be done with a spoon while the pot is boiling on the stove-corner. The fat can be made useful for frying purposes by clarifying it on a slow fire for about an hour, and then straining through the gravy-strainer.

REMARKS ON THE VEGETABLES FOR BROTH.

The vegetables add amazingly to the flavor of the broth; but they should not remain in the pot a minute longer than necessary to be well cooked, as they will otherwise absorb some of the flavor of the broth—a fact easily proved by tasting them when they have thus been allowed to linger in the broth after their proper cooking. It will then be found that they have taken much of the richness of the broth, of course to the latter's detriment.

In spring and summer, vegetables, being tender, cook more rapidly; it is therefore necessary to make proper allowance for the difference of seasons.

COLORING OF THE BROTH—CARAMEL.

It is generally required, with reason, that broth should be of a rich, golden color; although not really better on that account, it pleases the eye—always a desirable end in cookery. The essential point in coloring broth is not to alter its flavor; I therefore advise those who value its quality never to use burnt onions, carrots, or similar ingredients, which only impart an acrid and disagreeable taste.

The only innocuous coloring substance is caramel, or burnt sugar, prepared in the following manner: Put in a copper pan ½ pound of pounded sugar; stir it over the fire with a wooden spoon; when the sugar is thoroughly melted, keep it boiling very slowly for a quarter of an hour, leaving the spoon in to stir occasionally. When the sugar attains a very dark brown color, add 1 quart of cold water; boil for twenty minutes on the stove-corner; let cool, strain, and keep ready for use in well-corked and perfectly clean bottles. Good caramel should be of a dark brown color; if allowed to boil too quickly it will become black and impart a bad color. With this caramel color the broth only in the soup-tureen when wanted; it is better to keep the stock of its natural color for poulette sauce, blanquettes, etc. It is always easy at any time to add coloring to it.

PRESERVATION OF THE BROTH.

The first requisite in order to preserve broth is to clear it entirely of fat, and strain it carefully; let it cool thoroughly before putting it away, and keep it in a cool place, without covering it. In winter it will keep sweet for two or three days. In summer it is necessary to boil it up daily and put it by in a very clean vessel.

ON PROLONGED COOKING.

With reference to broth I have often been asked the following question:

"Would not seven or eight hours' boiling produce a broth of more savor and better quality than five hours?" to which I answer: "By no means; after a certain time, when the meat is thoroughly cooked, it has parted with all its nutritive principles and flavor; and leaving it in the broth after that will rather tend to deteriorate than improve it; thus, to produce good broth, the meat should be done to a nicety—neither too much nor too little."

I indicate five hours' boiling for the larger quantity—but it must be understood that this is not an invariable rule; I have given the average time required, but it of course depends on the age and quality of the meat. To ascertain when the meat is cooked, try it, after four or five hours' boiling, with a trussing-needle; if this goes in easily, the beef is cooked, and the broth has arrived at perfection; further boiling will but spoil it.

THE LIGHTS ON GWYNETH'S HEAD.

I.

THE tide was out, and the air that blew over the long stretch of yellow sand was very fresh, and gentle, too, for March, which month does not always come in like a lion, but sometimes inverts the proverb. There was a boat high and dry on the beach; there was something that looked like fishing-nets; and there were two or three figures dotted about the sands.

All this Lucy Fernham saw from the drawing-room windows of the big, irregularly built house which stood in its own grounds, nearly a quarter of a mile inland, and which belonged to Sir Trevor Pole, master of the Redfield pack. There were a good many guests assembled in that drawing-room, and of these Lucy knew that she was the star and centre. She would have told you so very bitterly. She remembered, only twelve months ago, looking out of a cottage window on a wilder coast than this, and being superciliously questioned respecting the road by one of these very gentlemen who paid court to her so deferentially now. Neither, as a queen, did she always spare her subjects.

"You must remember, my lord," she would say to Lord Charles Fairstairs, "just such a coast-line as that, with the bits of white flecking it, down at Gwyneth's Head, you know, where you lost your way."

And my lord would fidget and stammer, and mutter internally "the deuce!" and outwardly twist the lady into the most winning of compliments. For Lucy was an heiress. I don't think she was any happier for that. Sometimes the fact seemed to have got into her life and poisoned it. It was always before her. She read it even in the invitation of Sir Trevor and Lady Pole, for had they not a son? And was not Sir Trevor notoriously half-ruined by the fox-hounds? She read it in the group of gentlemen that always gathered round her; in the deference which poor quiet Lady Pole showed to her; and she saw it, plainer than ever, in the tall figure of her uncle, Mr. Geoffrey Fernham, as he came through the folding-doors of the inner drawing-room, smiling when he caught her eye.

He was a wonderful old gentleman; straight as a dart, his hair quite white, his manners perfect, and his wealth fabulous. This was the accepted version of him. No one knew exactly where he had originally sprung from, or, indeed, much about him. Venturous theorists affirmed that his money was the result of mercantile speculations; others, that it had descended to him in the form of large estates in North America. But, at any rate, it doesn't so much matter where money comes from, if it is an existing fact; and Geoffrey Fernham's social status was unquestioned. He went every where; was rather deferred to than patronized; and if, through age and unconfessed infirmity, his popularity had at all threatened to decrease, he had recently sent it up above its former level by adopting his niece, and causing it to be understood that she was his sole heiress.

As he came through the folding-doors this evening he saw Lucy, as usual, like a queen holding a little court, and rather tired of it, just glancing toward him as he made his way with his accustomed quiet grace to a prie-dieu near her. For this extraordinary old man never lounged, or if he did, no one ever saw him do it. They were talking about the Redfield hounds, and the next day's meet at the Cross Roads, which was to be the last meet of the season.

"Ah!" said Mr. Fernham, "that's a place where they would have buried a suicide some years ago—for punishment, I suppose. It's odd."

Nobody liked the interruption, unless, perhaps, it was Lucy herself; but young Trevor Pole, out of politeness, asked, "What is odd, Mr. Fernham?"

"The prejudice that existed—and still exists—against suicide. Death is generally a painful word," said Mr. Fernham, carelessly, as though to him all words were alike; "but of all deaths the one called natural must be the most terrible. In your own hands the work would be instantaneous, and, properly managed, painless; taking place at the very moment when life ceases to have anything to offer in return for the burden of living. There was rather a good story in Blackwood touching on this. It's a long time ago, and was only the story of a dream. A very sensible dream, though. Suppose a man—take Sir Trevor here, for instance—has had his day, enjoyed all his good things in his time, and has now only to give up to his son, and sink into insignificance. Well, instead of dragging on the shadow of a life that was once good, suppose he ceases to be. There is no necessity to use hard words. He might simply cease to be. No one need inquire about him. He was; his son is. There is great simplicity in the theory."

Mr. Fernham looked up as he finished, saw the discomfort and perplexity on the faces around him, and his own lost its dreamy, abstracted expression.

"But you were speaking of the meet," he said. "It will be a splendid day for it. You can see that the sun will set without a cloud, and the wind is as it should be. Lucy, you will ride?"

"To see them throw off," replied Miss Fernham.

There was a chorus of exclamations at this from the gentlemen.

Mr. Fernham listened, and one white hand shaded his mouth. I think that the curl on Lucy's lip might have found its reflection there, only without bitterness. Bitterness involves, to a certain extent, suffering; and in Geoffrey Fernham's creed it was not worth while to exalt the little amusements of social life into channels for irritation.

"Perhaps Lucy is right," said the old man. "She doesn't care for leaping, and I do not. I was mad enough in my young days, but now—" "There's not likely to be a leap worth the name in to-morrow's run," interposed Trevor Pole, Jun. For which speech his guests and companion courtiers could have broken him upon the wheel, for why not, at least, make-believe there were gallant things to be done? "Unless they take the Mallet's Collar," put in Sir Trevor.

"That reminds me," said his son, "I met Archer Denison prowling about the Mallet's Collar this morning. I asked him here, Sir."

A dead silence followed this speech. It was certain that Miss Fernham had looked up with a sudden change of countenance at the name young Pole uttered; but that might have been mere accident. Any how, there ran through the courtiers an instinctive feeling of jealousy and dislike to the new-comer. Each one of them flattered himself that he was getting on so well with the heiress, and here was, at least, a possible rival. Had she known him before? What made her turn so pale when his name was mentioned? The evening had grown dull, and couldn't recover itself. Lord Charles was consigning Mr. Denison to a broken neck over the Mallet's Collar; Sir Harry Dedham, anathematized him as a pushing bore; and little Brandt—so called because he measured some six feet three—apostrophized him as a conceited jackass.

Lord Charles Fairstairs smoked a good deal that night, enveloped in a wonderful suit of green velvet, slightly dimmed; but he only asked one question—viz., "Can he ride?"

To which Mr. Trevor Pole, as soon as he understood the pronoun, replied most satisfactorily, "Who? Archer Denison? Not he. At least, I should say not. He's a capital fellow, and all that, but he's had a different training from ours. He's going in for an R.A., you know."

Altogether, I would not have given much for Archer Denison's chance, if his day's enjoyment had at all depended upon the new acquaintances to whom he was about to be introduced; but it did not. Sir Trevor Pole, standing at the breakfast-room window with a dog-whip in his hand the next morning, saw his new visitor sauntering about on the lawn with the two Fernhams, and he threw up the window in a temper.

"Why can't they mount?" he said to his son, who leaned against the window with a cigar in his mouth. "And why haven't you made the most of your chances there, Trevor? I can tell you I am hard enough pressed; and Lucy Fernham is worth winning, by all accounts, instead of leaving her to those dandies, and now bringing down this Denison to add to the number."

"And cut them all out," added young Pole, through his teeth.

"I must give up the hounds," said the baronet.

"I shall be sorry for that."

"Lucy Fernham sings with you, rides with you, flirts—"

Trevor broke into a laugh, and puffed out a cloud of smoke. Now the baronet couldn't smoke himself, and hated tobacco, so he drew back a little, and said, peevishly, "But if you add your brains with a detestable narcotic the first thing in the morning, no wonder others get before you."

Trevor straightened himself and flung away his half-finished cigar.

"Lucy Fernham doesn't flirt, Sir; that's a mistake. She condescends to let a fellow weary her. I believe Denison is an old acquaintance—knew her when she was poor, and that sort of thing. It doesn't matter whom she marries, however, since it certainly won't be me."

"Yet you might have a chance if we join forces for Italy, which we are sure to do. I shall go to economize."

"So does Mr. Fernham," said Trevor, with a laugh.

The baronet laughed too.

"See that our economy isn't after his fashion, that's all. I can't afford it. Here comes Gladiator; you take care of him, Trevor; he's too good for you."

"I'll take care," replied Trevor, nodding to the compliment.

Once fairly on the road, Mr. Denison fell back from his place at Lucy's side, and kept behind. He knew that he had been a good rider years ago; but he knew also that Miss Fernham had no idea whether he was or not, and he watched her rather curiously. At first she rode on indifferently enough; but at a point which brought the Cross Roads in sight she just turned her head and gave one glance at his general appearance.

"I'd give something to know what she thinks of it," said Mr. Denison to himself. "Not that it matters to me though."

And there were the hounds dotted about among the yellow gorse, and the horsemen lighting it up with bits of vivid scarlet which it is the fashion to call pink—and on the horizon to the right the long low coast-line of dull red sand; and in front the purple moor.

"It's worth coming to see," said Sir Trevor. "Take my advice, Miss Fernham, and follow the hunt. It won't take you into any mischief to-day."

Somebody interrupted him to ask a question about the earthstoppers, and when he turned round again Lucy was in front with her uncle and Archer Denison.

"I thought Trevor said he couldn't ride," muttered the baronet. "He shouldn't have had the bay if I had known."

But whatever Lucy meant to do, Mr. Denison had no intention of being in at the death. At the first check he found himself still close to the Fernhams, and looking on while some dozen horsemen craned their necks over a fence in front. One by one they reached the weakest point, looked, and rode on. Mr. Denison saw Lucy watching them with a gleam of expectation that faded into something like actual sadness as each one turned away.

"I'll do this one leap," he thought; "and then go home."

"Use the snaffle," said Mr. Fernham, who was looking at him; "not the curb. The old bay is plucky, but I've ridden her and know her tricks. She'll swerve at the whip and answer to the spur."

Archer nodded and took the leap. After this the hunt saw no more of him. He turned the plucky old bay, much against the equine will, and rode slowly home. He got his sketch-book, and wandered off along the shore and over the rocks, till the sun began to sink, and the sound of the sea to get fainter as it crept away. He was thinking of many things: of his profession and its greatness; of the hollowness of the world, and the poor pitiful dreams which, after all, only mock us with their false coloring. And, turning suddenly round a sharp rock, he found himself face to face with Lucy Fernham and stopped.

At first they stood looking at each other without a word; then something came over Archer Denison which he could not control; a sort of brief madness, it seemed to him afterward, and he put out his hand and said, softly, "Lucy!"

She just looked at him and sat down on a big boulder, covering her face.

"Don't, Archer! It's like the sound of the sea on Gwyneth's Head. Oh, how I wish I was back again!"

"Back again where, Lucy?"

"In the dear old cottage with my aunt—my duenna, as you used to call her, you naughty boy! But I forgot," said Lucy, getting up with a forlorn resumption of her dignity, "I am Miss Fernham, and you are Mr. Denison. Richard isn't himself any more. I feel like the little girl in Punch, Archer. The world is hollow, and my doll stuffed with saw-dust; so, if you please, I'd like to be a nun."

Archer might have laughed at the plaintiveness of the poor little unthroned queen, but he saw Mr. Fernham at a little distance; and so he said, hastily, "Lucy, you called me a naughty boy just now. Think me a boy, if you will; your brother, for instance. I want to know if you are aware what you are doing; if you understand all these devoted slaves of yours?"

"I understand that they want my money," said Lucy, simply.

"And since they can not all have it, may an old friend ask which is the favored one?"

Lucy was silent a little, and then she said:

"I am very miserable, Archer."

"Why?"

"Because I have learned to doubt. If any one is kind to me I think at once it is 'money.' It's very shocking, I know, but I can't help it. I can not believe in any one. Now what do you think of me? I am worldly, of course, and you give me up. This is another thing the hateful money has done for me."

"Lucy," said Archer, "when you and I picked mosses in the Kentish woods last May you were as poor as I was."

"Well."

"Well. Things are changed. I do not give you up; it is the other way. I am poor. Are you quite certain that this universal doubt of yours would never, in any case, touch me?"

The painful red came up into Lucy's face.

"I—I am sure of nothing, I believe. How can I be sure?"

"Good-by!" said Archer.

"Not yet. Not in that way, Archer! Consider; my lesson has been 'Non e vero' so long, and I have learned it so well!"

"Good-by!" repeated Archer.

"At least we are friends?"

Archer could not answer, for Mr. Fernham had come up, and shaking off a rather odd, foreign-looking individual with a polite "Poste restante, Napoli, for the next fortnight; afterward Rome," and speaking a few matter-of-fact words to the artist, he walked off with his niece.

At the drive gate he paused.

"You have known this Mr. Denison before, Lucy?"

"Yes."

"But then he is poor."

"He is—"

A half smile on her uncle's lip checked her.

"Never mind," said Mr. Fernham. "He is a phoenix, no doubt. But, Lucy, I did not bring you away from Gwyneth's Head to give you to a struggling artist."

It was on Lucy's lips to say, "I wish you had left me there;" but she refrained.

"Listen to me," proceeded Mr. Fernham. "I have put you in a position to choose for yourself. Choose well, if possible; at any rate, choose. I want to see you married before I die."

The word came with difficulty; it was hateful to him; it embodied the sublime climax of that suffering from which all his life he had sought to escape.

"However," he finished, "we will talk no more of it now. See, there are the lights springing up. Let us go in."

Archer Denison, glancing toward Lucy that night, went off into a fit of abstract contemplation of the girl who had sat on a big boulder only a few hours ago, and covered her face. It was altogether different now: she was holding her court, far away above him; bestowing her favors with tolerable equality upon Lord Charles, Sir Harry, and Colonel Brandt, Trevor Pole looking darkly on. For Mr. Denison she had not a word; and he could not know that she would go to her room with a sore heart when it was all over, to look out toward the sea creeping back again, and cry for the days that were dead.

II.

"Let us go into the country somewhere, uncle. This is too like the Ladies' Mile; only for the flowers."

Mr. Fernham had taken rooms on a breezy primo piano, professing always to economize, and keeping the joke up with immense enjoyment. He had escorted the untraveled English girl among the lions with praiseworthy industry, amply repaid, as he told her, by the sight of her fresh enjoyment. They had been through Castellamare to Sorrento and "done" Tasso's house; they had walked the paved streets of Pompeii, heard all about the skeleton of the priest before his altar, with the sacrificial knife still in the bony fingers—seen the fountains in mosaic; the temples and the great amphitheatre, which young Trevor Pole said made him wonder if his horse Gladiator was being properly attended to. They had submitted to be half choked with sulphurous clouds at the top of Vesuvius, and had inspected the "Devil's Kitchen." For Lucy's sake Mr. Fernham had even mounted again the hundreds of steps to St. Elmo and San Martino—and now he was riding, rather wearily, if the truth must be told, beside her in the Villa Reale, watching the carriages creep on, three abreast, and the exaggerated "swellness" of the exquisites who rode at a snail's pace beside them. And with the Fernhams there was the Redfield party over again—the English milord Charles, the little soldier, and the baronet. No one knew why they had all fancied Naples at this peculiar time; each of them agreed that it was "odd;" and each of them sneered at the others for persevering idiots who had no chance.

"I'll tell you where we'll go," said Mr. Fernham, suddenly. "Lucy, we'll drive to-morrow to—"

Lucy, bringing her sunny head so close that it almost touched his white one, whispered, "Hush! I don't want these men. We'll go alone; you and I."

And they went alone, along the coast to Baia, Pozzuoli, and the smoking Solfatara; till Mr. Fernham, suddenly putting his hand into his breast-pocket, said, "My dear, I forgot; here is a letter for you. You shall read it here, by the little Lake d'Agnano—it's pretty, is it not?—and I'll go away while you enjoy it. I wanted to see this place once again; to say good-by to it," he added, looking at her with an odd mixture of melancholy and jest. "Lucy, I have hated suffering all my life, but I did suffer here, once; and up there among the trees there is a memento of it."

At another time Lucy might have puzzled herself a little over this speech; but she held her letter in her hand, and knew that the writing was Archer Denison's. While she read it; while two tears gathered in her eyes, but never fell; while the beautiful little lake was blurred, and its emerald setting a dismal mass, Lucy went back a year of her life, blotting out the interval with that passionate despair which is so vain and so intolerable. Archer had sent her only a few foolish verses, but they sounded to her like a farewell forever. Moreover they came from Gwyneth's Head; and she knew that he must have seen the letter which she had written to her aunt in the first flush of her pleasure in the scenes which already were beginning to weary her. Angry that he should have seen this; angry with him, with herself, with every body, she read the lines again, thinking that she would tear them up into small bits and fling them into the lake:

"So orange and myrtle are fair for you,
And your northern eye can gaze
On a wave half dark with shimmering blue,
Half steeped in a golden haze.
And your cup is filled to the brim, you say,
Filled with life's sweetest wine;
Thus I take from your hand, so far away,
A thing you can not divine.
For your sunlit wave creeps chilly and slow
To break on a northern shore;
I would it had parted us long ago
For ever and evermore."

"Your dreams are among the clustering vine
That fringes some southern bay;
Shall I tell you now what I see in mine
As I read your words to-day?
The shadows that fall from a feathery tree,
On a Kentish lawn to play,
That are touching your cheek so tenderly
With the softest kiss of May.
But when I see it, dull grows my pen,
And weary my heart, and sore;
And I wish the wave had parted us then
For ever and evermore."

"Your hair is touched with the glimmering gold
As the shadows come and go;
Like memory's light on a story told
In the twilight, long ago.
From the dear, dear life that was all a dream,
I turn to your words again;
And my heart, where sweet lay the golden gleam,
Grows chill with a sudden pain.
For the wave is between us now, you say,
Since the fair May dream is o'er;
I would it had swept us apart that day
For ever and evermore."

"Well, Lucy, you have been long enough over it. I hope it's a proposal."

Lucy folded her paper with wonderful calmness, considering that a moment before she had meant to tear it up and throw it into the lake.

"No, uncle."

A shadow passed over Geoffrey Fernham's face. There were few of his acquaintances and enviers who would not have started back aghast from the thoughts and speculations which had occupied him during that solitary stroll. It was not his habit, however, to indulge in unpleasant reflections; so he shook them off and said, good-humoredly, "Lucy, I wish you would make up your mind. Here are four suitors at your feet; honorable, true men, holding good positions. They may not be very clever, but what of that? They are average. I was considered above that, and what has my cleverness done for me? I shall go out of the world without the regret of a single soul. Mind, I am not mourning over this. My object has been to enjoy to the very full all that life could offer, and I have done so. The question is not concerning me, however, but you. These gentlemen are all in love with you, Lucy."

"With your heiress, Sir," said Lucy, involuntarily.

Mr. Fernham smiled—a very odd smile, that somehow seemed to give a ghastly look to his face.

"At any rate they are my friends. They are going on with me to Rome. I should like you to be civil to them."

"I will be civil to them."

"I wish you would like Lord Charles. He's a very good sort of fellow. Try, Lucy. Hitherto, you have done nothing but queen it, but that can not go on. I have motives for wishing to see you settled. Give Lord Charles a chance, my dear."

Lucy did not answer, but she crushed Archer Denison's envelope into her pocket rather savagely. Yes, she would be civil to her uncle's friends. After all, he had some right to complain of her. She would forget all about her past life and the little cottage at Gwyneth's Head; and as to Archer, it was worse than childish to wear a sore heart for a man who openly declared that he wished they had never met.

So Lucy tutored herself into subjection, and tried to like Lord Charles. He was good-natured and attentive; she could not help seeing that her will was law to him. She wanted to get to Rome in time for the Easter splendor, and he managed this for her. He even went with her to hear the music in the Sistine Chapel, and the first Miserere in St. Peter's, though he hated music, and couldn't see the use of being made miserable by such melancholy sounds; and on Easter-day he, constitutionally an indolent man, submitted to stand from eight o'clock till twelve in St. Peter's, to hear the Pope celebrate High Mass. Lucy might have seen the hopeless weariness in his face if she had thought of him, but she did not. From the blast of silver clarions which heralded the Pope's entrance, to the moment when the papal troops drew up in the Piazza outside, under the balcony from which the benediction was to be pronounced, she forgot all about her companions.

As for my lord, he never spoke to her; the dead silence of so dense a throng had something awful about it to him; and when the cannon sounded from the Castle of St. Angelo, and the seventy or eighty thousand kneeling figures rose up after the Pope's blessing, he, stolid Englishman as he was, almost joined in the huzzas that followed, so great was his relief that the thing was over. It was at this moment that Lucy, starting from him, uttered a sudden cry:

"Archer, Archer—I am so glad!"

She checked herself at once, but Lord Charles had heard; had recognized that "snob" of an artist, and seen his face light up.

"Are you glad?" said Archer. "So am I then. It's a strange place to meet in, is it not?" He was holding her hand still, and Lucy, hardly knowing what to do, turned with a slight gesture of introduction to Lord Charles.

"How de do, Mr.—ah—Densil!" said his lordship. "Impressive sight, I suppose. Can't say I care very much for it, myself. Stage trickery, rather."

"You will call, Archer," broke in Lucy, hastily. "We are on the Piazza di Spagna, and—"

"Thank you, but I'm afraid I must be a very unsocial animal just now. I am going to shut myself up and work hard; harder than such happy fellows as you, my lord, know any thing about."

Lucy swallowed the little sting of pain, anger, and self-contempt, as best she could.

"Well," she said, indifferently, "I dare say you are right. Good-by!"

"Good-by!"

My lord, walking sulkily by Lucy's side, made a solemn resolution that before the day was over he would have his answer, let it be what it might. Months afterward he used to reflect what a lucky chance it was for him that Miss Fernham turned restive on the score of propriety, and insisted on dragging poor meek Lady Pole with her to the evening illumination of St. Peter's.

Mr. Fernham had been out all day, no one knew where. He came in before they started, and went straight up to his niece, drawing her on one side.

"Settle it with my lord to-night, Lucy."

He spoke in such a strange tone that she looked up at him and started at the dead whiteness of his face.

"You are ill," she said. "I will not go out."

He laughed.

"I never was ill in my life. Don't you take fancies, Lucy, but go, and come back to me—that is, come back to-night Lady Charles Fairstairs elect."

But Lucy was both tired and excited, and in no mood to take any notice of my lord's efforts to draw her into a confidential dialogue. There was, or she thought there was, something oppressive in the air; and she would never again think of that broad temple of fire against the starless sky without the shudder of a nameless terror creeping over her. She was haunted all the time by the strange white face that had looked down at her and laughed; and she was glad when Lady Pole confessed to being tired, and they turned homeward.

Lucy did not know what she was afraid of, but she was afraid. When she had said good-night to Lady Pole, and seen her walk away with my lord, she stopped a moment to still the unusual beating of her heart, and to tell herself that it was the heat, and the fatigue, and excitement of the day. Then she went into her own room to take off her bonnet; and from thence to the drawing-room. No one was there. A small pan of coals smoldered on a tripod on one table; for Mr. Fernham was chilly in spite of the warm weather. A taper still burned upon a smaller table; and there was a smell of sealing-wax in the room. Going up to this latter table she saw a neat pile of papers tied together and labeled; and near them a note addressed to herself, in her uncle's hand.

Still fighting off that strange terror of she knew not what, Lucy broke this open and read it:

"MY DEAR LUCY,—I have been a consistent man all my life. When I took you from your aunt I promised to leave you all I had. So I do; and it is—nothing."

"There is only enough to pay my debts. I have had money, and have used it—to purchase every good thing which the world could sell. I saw you when my popularity was a little falling; and I adopted you, as the phrase is, for three reasons. I should thereby regain importance, experience a novel sensation, and make a good match for my niece. If I have not done this last, it has been your fault, not mine. And my money is gone. I thought it would have lasted longer, but it is gone. I have always determined that when life could no more give me the full measure to which I am accustomed, I would know no meaner portion. I would cease to be. If you have neglected your chances with Lord Charles, and willfully thrown him over, I can not help it. I have still done you no harm. And in that case go back to your mother's sister; you are no worse off than the girl whom I took away and to whom I have given at least one brilliant year in her life. Good-by! I am about to lock myself into my room. You need take no steps. I have borne about with me for years the means of a death, painless—even luxurious—and certain."

"Your uncle, now—when you read this, no one!"

In the morning all Rome was talking about the Piazza di Spagna, and the English milord who was rich and yet not rich; who had destroyed himself. And in a fortnight's time, before Lucy had recovered from the shock of the most terrible thing that had ever happened to her, there lay on her table three of the thinnest possible bits of pasteboard, with "P. P. C." scrawled at the bottom of each. Out of the four faithful and devoted knights, only Trevor Pole had asked permission to see her, and offer her his clumsy sympathy and his good-by in person. And day after day, in sore bitterness and desolation, there came up in Lucy's heart the thought that surely Archer Denison would write or come to her before she left Rome.

But Archer was at the Café Greco, absorbed in his studies; and if fragments of the nine days' wonder reached him, he caught no names and took no notice. When he did hear what had happened, it was too late.

III.

On Gwyneth's Head, cold, desolate, and beautiful; a dark mass with a granite face on its summit; the lines sharp cut; the stone lips compressed with a sort of strain upon them; the whole face bent forward in an attitude of watching. And the autumn wind was freshening; the waves lashing themselves up before it, dull yellow on the coast, green and olive-green farther out.

Many a boat had been stove in, many a fisherman had gone to his long home here, under the calm face that never changed and never rested from its watching. The old people who had lived in the little town before it grew into the quiet, aristocratic watering-place told the story of the granite face with unquestioning faith. It was Gwyneth, a fisherman's wife, who had gone out to watch through the stormy night for her husband's boat, and had never come back again, but watched there forever, turned to stone by the sight of the broken boat on the rocks below.

In these later days a little lantern-shaped turret stood on Gwyneth's Head; and when the warning lights shone out at night, the lowest of them just touched the stone face here and there, like the white lights of a painter.

They were lighted now, though it was daylight, and they could do but little good. And below the rock, close to the pier, a crowd had gathered—a silent crowd, almost immovable, except for the glasses that were passed from hand to hand, and the occasional half-smothered exclamation. This crowd was watching the steamer from L—; and apart from it, on a seat sheltered a little by the cliff, there were two ladies watching also. The vessel had been at first only a dark speck upon the waves, but she was fighting her way nearer. The men on the pier said that she was nearer, certainly; that there was a chance for her. If she could only make out the lights on Gwyneth's Head and keep clear of the rocks, there was a chance for her; but how she rolled and pitched! and what madness to start in the teeth of such foul-weather signs!

"I am glad there's no one belonging to me in that vessel," said the elder of the two ladies on the seat. "Have you had enough of it, Lucy?"

Lucy Fernham turned her eyes for one moment from the sea like some one in a dream.

"Do you want to go home, Aunt Rachel?"

"Why," said the old lady, dryly, "it's not the very gentlest breeze in the world, my dear."

At this juncture some one offered Lucy a glass, which she took eagerly.

"There seems to be a good many on board," said the owner of this, steadying it for her. "One may almost distinguish faces."

So one may. Lucy, giving back the glass, said to her companion, quietly,

"There is some one belonging to you there. Let us stay, Aunt Rachel."

The old lady looked at her niece and refrained from questioning. Lucy was odd—the result probably of that shock in Italy, from which she had never recovered.

As for Lucy, when the glass was once more offered to her, she did not even see it. She saw nothing outwardly but the waves that leaped up on Gwyneth's Head, and fell back in spray into the boiling caldron beneath; and mixed up with this, like a confused dream, there came the May-day in Kent; the meeting on the sands at Redfield, when she sent him away; the vast kneeling crowd in the piazza outside St. Peter's, and a white-haired old man in a balcony uttering the Easter benediction. If she could but have had a small part of her life back again! But now it was too late; he would never know how true she had been in reality to her old faith in him; and here, underneath the lights on Gwyneth's Head, was to be the end of all!

"Lucy, wake up! There's no danger now."

A great shout rose up from the hitherto silent crowd; there was a swaying to and fro toward the wooden steps of the landing-stage; a policeman or two to keep off the press; and a few moments after that a voice she had never thought to hear again was speaking to her, and a hand whose touch somehow brought back the Kentish lawn was holding her own.

They did not talk much. The wind howled after them, and the roar and slush of the mad sea on the shingle would have drowned any voice of ordinary pitch. But Aunt Rachel was a discreet old lady; once within the familiar room at the little cottage she turned to Archer Denison, putting on her spectacles and looking him over as if he had been a natural curiosity, and said:

"So you have been hunting every where for the runaway! What simpletons men are, to be sure! As if the Poles, or any such people, would care about her now! But, Archer, she isn't satisfied with Gwyneth now. She wants to go galivanting off as a governess. It's all a pretense, I know. She has had a taste of grand life, and wants more. But there, I'll go away. See if you can make her hear reason."

Archer Denison sat silent for a minute looking at the lights which he had once thought he never should reach.

"Old Gwyneth gave me a rough welcome," he said. "You didn't think I was in the boat, Lucy?"

"I didn't think about it. I knew. Some one gave me a glass, and I saw you."

"Were you frightened?"

She hesitated a little, and then said, "No."

"I don't believe you; I won't. You know why I didn't come to you in Rome? You got my letter last week?"

"Yes, I had your letter."

"What is all this about governessing? You used to be happy enough with Aunt Rachel."

"That is no reason why I should be a burden upon her. I am older now, and I am able—"

"Yes, a valiant woman. Will you come and be a burden upon me, Lucy?"

Lucy answered, readily enough, "No, I will not."

But he only laughed.

"I am not afraid of you now. You were almost my promised wife before they made an heiress of you, and nearly spoiled a good man's life—that's mine, you know. But you can not doubt me now; there's nothing to doubt about: no motive but the old one. I'm not so very poor, Lucy, and am rich in hope. What do you say?"

"Well, have you settled it?" inquired the spectacles, round the door.

"Yes," replied Mr. Denison.

"And she is not going to be a governess among the poms and vanities?"

"No; she is going to marry a man of genius; to be great some time. And we are not going to travel about any more just now. When we go to Italy next you shall go with us, Aunt Rachel; but for the present—this is a very aristocratic place, you know, in the season—we shall be content to settle down under Gwyneth's warning lights."

THE WALTZ.

HE. The music stirs, her footstep flies,
SHE. So near, so dear! I meet his eyes,
HE. Her beauty swims before my eyes,
SHE. He sees not through my love's disguise;
HE. I clasp her mine to win and wear
SHE. Whirl'd through the dance alone I dare,
HE. So near, so dear—so false, so fair!
SHE. To meet his sigh upon the air.

HE. Her voice has music's changeful key,
SHE. No other's voice so dear to me,
HE. The airy dance less light than she;
SHE. No other noble, true as he;
HE. I gaze and mark as on she flies,
SHE. All else around me fades or dies,
HE. Another's image in her eyes,
SHE. Deep in my soul his image lies.

HE. Mid dazzling light and sounding strain,
SHE. Torn from his side my days are vain,
HE. We move united once again,
SHE. Gold is but dross, and life a pain;
HE. But when the ray, the tone depart
SHE. But oh! the world is strong to part
HE. Fly hand from hand, and heart from heart,
SHE. True hand from hand, true heart from heart.

HE. Then bid the harp be strung once more,
SHE. The music dies, the spell is o'er,
HE. Gleam, dazzling roof and shining floor!
SHE. He so shall clasp me never more.
HE. Wake, wake the light and sound the strain,
SHE. I dream his heaven of love in vain,
HE. Oh! let me dream her mine again!
SHE. Alas! I drop to earth again!

THE WALTZ.

BLUE BEARD.

By THEODORE P. COOK.

HE is not dead, for I am he!
 Nay, little one, you need not start;
 That awful closet is my heart,
 I pray you not to turn the key.

You hold the matter in suspense,
 You hesitate, ah! all is lost;
 The key is turned, the threshold cross'd,
 Now you must take the consequence.

Seven dead loves you bring to view—
 No wonder that you stand aghast;
 You should not dive into the past
 If you would trust that men are true.

Seven dead loves! a heavy load.
 You see the first, a little girl
 With violet eyes and teeth of pearl:
 That was a school-boy episode.

When college days gave life a glow,
 And tender hearts wrought rapid slaughter,
 I courted the Professor's daughter;
 That's she—the second in the row.

I scarcely know how it occurred;
 I spent vacation with a friend,
 And ere the weeks were at an end
 I loved his sister—she's the third.

A grim old lawyer taught me Kent;
 I made his mansion my abode,
 And spoke some words not in the "Code"—
 His youngest girl knew what they meant.

When Fashion's flame was all alive,
 Where Pleasure flung her golden haze
 Athwart the pathway of the days,
 I met and worshiped Number Five.

FATIMA ENTERS THE FORBIDDEN CLOSET.

phases in all directions; Offenbach's version we have just cited; and a poet gives us another metaphorical rendering on the same page with Mr. Homer's literal picture of the original turbaned tyrant, with beard of cerulean hue and drawn cimeter.

This effective tableau is very easily arranged. A room with folding doors is the best, as the frame-work of the doors forms an excellent frame for the picture. A screen of rose-colored gauze or fine pink tarlatan is stretched very tightly across the opening, so as to subdue and harmonize the tints of the tableau; this, however, is wholly optional. Lights are placed so as to throw out the light and shade of the picture; colored lights, when they can be procured, add greatly to the effect. Two scenes, as depicted by the artist, constitute the tableau. The first represents Fatima, with the fatal key in her hand, having just unlocked and opened the door of the forbidden closet. In an adjoining room sits Blue Beard, gloating over the success of his cunning stratagem, which is to add another to the list of his disobedient victims. Both are dressed in Oriental costume; Fatima is clutching the key to her breast, and eagerly pressing forward to obtain a nearer view of the strange objects of which she has but a dim glimpse, but the bare suspicion of which causes her to shrink back with horror.

In the next tableau the door is opened wide, and the ghastly picture unveiled to the spectators. The heads of seven young and beautiful women are seen suspended by the hair from the ceiling, each face wearing an expression of its own, which the artist has happily portrayed. The picture only shows the heads, but, as a matter of course, in the tableau itself, Fatima is seen in the fore-ground covering with horror.

The next picture shows the expedient resorted to in order to conceal the bodies, which are supposed to be severed from the heads. A piece of white muslin is stretched across the back-ground; the heads of the actors are thrust through this

WHAT SHE SEES THERE.

But yonder, where the maple-tree
 Casts shadows on the old stone-wall,
 And slumberous peace broods over all,
 A village maid enraptured me.

You see one other figure stand,
 Her memory will forever last;
 I hold her sacred since she passed
 The portals of the Silent Land.

So Blue Beard lives, and I am he;
 But come, Fatima, close the door,
 You can not love me any more;
 The blood of knowledge stains the key.

THE BLUE BEARD TABLEAU.

AT this season, when amusement is the order of the day, and even the most overtaxed allow themselves a brief respite from toil, every species of recreation is joyfully welcomed by the sojourners in country houses. What with riding and walking, fishing, sailing, and shooting, and croquet-playing on the smooth lawns, the days pass all too quickly; the evenings remain, and these sometimes hang heavily on one's hands, save in those crowded resorts where they are filled with hops and balls. In this emergency, tableaux vivants afford a fruitful source of amusement, being easily arranged and diversified by the aid of a little ingenuity, and with the resources which are afforded by any ordinary establishment.

That clever artist, Mr. Winslow Homer, has graphically illustrated a tableau of this sort, representing Blue Beard and his wives, and one which is peculiarly attractive at this period, when the music of Offenbach's sparkling opera of Barbe Bleue may be heard on every street corner. The thrilling story of Blue Beard crops up in various screen, and the loose hair is fixed to a rope suspended from hooks above. In this manner the bodies are effectually hidden by the cloth, and the optical illusion is complete. A piano accompaniment from the opera of Barbe Bleue may appropriately be played during the tableau. Other scenes may be added with good effect, as, for instance, the meeting between Fatima and her enraged husband, and the anxious looking from the tower for her deliverers, which gives an opportunity for the introduction of a new personage, in the shape of her sister Anne.

The pencil of our artist has illustrated one tableau of this sort, but there are scores of others which will suggest themselves to persons of taste and imagination. George Eliot's new poem, the "Spanish Gypsy," is rich in scenes which would make magnificent tableaux, the effect of which would be heightened by the picturesque Spanish, Moorish, and Gypsy costumes. Among many, we would suggest Don Silva's presentation of the jewels to Fedalma; the unwilling flight of the latter with her Gypsy father, Zarca; the meeting of Don Silva, Fedalma, and Zarca in the Gypsy camp, and the final farewell of Don Silva and Fedalma.

A very beautiful tableau is a wreath of young girls or children, called Living Flowers, and arranged in the following manner: A number of boxes, rising in height one above the other, are placed so as to form a circle; or a number of seats are arranged so as to effect the same purpose, reaching from the front of the stage to the ceiling in the back-ground. This circle should be ten feet in diameter. The boxes or seats should be entirely covered with white cloth, and the space in the centre of the circle with pink cambric. The "Living Flowers" should be attired in white muslin dresses, with low neck and short sleeves, and not very wide or full skirts. The hair should be crowned with natural or artificial flowers. The smallest performer must be placed at the top of the wreath. She must recline in an easy position, resting her head on her hand, with the elbow touching the box. The next in size must take her place on the box or seat beneath, on the right side, and rest her arm on the lap of the first child placed, her head leaning on her hand, her face turned to the centre of the circle, and her eyes raised to those of the figure above. The remaining figures take similar positions, until one-half of the circle is completed. The other side of the circle is arranged in a similar manner, the faces turning inward. A large wreath of ever-green, mountain-ash, or holly berries, ivy, and trails of paper flowers, is put inside the circle of young girls, and fastened up to their seats; and small festoons of flowers are placed between and wreathed around the figures. The light for this picture should come from the bottom of the stage, and should be very strong. The tableau when finished appears at a distance like a beautiful wreath of charming faces, and the effect is well worth the trouble of arrangement. The beauty is greatly enhanced by a rosy light shed by colored lamps. Beautiful fairy tableaux can also be arranged from the "Midsummer Night's Dream." The popular fairy tales of the day also suggest an endless variety of scenes.

A curtain must hang before the stage or open doors, to be drawn up when the bell rings to announce that the tableau is ready. The curtain is kept up thirty seconds—the longest time possible, as no movement must be made by the actors in the tableau. It then falls, to rest them, for the space of two minutes, after which they resume their attitude, and the curtain is raised for the same length of time. Each tableau is usually shown three times.

FOOLS AT FORTY.

MIDDLE-AGED fools are the most enjoyable of all fools. There is a rare sense of cynical enjoyment suggested by watching the vagaries of one who has approached the period which, according to Tom Moore, needs the moonlight of friendship to console it. You survey the movements of a young fool with an unalloyed feeling of contempt; but you follow the movements of an old fool with a kind of pleasurable interest which is proportioned to the extent and nature of his follies. In which sex folly deserves the most ridicule we leave to others to decide; but so much has been said against the middle-aged foolish woman, that we think it only due to her sex to leave her alone for a little while to level our remarks at middle-aged foolish men, who, in our opinion, are deserving of equal, if not more, contempt.

A middle-aged foolish man must be older than forty. The right age is fifty. He is then fit for all folly. Given a man of fifty with a strong predilection for acting the fool, and the most enjoyable of all spectacles is provided for you. His appearance matters nothing. If he be ugly, there is vanity to help him on; if he preserves the good-looks of his youth, there is vanity still. So whichever way you take him, he is independent of your opinion. Such a man may be a bachelor. If he be a bachelor his vagaries are comparatively inexpensive—from an emotional point of view, we mean. If he be a married man—but more of the married fool anon. A middle-aged foolish bachelor very soon wins for himself a kind of reputation in society. He will always be found paying attention to some young lady with prospects. Herein is one phase of his foolishness, that he allows every body to know that the object of his matrimonial pursuits is money. And that is why he remains a bachelor for so long a period. Girls find him out; his attentions are no compliment to them but to their means, they feel. Yet they do not repel him. He is thought so harmless and so good-natured that, in the absence of a better, his arm is esteemed good enough to take, his attentions innocent enough to be received, for the time being. Then again, his whole air is so unconsciously humorous that he is a perpetual subject of secret mirth to a girl possessed of the least sense of the ridiculous. This makes him an amusing companion. He would no more believe you could tell that he dyes his whiskers and mustache than he would believe that you could guess his age—or at all events imagine him to be more than thirty-eight. Yet he is old enough to be unconsciously fatherly in his manners, and this peculiarity, blended with an obvious and constant effort after juvenility, renders him singularly droll. If he wears a wig, his determination that you shall not guess it to be a wig makes you suspect it at once. He will twist nonchalantly the curls of it over his forehead, with just enough nature in the action to suggest at once that the curls are false. You can always detect his false teeth too. You might not suspect them, perhaps, in another person's mouth; but somehow or other, in the mouth of the middle-aged foolish man the truth is rendered obvious in a very short time. Then he has a knack of falling away in the right or left leg of his trousers. He would have you believe this to be no more than a habit, and he always recovers himself with as graceful a gesture as he is master of; but there is no misapprehending the suggestiveness of weak knees. As he walks about it is almost impossible to help thinking that only half of him as he now is goes to bed at night, and that he must leave the other half on a chair near his bedside, or hang it up on pegs in his cupboard. All this is characteristic of the foolish middle-aged man. Yet he is very good-natured, though good-natured in a fashion that makes his foolishness more striking. He is always the first to arrive at an evening party; always the last to leave. You will see him down stairs when the carriages are announced busy in helping young ladies on with their opera-cloaks, whispering funny things to them as he inquires whether he shall put the hoods over their heads, accosting the waiters with droll, stupid sentences in order to win a laugh or a smile from the women servants who hang about to criticise dresses and to pocket fees. At picnics he is the man who ruins a cherry tart by accidentally sitting on it; who picks nose-gays of butter-cups and daisies for the prettiest girl of the party, utterly oblivious of the fact that the prettiest girl has a beau by her side who is secretly wondering what "the old fool's game is," and what the "dooce" he means by this kind of intrusion. All this may seem very harmless, and not deserving of the ridicule we say it deserves. As to its harmlessness, Heaven knows! We would be the last to dispute that; but, as to its being deserving of ridicule, we do honestly believe that there can be nothing more absurd in this world than the foolish middle-aged bachelor: not so much from individual traits as from the tout ensemble, so to speak, of his life as it is presented to us at the period at which we first find him.

The more dangerous fool, however, is the married middle-aged foolish man. Here is a fit object of scorn, not of derision, as in the former case. The one mixes no viciousness with his folly, but the other does. If the middle-aged foolish bachelor flirts he only makes a helpless ass of himself—nothing more. But the married fool can not flirt. The only class of women with whom he can flirt are women whom he is permitted only to know outside of his own house, and with whom he can correspond only under initials or under cover of his club. Yet he is so foolishly vicious, or so viciously foolish, that he is incapable of drawing the line between himself and his family, and is sometime beast enough or fool enough to attempt to introduce his connections of the street to his wife and family, and get ladies—ladies in spite of such a father, such a husband, and such an example—to mingle with members of the meetings that society will allow only to be held at midnight, and in the light of the street-lamp. Middle-aged foolishness, typified by such husbands as these, are, of course, rare enough, and are only fit to be advanced as instances of what "fools of forty" will do, or are capable of doing. It is the most vicious, the most iniquitous characteristic of the foolish middle-aged husband, and is, of course, utterly impossible among men whose foolishness suffers them to retain the least instinct of refinement or honor. There are other forms of foolishness among married men, which, if not actually vicious, yet surely deserve a harder name than foolishness. One of these forms is extravagance. The foolish middle-aged married man lives only in the present, and knows not of such a word as to-morrow. He will waste the substance of a year in a single day, for the foolish satisfaction of making his neighbors believe that he is more considerable than he fancies they imagine. He will provoke the ridicule even of children by boasts, by pretensions, by claims to honor which melt under investigation, and by an amount of reckless ostentation which is simply inconceivable in any man who has lived. He will sacrifice all things to his foolishness; and, though professedly conscious of his foolishness, he is the devoted worshiper of it. Of course his foolishness is different from the foolishness of the foolish middle-aged bachelor. It is infinitely more reprehensible, because, while the bachelor provokes only laughter because he alone is the victim of his foolishness, the married man provokes disgust because others as well as himself are made to suffer through his follies. Most sincerely and emphatically do we caution women against marrying a foolish man. In his youth he may appear tractable enough, and inspire the hope that, as he grows older, so he will also grow wiser. But, unhappily, once a fool always a fool. Time, if it increases the size of the body, adds nothing to the brains of a fool, nor enlarges the heart of a fool. If a man is a fool when he is middle-aged, then all that we can say is, Heaven help the woman who is his wife. He is sure to be perverse, obstinate, reckless—a dubious friend, an unnatural father, a vicious husband. Let no woman wed a fool with the hope of making him a wise man. Should middle-age come upon him and discover him still the same vacillating, reckless, foolish individual he was twenty years before, then his wife will learn that through the time she has been living in hope for his amendment she will have to live again without hope; for one of the truest lines in English poetry is that of Young's:

"A fool at forty is a fool indeed."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

LOTTIE.—The engagement ring is worn on the first finger of the left hand.—The three front breadths of a gored skirt are put on the waist plain, with an inch-wide pleat at the seams. The back widths are gauged without pleats, or arranged in French gathers, made by alternate long and short stitches.

THOMAS H. AVERY.—Braiding hair into jewelry is a branch of the jeweler's trade that requires time and patience to learn. We could not give you directions.

JOHN H.—When you are in doubt whether the party is to be a ceremonious one or not you will do well to present yourself in full dress, which will always be a proof of courteous respect to your hostess, though the particular occasion may not demand it.

L. L.—A well-bred host or hostess will always take care not to eclipse his or her guests by any inordinate display of fine dress. This is a canon, however, of social propriety frequently disobeyed.

L. A. MO.—Woolen morning wrappers made in the long eaque shape, with body and skirt in one, are very stylish, as they have the effect of a gored skirt. There is a seam under the arms and in the back. Coat-sleeves, and wide "all-around" collar. Quilted ribbon three inches wide surrounding the whole garment is the trimming.

CARR.—If you mean by paniers merely the tournure or bustle we refer you to the New York Fashion article of this Number. If you allude to the dress skirt, we warn you that you are attempting a difficult task, and one that is seldom well done by unpracticed hands. The simplest arrangement is to make the front width plainly gored, with three or, if you choose, four other widths also sloped, and from a quarter to three-eighths of a yard longer than the pattern of your upper skirt. Join these widths by a band, two inches wide, cut bias, and corded. The bands are the proper length of your skirt. The long widths are gathered into the bands, producing a puffed appearance. A lining of coarse net is sometimes used to stiffen the puffs. Strictly speaking this is the Watteau skirt, but it is called paniers here, and fashionably worn. The real panier puff is formed by a cord extending from the side-seams across the back widths.

HOUSEKEEPER.—Tea will remain hot longer in an earthen-ware than in a metallic pot, for the latter being a better conductor conducts away the heat sooner. The better polished the metallic pot is kept the longer it will retain the heat of its contents, for the radiation of a metal is diminished as its polish or reflecting power is increased. If you want then to have your tea or coffee hot, you must keep your silver pots brightly polished.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The silk skirt worn beneath grenadine should be made separate, but cut similarly. It is simply a petticoat. The silk waist lining should be sewed in with the grenadine, as grenadine is not strong enough without lining to bear the stress on the arms. A trained skirt requires a different pattern from a short skirt as it is much fuller at the bottom. Ruffles of the same are used to trim grenadine. Yours may be prettily bound with purple. Ribbon for binding flounces is sold at sixty cents a piece of twelve yards. The Spanish flounce three-eighths or half a yard wide is much worn on trained skirts.

BACHELOR.—Hufeland says: "All those people who have become very old were married more than once, and generally at a very late period of life. There is not one instance of a bachelor having attained to a great age. This observation is as applicable to the female as to the male sex.... The greatest example of this is a Frenchman, named De Longueville, who lived to the age of 110. He had been married to ten wives; his last wife he married when in his ninety-ninth year, and she bore him a son when he was in his hundred and first."

A. M. B.—Modistes continue to gore the front and side widths of trained skirts. The back widths are full, and from sixty to seventy inches long. Use real thread lace to trim your black gros grain, with a heading of satin folds and piping. Lace is always valuable, and is more suitable for an indoor dress than fringe. You will observe in our plates that the corsages of plain silk dresses are very little trimmed. An epaulet and cuff on the sleeves is all-sufficient. A thick cord of white and black silk will make a stylish heading to your lace if you do not object to using white. The sample of pretty foulard which you inclose will look best trimmed with ribbon or satin of the same shade as the gray ground of the goods, or with the violet shade of purple in the figure. The Norderny skirt is a good pattern for walking dresses. The pattern reduced to one-twelfth the size, of course requires to be enlarged twelve times. Did you inclose money for copying wheel?

CORDONNIER.—In Harper's Bazar No. 4 you will find an illustration of boots and shoes from the French Exposition. There are paragraphs on the subject in the New York Fashion articles of Nos. 6, 30, 31.

A FAITHFUL READER.—You will find in the New York Fashion articles of Harper's Bazar, No. 33, a description of bridal veils.

WELL DESERVED HONORS.—Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales has appointed Messrs. WHEELER & WILSON "Sewing Machine Manufacturers to Her Royal Highness," the only honor of the kind ever conferred upon a sewing machine house. [Express.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

THE MOONSTONE.

A Novel.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "ARMADALE," "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," "NO NAME," "ANTONINA," "QUEEN OF HEARTS," ETC., ETC.

WITH MANY ILLUSTRATIONS.

8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

 The carefully-elaborate workmanship, and the wonderful construction of the story; the admirable manner in which every circumstance and incident is fitted together, and the skill with which the secret is kept to the last; so that, when all seems to have been discovered, there is a final light thrown upon people and things which give them a significance they had not before.—London Athenaeum.

The style alone would secure for it a prominent place among modern works of fiction. Its merits in this respect are apt to be lost sight of in the very remarkable plot, to the construction of which Mr. Wilkie Collins has brought endless ingenuity and labor. The arrangement of the materials is admirable.—London Leader.

NAPOLEON AT ECOUEN.—[SEE PAGE 726.]

DEDICATION OF AN ANCESTRAL LIBRARY.

We consecrate the storied place
Their hallowed feet have trod
Who smoothed the way where Liberty
Leads up the arts to God.

They sowed, we reap, and garner in Such lettered treasure here,
That sweet enchantments of the pen
Rule all the atmosphere.

Here silently the Poet's song
Perpetual music makes;
The forum, long since overgrown,
Its silver thunder wakes:

The Drama's splendid phantoms here
Move real to the sense,
As heroes that once shook the world,
And battling vanished hence.

Turn but aside, and overhead
Ægean skies burn blue,
And to his crowd of eager Greeks
Homer recites anew.

A step, and Science to the search
Her awful gate unbars—
The riddle of the earth is read,
The secret of the stars.

Kind Heaven, upon the finished work
Thy blessing we implore;
To fair and holy purposes
Serenely guide its lore!

Here may no tumult of the day
A troubled shadow fling;
Within these cloistered walls may Peace
Forever fold her wing!

FAST GIRLS.

THERE are fast women every where; but the fast girl seems to be more particularly an American product. A tendency on the part of the young, unmarried female to eccentric flights of any kind is effectually checked in most countries by parental control. This continues to assert itself vigorously until marriage. A young girl in Europe, except in England, where the social customs are more like our own, has thus little opportunity of indulging in fastness, or any other maiden vagary.

The unmarried American woman is discerned at once by the freedom of her manners. Her bearing, of course, is modified more or less by the natural disposition, education, and surrounding influences; but there is always apparent, even in the most reserved, that sense of independence characteristic of the republican maid. You see at once in the face of the most modest the well-assured look of the conscious will.

Without the least disposition to fasten European social fetters upon our daughters of Freedom, we would remind them that there are certain laws of taste and propriety as obligatory on their obedience as upon that of their sisters of monarchical England or imperial France. Liberty is not necessarily license; and the claim to the one is not to be vindicated by the lawlessness of the other. The American girl is no more free by right than any other to indulge in those bold coquetries, with indecorum, whether of dress, conversation, or manners, comprehended within the slang term of fastness. It is, moreover, a paltry ambition, and not without risk to virtue, to aspire to the distinction of being pointed out as "the low-necked" Bel Smith, or the "high-stepping" Fanny Jones, or the girl who drank a whole bottle of Champagne, or she who smoked one of Frank Tripup's fifty-cent regalias. These, or the improprieties they may symbolize, are too common to be considered any longer eccentricities. They are indeed fast becoming such prevalent characteristics as to mark the type of the young girl of fashion. Her essential defect is a vulgar ambition for notoriety. She will endure any thing but obscurity, and therefore takes care that she is seen, heard, and talked of by all the world. Her dress is accordingly flaunting, her voice loud, her words slangy, her manners obtrusive, and conduct audaciously irregular. All this may be, and is, doubtless, done without any overt act of vice; but it looks so much like it that the difference is hardly perceptible to the external observer. In fact, it seems to be the purpose of the fast damsel to assume the semblance of wickedness, for in this exhausted age the piquancy of sin is essential to awaken admiration; and hypocrisy, ceasing to pay its tribute to virtue, pays it to vice. The danger of this is obvious, for familiarity with the forms is apt to engender indifference to the substance. The effect upon manners and character, even when the last and fatal step is not taken, is exceedingly hurtful. The young maid, in dropping her reserve, loses her distinctive charm, and the steady eye and defiant forehead alarm those to whom the look of modesty is so alluring. The bold and flaunting girl can never become the orderly housewife and patient mother, for will she be contented to perform the quiet duties of home, and accept the secret approval of her own conscience, after having been accustomed to public display and notoriety?

It would seem that American parents might curtail somewhat the liberty of their children, without interfering too much with that independence of action so essential to the strength of character. Girls are allowed to consider themselves women too soon, and are thus prematurely emancipated from parental control. They are, moreover, after leaving school, permitted to remain mistresses of their own time, when they should be held in subjection to a systematic discipline of study and conduct. With less idle time, and a more watchful parental care, there would be fewer of those fast girls, whose eccentricities are becoming daily more remarkable and alarming; and who are destined, if not checked in their growth, to have a disastrous effect upon social manners and morals.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of a Fine Fortune.

MY DEAR FREDERICK,—I suppose that it is only courteous to congratulate you upon the fine fortune which you have received from your grandfather, and there are probably plenty of old gentlemen like me who are ready to advise you how to spend it. Whether a fine fortune is a good fortune is hardly worth discussing, for I have generally found that those who most felicitously set forth the advantages of poverty have never been poor, while those who do not believe that wealth is a snare have never been rich. My experience shows me, my good Frederick, that most of us are willing to be the camel and risk going through the needle's eye. And, indeed, the kind of respect which is felt for rich men, and the almost contemptuous pity for those who can not succeed, by which we always mean those who can not make money, are facts worth considering.

There is nobody, for instance, better known than John Plutus, and there are few men who are more generally thought to have been so successful. It is the good old story of a poor boy, who begins at ten years old to work hard; gets a scanty schooling; takes care of the pennies; swaps jack-knives to great advantage; pleases an employer of the same kind; "gets a start;" and by rising early and toiling late and always, doubles and doubles his dollars until he is enormously rich, and, according to the phrase of the time, can buy and sell railroads. John Plutus, meanwhile, is noted and indeed is known for nothing but his riches. His scant schooling has not taught him to spell correctly, nor given him any general knowledge; nor has his life developed any generous instincts or liberal sympathies. It has led him to think of men meanly, and to regard human society as a huge opportunity of a good swap. He is inclined to look upon a man who sells a foundered horse for a sound one as a man who is sure to make his way in the world, and he despises a man who is cheated, however plausibly. Yet Plutus is conspicuous and honored. His support for every kind of object is sought with deference. Mrs. Grundy may object to his coarseness at first, and to the relations who have not succeeded as John has, but she gradually surrenders. His coarseness she consents to regard as quaint character, and his ignorance and essential vulgarity as a pungent social flavor. She surrenders, and every body surrenders, while the object of respect is still the same John Plutus, an ignorant little boy, plus years and money.

Now I ask myself what is the secret of this respect? Are we so mean as to suppose that money is a noble object of endeavor? "Fiddlestick!" says my friend Pry; "walk through Wall Street, and see what a crowd it is! Any ninny can get rich, if he chooses. The contemptible thing is to choose it." But I answer my friend Peter with Sir James Mackintosh, who said: "I am ashamed of my poverty, as it shows a want of common-sense." The mistake of Peter Paul Pry is that of many otherwise sensible persons. It is not the money that is generally respected in a rich man. It is the implied sagacity, industry, tenacity, patience that go to the making of money. Of course I do not include people who make money in a lottery of any kind, such as a stock-room or a faro-table. But when, for instance, a man, informing himself of the supply of any necessary commodity in one country which can only be supplied by another, ascertains what has been done to procure it, decides to send for it, and realizes a great profit, he has shown a reflection, foresight, prudence, and boldness which are justly honorable. They are the qualities of a great soldier and of a practical statesman, and the money is chiefly precious to him, like the victory to the General, as the reward of the skillful exercise of those qualities.

You will pardon me, my dear Frederick, if what I say of the respect felt for rich men implies that it is felt only for those who make their money, not for those who inherit it. But as you do not expect to be honored for your money, but are already known and respected for quite other merits, you will not feel offended. I do not deny that there is a reverence paid to mere money also. The snobbishness against which Thackeray directed his great guns is not confined to a worship of rank only. There is a snobbishness of wealth which is just as contemptible. You will find enough of it. All the scions, male and female, of the great families of Fawn, Sycophant, and Parvenu will burn incense before you. Old Mrs. MacTermagant Fawn has one daughter unmarried, and she has doomed you already, you may be sure. The young men will be dining and driving you, and you will suddenly find yourself of great importance. It will be very fortunate if you do not acquire a habit of suspecting and half despising all who approach you.

Indeed it has sometimes seemed to me as if there were a kind of fairy spell about great riches in quite another than the usual sense. There is a shadow with all the light. It is what the philosophers call compensation. Do you love me or love my money? is the horrible question with which the child of fortune comes to regard every one who approaches. And I have seen the most charming young women who were conscious of being bewitched within their money. It was a golden barrier between them and the rest of the world. The confounded lucre colored every thing within the range of its gleam. It seems to me that Aurea Jones was one of the unhappiest persons I ever saw; for in the midst of her highest enjoyment she could not avoid the suspicion that she was cherished for what she had, not for what she was. If you remonstrated with her—and for my own part, Frederick, I confess that I improve every proper opportunity of remonstrance with the young and fair—if, as I said, you remonstrated with her, and reminded her that it was folly to feel so, and that she wronged herself and others by such a morbid view, she did not deny it, but she said that that very thing was part of the melancholy penalty. She said it was unavoidable, and she could not help asking herself: "If I were not Aurea Jones with a great fortune would these fine things be said to me, and would my society be so eagerly sought?"

I do not defend her. I think it is a pity that she should feel as she does, nor do I care whether other rich girls feel so or not. But it is nevertheless true that there is just this kind of penalty which a peculiarly sensitive nature must pay. My heroic Frederick, however, would probably take the chances of this also, and would prefer not to buy with his whole fortune the knowledge that what was proffered to him is probably honest. So would I. If Mr. Plutus offered to give me half a million of dollars upon the condition that I did not prefer my present modest resources, I should, so far as the condition is concerned, feel brave enough to receive the gift. Whether I should care to feel that I was under that kind of obligation to that gentleman is another question.

I think, also, that I should know how to pass the torch along, for there are two of my friends who are very poor, and who will, I think, never be what they might be, because they will never have money. It is true, my dear Frederick, and experience confirms it, that many honest souls are forever embittered and perplexed by the want of money. They are plants that need that tropic air. They can not bloom except in the soft warmth of ease. They do not require to be rich. They have no mean ambition to gratify. They do not want to have more splendid plate than their neighbors, nor to drive faster horses and excite the envy of fools. But their peculiar talents will never develop while they are compelled to drudge hard all day long to get food for a family. If they had only more energy, you say; yes, but they have not. Then they can not expect the prizes, you think. I will not dispute it. I am not speaking of heroes, but of a very pleasant class of people whom prosperity would make the most delightful social benefactors.

There is Claudio, for instance, one of the most guileless and charming of men. He has all the little talents that adorn society, and the most sympathetic and gentle spirit. His hair, I believe, is gray. It has, perhaps, been gray for ten or twenty years; but Claudio has drunk of the fountain of youth, and is an immortal boy. He loves all good and beautiful things, with the instinct of an artist as well as with the sympathy of a good man. He is married to his first love, and they are surrounded with children who do not grieve or disappoint their parents. Claudio has many fascinating gifts, but he has not money. His occupation why should I mention, dear Frederick, since you know it so well? You know, also, how it engrosses him—how he has no opportunity of gratifying his tastes, or of exercising his talents, except in the most limited and unsatisfactory way. He is fond of music and a musician—no man is more fitted than he to appreciate all that is best in the best composers. But he can not hear them. The great concerts are beyond his means. If he thinks of a Philharmonic ticket he remembers the book that his daughter so longed to possess, and the concert ticket seems an odious and selfish pleasure. He does not think of it again; but he does not hear the music. While you and I, my dear Frederick, go to the concert to kill time, and we yawn and chatter and snicker, and I have no doubt that we are the very persons who are requested by the indignant critics in the newspapers to stay at home next time, and not come to a public assembly to steal the honest enjoyment of those who have honestly paid for it.

This is but an illustration of the constant sacrifice which he makes and must make. He has no money, I said, except his slender earnings, and he has not the genius of success. In practical affairs his fingers are all thumbs. No man knows what he loses more distinctly than he; and no one is more uncomplaining. Yet he does not pretend not to want what he can not have, for it would be a foolish denial of his most characteristic tastes and habits. He is not soured by the constant baffling of fortune, nor by the reflection which he sometimes hears that his temperament is his fortune. He knows a great deal better. "Would not life have been rather more tolerable for Maud Muller," he asks, "if she had had no vision of her possible life as the Judge's wife? Since I can not go to the concert would it not be quite as pleasant for me not to care to go?" He asks these questions but he is not quite sure of the answer, for he recalls the lines of the other poet:

"'Tis better to have loved and lost,
Than never to have loved at all."

Now, my dear Frederick, if Mr. Plutus should give me the half million of which I spoke, the first luxury in which I should indulge myself would be giving a neat little competence to Claudio. It would sweeten his life and that of those around him inconceivably. It would smooth that wrinkle of anxiety that has so deeply furrowed his forehead. It would be like a warm south wind in spring that starts the sap and is the first tender persuasion of flowers. Money is the root of all evil, is it? It is not more so than fire is the source of all ruin. I will not refrain from kindling a cheerful blaze upon my neighbor's wintry hearth because fire is able to burn his house down. My dear boy, you have now what is called a good fortune. But is not the goodness rather in the use than in the amount of the money?

Yours, as you deserve,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FALL GOODS.

LARGE cases, filled with the gay, bright materials for the cool days of autumn, are arriving by every steamer. We have examined the earliest importations, and gathered from these avant-couriers some indications of the future, in order to give our readers the first reliable information of the fall styles, but, at the date of going to press, a full stock of dress goods has not been received.

BEAR'S EAR COLOR.

The shade that is to replace the conspicuous colors of last season is a brown garnet. This is not the purple garnet of two years ago, or the cranberry color of last winter, but a soft dark shade, such as is sometimes seen in seal-skin. It is distinguished, in French parlance, as oreille d'ours, or bear's ear. This bear's ear color is shown in velvets, satins, silk, and cloth, with feathers and fringes of the same hue for trimming. A deeper tint, called cachou, has more of the dead leaf brown in it.

GOLD-YELLOW AND BLACK.

Gold-yellow and black promises to be a favorite combination for the autumn. Brunettes, whose range of color is limited, have met with special consideration of late at the hands of the fashion makers, as all the new colors will serve to heighten their brilliant charms.

CHAMELEONS.

The feature of the season above every thing else is the ever-changing chameleons. In the lavish abundance of color, three or four contrasting shades are reflected where once all was uniform. We have not only changeable silks and gros grains, but poplin and woolen serges are made to reflect different colors. Gold and garnet are combined with every shade.

WOOLEN GOODS.

Serge is still in favor. All rough-surfaced goods are called serge. The diagonal reps is no longer its distinguishing feature. Changeable serge, with double fold, is sold at $1 50 a yard. Gold, with blue, green, or purple, Bismarck and blue, garnet and gray, are the colorings most frequently seen.

All-wool poplins, in narrow stripes of a bright color, with black, are shown for petticoats, or for the lower skirts of suits worn under a polonaise of changeable serge, $1 50 a yard, double width. Glossy poplins of high colors in large plaids are marked $2 a yard.

Water-proof tweed, a lighter gray and finer material than that now in use, is imported for fall. Suits of this new tweed, of Parisian make, with short paletot and gored skirt, are sold for $25. The trimming is cross-cut bands of silk. Material for the waist is furnished.

THE CARRICK AND POLONAISE.

The Carrick, or coachman's cloak of many capes, is a novelty in process of construction in Paris. It consists of but three capes or of several, as the fancy of the wearer may dictate. White cashmere circulars trimmed with black lace are worn at the foreign spas. As the weather grows colder those of embroidered black cashmere, lined and wadded, will be substituted.

Maniles are not yet received, but we are informed from abroad that the polonaise with looped capes will be worn. The Baschlik hood pointed behind, with lappets in front, will be an important adjunct of the fall wrappings.

TURKISH JACKETS.

Small loose jackets of French cloth, black, white, and red, have borders of embroidery in seed-stitch, representing flowers of gay hues. They are buttoned in front, square at the belt or vandyked, and are worn for breakfast and indoor toilettes. The price ranges from $14 to $20.

TRIMMINGS.

Pinked ruches of silk, cross-cut bands elaborately stitched with the machine, pleated frills, and fringe are the trimmings for dresses.

BONNETS.

Importations of millinery settle the fact that the size of the bonnet is not to be increased. Frames are as tiny as ever, but are made to look imposing by the trimmings with which they are laden. The conspicuous feature of the new styles is the quantity of trimming heaped high on the top. Feathers, flowers, lace, and jet all appear on one bonnet, and our foreign advices say that embroidery of precious stones is used to make coiffures more brilliant.

We are sorry to say that the fanchon is passing away, indeed is already abandoned by Parisian ladies of fashion. The new shapes have the fanchon effect; they frame the forehead, leaving the ear exposed, but are radically different from the triangular bonnet so long worn. It would puzzle a conjuror to say precisely what this new shape is, so completely is it concealed by the puffed and shirred material that covers it.

Let our readers recall to mind, if they can, the round coiffure worn by Ristori in the first act of Marie Antoinette, and further description of the "coming bonnet" will be unnecessary. Those who can not must imagine a round bonnet with high double front, or rolling diadem, and a broad half-crown. The frame fits the top of the head closely, and is worn far forward. A large ornament, such as a jet star, a full-blown rose, or a humming-bird, is placed directly over the forehead in the centre of a ruche of quilled lace. Back of this, and above it higher still, is the trimming, usually an erect aigrette of white heron's feathers, or short tufts of curled ostrich plumes. We have examined pattern bonnets from the establishment of Madame Virot, from the Maison Laure, and from Graux, the successor to Charles Marx, and we find the shape we have described prevailing to the exclusion of almost any other. It is said to have been designed with reference to the voluminous chignons now in vogue.

FEATHERS.

Feathers are employed without stint as trimming. Short curled tufts of ostrich are used instead of a long feather. Four tufts of different shades of a primary color appear in the same cluster. Aigrettes of the stiff white heron's feathers are stuck on the bonnets in erect positions, à la Marie Antoinette. Peafowl's feathers, the slender graceful plumage of the lophophore of dark changing hues, pheasant's tails of golden, red, and silver, the Argus feather dotted with an hundred eyes, and green and gold tufts from the breast of the colibri are a few of the varied importations. The heads of small birds with long bills and breasts are seen on many hats, and sometimes the whole bird nestles amidst laces and flowers. On one of Madame Virot's bonnets are four humming-birds. A wide feather fringe of shaded colors is intended for falls over the chignon fastened under the chin.

FLOWERS.

Instead of the tiny flowerets in vogue during the summer we have now large flowers, full-blown roses, pansies of the largest species, and marguerites of rare size. Shaded metallic leaves and flowers are brought to perfection. Grapes and the brown foliage of autumn are imitated to life. The crystallized flowers are especially beautiful. Crystallized dragon-flies, beetles, and cockchafers are among the ornaments.

CORAL AND JET.

Branches of pink coral can scarcely be told from the real Neapolitan. Jet in large flowers and leaves for bandeaux is worn again. Gilt and steel have disappeared.

COLORS FOR BONNETS.

A new color called Florence partakes of the tints of Metternich green, but is lighter, with yellow predominating instead of green. This light maize color shot with green is the fashionable chameleon for bonnets. The many shades of yellow from the light Prussian to dark capucine are so conspicuously shown in the milliners' rooms that they arrest the eye at once.

SPANISH LACE.

People who can afford the outlay of money consider it economy to buy only the best of laces, such as pure thread and Chantilly. Nevertheless, many ladies of fastidious taste wore the Spanish lace last season, and will purchase it again for the winter. Although a woven lace it has irregular meshes like real lace, and the edges being woven instead of cut it has the appearance of valuable lace. It is of the thinnest mesh with set figures of diamonds and flowers that resemble embroidery. Mixed laces are also shown, black embroidered with green, blue, or maroon. The colored blondes of the summer are passée.

PATTERN BONNETS.

A few notes of the model bonnets are given: A bear's ear velvet has a double rolling front covered with quilling of black lace. An immense rose and buds is in the centre over the forehead.

A drooping ostrich tuft over the chignon. Black lace fall in front. Sprigs of No. 7 ribbon.

A black velvet with curled diadem has a shirred border of velvet of the delicate new Florence shade. This green-yellow is displayed to best advantage in conjunction with black. Pointed narrow thread edging is over the forehead. A large jet star in the centre of the diadem. Black ostrich tuft and double bows of narrow ribbon across the back. Long suivez-moi of No. 7 ribbon.

One of Madame Virot's bride-like bonnets is of white satin and royal velvet. The material is in quilled shells, stiff and erect. A tiny humming-bird poises over the forehead, with on each side of it curling white ostrich feathers. Narrow strings behind. White velvet folds in front edged with white Spanish blonde.

A fall bonnet is of black Brussels net and erect folds of fluted satin. Thread lace interspersed with jet leaves softens the satin gloss. Two scarlet ostrich feathers stand prominent at the back. A fall of lace carelessly tied hangs at the side. Another tiny bonnet for autumn is of black lace with a coronet of large yellow pansies, and a golden pheasant's plume. An evening hat of white blonde has four small colibri for trimming.

ROUND HATS.

The novelty in round hats is the Sultan, made in imitation of the cap worn by that functionary during his late visit to Paris. It is merely a high, bell-shaped crown without rim or visor, and is not unlike the Nymph hat of last season. Ribbon strings, instead of elastic, are used to tie it under the chignon. A sultan of dead-leaf brown satin is puffed horizontally on the frame. Precisely on the top are four short ostrich feathers of different shades, falling down about the hat. A large tea-rose and buds at the left side. Pendants of jet are at intervals on the lower puff. Brown satin strings of No. 7 ribbon tie under the chignon, with loops and ends long enough to form a suivez-moi.

Another hat peculiarly appropriate to the picturesque French costumes now in vogue is called the Deauville. It is a triangular shape, pointed over the forehead, rising in the centre, and receding again on the chignon. A black velvet hat of this shape, trimmed about the edge with fluted thread lace, has on the right side four ostrich tufts of different shades, Magenta, garnet, maroon, and cachou.

Hats with rims have tall, sloping crowns, while others are flat and square. Names from French history are given them. There is the Valois, the Bourbon, and three of the Louis Quatorze, Quinze, and Seize. The rims are caught up to show a lining of pleated satin or velvet of bright color.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

Short suits will continue to be worn. A light cloth is imported for street dresses. Dresses will be cut similar to those of last season. An effort is being made to abridge trains, and round skirts of medium length are imported. The front of the corsage is heart-shaped, open almost to the belt, disclosing an embroidered chemisette.

Fichus are no longer worn with ends. Wide sashes with large bows made so that they stand upright replace the fichu ends. The newest shape is the Ninon de l'Enclos, combining the paletot and fichu, a sacque front with sash paniers behind. The trimming is gimp and fringe.

Many ladies of fashion have abandoned sashes as common, wearing instead a narrow waistband fastened at the side with sharp pointed ends, the bow at the side being what is called a sword bow.

High back tortoise shell combs surmount the large chignons.

The reign of the panier is only just begun. We read of three tournures filled with down at each side and behind.

A distinguished feature of foreign extravagance is embroidery of precious stones, emeralds, rubies, turquoises, and amethysts on sashes, bonnets, and dresses.

An excellent glove, called the Laporte, has just been introduced into the American market. Though new here, this glove has long enjoyed a great reputation in England. It is made of superfine kid, well fashioned and sewed; the current price is somewhat higher than the Alexandre glove, being $2 25 a pair for ladies' and $2 50 for gentlemen's gloves. The "Aline," a second quality by the same manufacturer, sells for $2 00 and $2 25 per pair.

For information received we are indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; PARTRIDGE & BALLARD; Miss M. A. PAGE; and Messrs. FISK, CLARK, & FLAGG.

PERSONAL.

It has been given out that Mr. MAPLESON intended to bring over from London, in October, his Italian Opera Company, but the latest rumor is that he declines to do so unless a certain sum is guaranteed to him. He exacts this on account of the extravagant salaries he is obliged to pay his artists—viz., to TITJENS, $5000 per month; KELLOGG, $3200; DEMERIE LABLACHE (contralto), $1600; BUTLERINI (tenor), $2000; FINENZI (tenor), $1200; SARTLEY (baritone), $2200; FOLI (basso), $1600; ARDITI (Conductor), $2000. All these monthly payments to be made in gold. Add to them the salaries of the compagnie, chorus and orchestra, traveling expenses, rent, advertising, etc., and an aggregate is reached far in excess of any thing hitherto paid an opera company in the United States.

On every blank wall and advertising place in New York may be seen life-size portraits of the Siamese Twins, who are to be exhibited this month at Wood's new Museum and Theatre, corner Thirtieth Street and Broadway. We are reminded thereby of an anecdote of one of those people who know every body and every thing, who, having been airing his wisdom, was asked by a crabbled person if he knew the Siamese twins. "Well," he replied, "one of them I knew exceedingly well, but I'm not quite sure whether I ever happened to meet the other!"

—Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS had the reputation of being a very unselfish man. Not more than two weeks before his death, while conversing with a friend, Mr. STEVENS spoke freely of his own affairs. "A year ago," said he, "I had so fully made up my mind to die that I parted with nearly all my money, and now, when I find I may last a little longer I find myself really in need of the ready cash."

—The Sultan has sent his little son and heir to Europe to be educated. He talks Turkey quite well, but the old gentleman, his father, thinks it desirable that he should learn something of the languages, manners and customs, etc., of the peoples whom railways have brought near to the Ottoman Empire.

—Miss KATE FIELD, who may now be regarded as one of the has comes of the writing ladies of this country, is described as somewhat petite in figure. She is fair-haired, blue-eyed, and would look fragile were it not for a certain indomitableness of expression. She is neat in her dress and personal belongings, and evidently takes kindly to fine fabrics and daintily-fitting boots and gloves. She has any amount of the go-ahead element in her character; sees her way to her object straight as an arrow, and has little patience with people slow of apprehension; is neither sentimental, sensitive, nor soft; and, if in command of an army, would rout the enemy by rapidity of movement and unexpectedness of attack. Writes well.

—Pope PIUS IX. has come to the conclusion to pay a special compliment to LOUIS NAPOLEON by admitting to the Ecumenical Council, to be held next year, a special representative of the Emperor, independently of any decision he may come to respecting the other Catholic Sovereigns, of whom CARDINAL ANTONELLI, with grim humor, remarked, "Who can assure us that the kings now reigning will be on their thrones at the end of 1869?" The Pope has a little matter to settle with Austria on the school and other questions, hence his ambiguous language as to the "other Catholic sovereigns."

—Newspaper folk in England are looming up in public affairs. Among candidates for the new Parliament are several who are or have been connected with the press—notably Mr. WALTER, principal proprietor of the London Times; Mr. ROBERT LOWE, an editor of that journal; Mr. MORLEY of the Fortnightly Review; Mr. MALL, of the Nonconformist; Mr. TILLET, of the Norfolk News; Mr. JAFFRAY, of the Birmingham Post; and Mr. GORRIE, formerly editor of a Scotch paper.

—Professor MAX MULLER, of the University of Oxford, denies the report that he is coming to this country as a lecturer. "Much," he writes to an American friend, "as I should like to visit the United States, I should feel that as a lecturer on language and religion I was carrying coals to Newcastle, considering how many excellent lecturers on those subjects you possess in America."

—The Rev. Mr. PUNSHON, the distinguished Methodist divine from England, was recently married in Toronto to the sister of his deceased wife. They came over from England for that purpose, such a marriage in England being illegal. Mr. P. proposes an early return home.

—Miss ANNA E. DICKINSON has availed herself of the leisure and quiet of the watering-places on the sea-shore to complete the novel upon which she has for several months been engaged. Of course it will ventilate her views on various social and political topics, and urge such reforms as she has advocated from the lecture-room. If her imagination and constructive talent are equal to her fine gift of tongue, the fiction is sure to be a success.

—When Mr. DICKENS was in Philadelphia he was so much pleased with Mr. JAMES HAMILTON's painting, "What are the Wild Waves Saying?" that he wished to buy it, but it had been sold. He then offered to purchase the original sketch, but Mr. HAMILTON gave it to him. When Mr. DICKENS returned to England he sent to Mr. HAMILTON a beautiful edition of his novels, with an autograph letter.

—After the marriage of PATTI with the Marquis de CAUX she received the congratulations of the PRINCE and PRINCESS OF WALES, as well as those of many leading members of the English aristocracy. In felicitations sent to her by notable persons of rank, and persons famous in literature and art, PATTI's wedding may be regarded as having been the greatest success ever realized by a musical or dramatic artiste. Although many eminent singers and actresses have been married to the nobility, none other has had her nuptials honored by the presence of an Ambassador as a subscribing witness, or received the written congratulations of royalty. It will be nine years on the 24th of November next since she first made her appearance in opera in this city in the character of Lucia. Among the wedding presents sent to her few were more beautiful than those of MARIO and Madame GRISI. The gift of the former was a very handsome and beautifully executed arabesque pendant, composed of pearls, diamonds, and large turquoise, with enameled scrolls, suspended from a large gold chain. Madame GRISI gave her a pair of very large and handsome gold and coral pendent ear-rings, the pendants being formed of coral about two inches in length, carved in the shape of Etruscan vases, with festoons, the top being formed of gold, with a solid carved coral bull's head.

—Mr. STRAKOSCH, having closed up his successful managerial career with PATTI, is about to engineer Miss MINNIE HAUCK through the operative shoals and quicksands of Europe. Mr. STRAKOSCH will enable her to pick up much stray cash, and make much reputation.

—ESTELLE ANNA LEWIS, a favorite authoress of this country, is having quite a merry time abroad. In a private letter from Havre she says: "I am very happy here, surrounded by books, etc.; solitude, writing, swimming. What a beautiful world of my own making! Life passes like a beautiful dream." The fair authoress, when the summer is over, intends to visit Lisbon, Seville, Cadiz, Malaga, and Athens, passing some weeks in each of these places. It is well known that Madame LEWIS is betrothed to the Count of ROBELLA, and it is not unlikely that their marriage will take place during the next winter in Genoa.

—Lord NAPIER, of Magdala, is a very religious as well as a very modest man. It is little to say that he is brave and clear-headed; genuine unselfishness and humility are his special characteristics. He shrunk at first from being made a peer of the realm, and his hesitation and reluctance were only overcome when he remembered that the acceptance of such a dignity would, for the first time in history, bring the old Indian (company's) officers and soldiers into the front rank, and reflect honor on a race of officers who pre-eminently were trained, educated men, and had gone through the fiery baptism of many a battle fought and won, and many a strong-hold stormed. The conferring of the peerage on NAPIER ("Lord NAPIER, of Magdala"), with a pension of two thousand pounds a year, to extend over his own life and that of his son and successor, has really and truly united the Indian forces and the Queen's regiments in a very remarkable way; and it is creditable to the Queen, as well as to her cousin, the Duke of Cambridge, Commander-in-Chief, that they have, in every possible way, indicated their admiration of NAPIER. More than this, the employment of Indian native troops in the Abyssinian Expedition has tested the loyalty of the Hindoo race. Their love for the General was intense. If ever England wants a General, as brave and skillful as any of the knights of old, and sans peur et sans reproche, he will be found in Lord NAPIER.

—Notwithstanding the fact that Mrs. GAINES has succeeded in recovering her estate worth $5,000,000, gold, she has thus far realized from it only about $15,000, consisting of a portion of the estate of JOHN SLIDELL, surrendered to her because it had been confiscated.

—DUMAS is always in a state of impecuniosity, notwithstanding he has earned over $700,000 by his pen, and is in receipt of large sums from current works. We have a little anecdote characteristic of his prodigality and his humor. A melancholy author went to him and moaned that unless immediately provided with three hundred francs he would have to charcoal-smoke himself and his two children. DUMAS rummaged his coffers at once, but could only find two hundred francs. "But I must have three, or I and the little loves are lost." "Suppose you only suffocate yourself and one of them!" said DUMAS. To an American this would have seemed a reasonable and practicable proposition; how the Frenchman received it is not quoted.

—Precisely the way in which the present Emperor of Austria made the acquaintance of his wife is thus related by a newspaper gentleman: In the winter of 1852, then fourteen, she was at Dresden, skating with her sisters. Suddenly an old woman, carrying on her back a load of brushwood, slipped and fell on the ice. The young Princess, followed by a gentleman in a white uniform, hastened toward her to lift her up. They arrived at about the same moment, though the Princess was the first to seize the arm of the old woman. When she had put the latter on her feet again she turned toward the officer, who was no other than the young Emperor of Austria, and asked him to lead the old woman, who had seriously injured herself, to the shore. FRANCIS JOSEPH, dazzled by the surpassing beauty of the young creature, with her flushed face, eyes beaming with kindness, and handsome skating-dress, did as she told him, but returned immediately to chat with her. He then ascertained that she was a cousin of his, and, although she was almost a child yet, determined to marry her.

—The recent decease, in Boston, of Mr. JOHN WILSON, has elicited from the press of that city several eloquent tributes to his merit as a man and his talent as a printer and proof-reader. To be a perfect proof-reader requires a knowledge of many languages, a familiarity with many sciences, and a mastery of style and forms of expression. All these acquirements Mr. WILSON possessed. He was not only familiar with the modern languages, but he was an authority on Greek accents and Hebrew points, and he was often at the cases setting up matter which no person in the office but himself could understand. Many a young author, and many old writers also, have had lessons in style from his lips and his proof-sheets, for which they have occasion to revere his memory. And all this instruction was imparted with such kindness and fatherly solicitude! The idea that he was working for money, at so much a thousand ems, would never suggest itself in intercourse with him. There was no limit to his patience under delays, and to his care that a work should appear without fault in matter and style, as well as in typography. It was nothing to him that the press was waiting if a question of fact or date was undecided, and no one was more keen to detect such errors in the last revision than himself. If he had been less conscientious, he would have made more money; but he would not have been par excellence the "Printer" of the land.

—So well satisfied are the Universalists of Cavendish, Vermont, with the ministrations of the Rev. Miss DAMON, that they have hired that clergywoman to preach to them another year. It is pleasant to hear the Word preached by a pretty woman. Miss DAMON has not yet found her Pythias.

—Mr. G. M. TOWLE has made a little tour to the homes of several of the "American Literati," and written sketches of their personal surroundings. Down at Mr. LONGFELLOW's, which he thinks is one of the finest mansions in the country, visitors are admitted to the house at seasonable hours. The poet's hospitality is proverbial. You may see him through a half-open door, busy at his desk; you may find him frolicking with his children in the hall; it is not even unlikely he may come out and welcome you, though a stranger, and with winning courtesy offer to guide you through the rooms which have a peculiar interest. On the left, as you enter, is the poet's study; on the right, the parlors; at the back of the study, the dining-room. There is little to describe; it suffices to say that the interior is what the exterior has promised—home-like simplicity and comfort. Low, studded rooms; a wide, cheerful-looking hall; parlors substantial and cozy, with certain little indications here and there of the presence of a scholar, and of a home-like womankind. The study of the poet is simple and elegantly furnished; a high desk near the window, where Mr. LONGFELLOW sometimes writes standing, is, it may be conjectured, that piece of furniture which will be most valuable as a relic—if, as may be the case, it is hereon that his poems are written.

—"GRACE GREENWOOD" is said to be on the shady side of forty, with fallow, but clear complexion, deep brown, sparkling eyes, nose with unmistakable aquiline arch, and quite beautiful. She dresses in plain and simple, but elegant and faultless style, with blue or purple flowers in her hair when such posies are obtainable.

Crochet Border with Fringe.

This border is especially suitable for trimming bed and table covers, curtains, etc. It is crocheted with coarse knitting-cotton. Work, first, the rosettes singly as follows: Make a foundation of 4 ch. (chain stitches), join these in a round and crochet thereon,

Fig. 1.—CROCHET FRINGE FOR TIDIES, ETC.

1st round.—7 sc. (single crochet). 2d round.—In each stitch of the former round crochet 2 sc. 3d round.—* Putting the needle through the front vein of the next sc., work 5 dc. (double crochet); through the front vein of the following stitch 1 sc. From * repeat six more times. 4th round.—Put the needle always through the back vein of a stitch of the second round, and crochet in each stitch 1 dc., and after this always 1 ch. 5th round.—Like the third round, but in working always put the needle through the former vein of the dc. of the round just finished; besides this, 2 sc. follow every 5 dc. in this round. 6th round.—Like the fourth round, but put the needle through the back veins of the stitches of the fourth round. 7th round.—* 2 sc. in the next two stitches of the former round (always putting the needle through the front veins of the stitches), and always 3 dc. in the two following stitches. Repeat from *. 8th round.—Alternately 1 dc. in the back vein of a stitch of the 6th round, 1 ch., passing over one stitch. 9th round.—Like the 7th round. 10th round.—Alternately 1 dc., 1 ch., 1 dc., 2 ch.; in working the ch. pass over only one stitch of the 8th round. 11th round.—Around every 2 ch. of the former round work 7 dc., around each ch. only 1 sc. This completes a rosette.

The remaining rosettes are crocheted in the same manner, but, in working the last round, the rosettes must be fastened to each other by means of two of the scallops, or they can be left without fastening and sewed together after ward.

Fig. 4.—FLOWER AND LEAVES FOR BEAD BASKET. FULL SIZE.

Next work the part which joins the upper part of the rosettes as follows: crochet 2 dc. (double crochet) in the middle stitches of the first of the two scallops which lie just before the scallops of the rosette already joined, 2 sdc. (short double crochet) in the middle stitches of the next of the two scallops, 2 dc. in that scallop of the next rosette which immediately follows the scallops already joined, 2 dc. in the following scallop, 2 ch., 1 sc. in the first crocheted dc. Then cut and fasten the thread.

Fig. 1.—KNITTED SQUARE FOR COVERLET OR TABLE-COVER.

Having in this manner formed the figures between the rosettes, crochet next the upper part: * 1 dc. in the middle stitch of the scallop which had taken up the last 2 dc., 5 ch., 1 sc. in the middle stitch of the next scallop, 5 ch., 1 sc. in the middle stitch of the next scallop, 5 ch., 1 dc. in the middle stitch of the scallop which took up the first 2 dc. of the connecting part, 5 ch., 1 dc. in the next 2 ch., 5 ch. From * repeat. On this follow three rounds crossed dc. separated always by 2 ch. and the same number of stitches' space.

Lastly, work the head of the tassel, which is fastened in the midst of the rosettes. Make a foundation of 9 ch., join this in a round and crochet on it 16 sc. Then work six rounds sl. (slip stitch) with the same number of stitches, fasten the thread, turn the work so that the wrong side shall be on the outside, and fasten on a strand of threads four inches long by sewing the stitches of the last round fast to the threads. Finally, sew the tassel in the centre of the rosette as shown by the illustration.

Crochet Fringes for Tidies.

THESE fringes are worked of finer or coarser thread according to the object for which they are designed. For the first round of Fig. 1 work as follows: * 100 ch. (chain), then 1 sc. (single crochet) in the first of these. Repeat from * till the fringe has reached the requisite length, working from left to right. Then work the 2d round.—1 sc. in every sc. and in every ch. of the 1st round which the sc. took up. 3d round.—1 sc. in the first sc. of the former round; * 1 leaflet, that is 6 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) in the second of the 6 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) in the first of the 6 ch. Both stitches are worked off together, 1 leaflet passing over 6 stitches, 1 sc. in the next stitch. Repeat from *. 4th round.—Like the 3d round, the sc. are, however, crocheted in the vein of the stitch between the two leaflets. 5th round.—Alternately 1 sc. in the vein of the stitch between two leaflets, 6 ch. 6th round.—In every stitch 1 sc.

Fig. 2.—For this fringe make a foundation of the requisite length, and crochet a round in single crochet. In the next round form the strands of the fringe. In doing this crochet in the first stitch of the former round 1 sc., and draw out the loop formed by working off this stitch till it is of the length desired for the fringe, then take a loop out of the same stitch in which was crocheted the sc., work 1 ch., and draw this out till it has reached the length of the first fringe strand. In each following sc. of the former round crochet next, in the same manner as the two stitches just described, two stitches, of which the loops are to be drawn out at the same length. The stitches of this round must be firmly crocheted. Then crochet on the other side of the foundation five rounds single crochet, always putting the needle through both upper veins of the stitches of the preceding round. In the 4th round, however, work the raised dc., which are always crocheted after a space of three stitches, and always in the upright vein of a stitch of the first of these five rounds. The direction of the dc. stitches is shown by the illustration; the two dc. which meet are always worked off together. Lastly, even off the fringe.

Crystal Bead Basket.
See illustration, page 724.

This pretty little basket consists of flowers, leaves, and grapes of fine crystal beads strung on a silver wire, and forms a very effective relief over the blue glass dish which serves as the foundation of the basket. The wire foundation is in the form shown by Fig. 2. This is wound with cotton and afterward with crystal beads. This frame-work is twenty inches around the upper edge; the circumference of the bottom is twelve inches, and the entire height (including the handle) is six inches. At each side of the basket, and concealing the places where the handle is set on, is arranged a twig of grapes and leaves, as shown by Fig. 3. The grapes are made singly, and afterward fastened by means of a thread. These are composed of a milk-white bead, which is covered with the crystal beads. The leaves and tendrils are worked as shown by Fig. 3. The spaces between the bunches of grapes are trimmed with a large five-leaved flower. Cut for the foundation of this, by reference to Fig. 4, a piece of gummed linen; cover this crosswise, each leaf on the upper side, with two layers of beads, not, however, entirely reaching the outer edge of the leaf, then a third layer lengthwise, as shown by the illustration. The cross rows of beads must lie somewhat higher in the middle of the leaves, so as to give them an arched appearance. The centre of the flower is also covered with two rows of beads, one lying crosswise over the other. For the filaments of the flower arrange five bead cords as shown by Fig. 4. The other leaves are made in the same manner. The tendrils, as well as the remaining small leaves which fill out the rest of the space between grapes and flowers, are easily made with the assistance of Fig. 1. A heavy blue glass dish completes this pretty ornament.

See illustration, page 724.

The square, Fig. 1, is used for bed and cradle covers when knitted of material as coarse as that shown by the pattern; knitted of fine thread, it may be used also for table-covers or antimacassars. Fig. 2 shows the manner in which the squares are set together. Begin on one corner with a foundation of three stitches, and knit with these two rounds plain. The first stitch of every round is slipped. In the next, the first pattern row of the square, which is also knitted plain, begins the widening. This always occurs after the first and before the last stitch of a round, and is repeated in every other round. For this knit at the beginning of the round the first upright vein of the second stitch of the round before the last; at the end of the round the second perpendicular vein of a stitch of the round before the last. The 4th round is knitted plain without widening. In the 5th plain round begins the first figure. For this throw the thread once around the needle on both sides of the middle stitch of this round. In the next (6th) round purl the threads which were thrown around the needle as well as the stitch between them, and knit the remaining stitches plain. This throwing the thread around is repeated in the 7th, 9th, and 11th rounds at both sides of the added stitches, so that the figures are widened by two stitches in every round knitted over these. These must all be plain on the right side of the work. When the figure counts nine stitches, knit in the 13th, 15th, and 17th rounds the last two and first two stitches together, and in the 19th round the three remaining stitches of the figure as one stitch, by doing which it retains its oval form and stands out raised. The 20th round is knitted plain; the foundation must then count 21 stitches in width. In the 21st round begins the second pattern row, the first figure with the

5th (counting in the added stitches), the second figure with the 18th stitch of the round. The figures are all knitted in the same manner. Continue the work by reference to the pattern. As will be seen the position of the figures alternate. Every two figures are separated by twelve stitches space. When four such rows of figures have been completed (the work must then count 68 rounds and 69 stitches in width) the square is half finished. In the other half narrow to correspond with the widening of the first half; for this last half knit alternately four rounds which appear plain on the right side and five rounds which appear purled on the right side. The first of these last five rounds forms a row of holes, and is knitted as follows: alternately knit two stitches together, throw the thread around. This design is continued till the square is completed. The squares are crocheted together on the wrong side in the manner shown by Fig. 2.

Worsted Borders for Tidies, Under-Skirts, etc.

THESE patterns may be knitted with fine or coarse worsted, according to the object for which they are designed.

Fig. 1.—The number of stitches for this design must be divisible by 21: knit as follows: 1st round.—* Throw the thread around the needle, knit 1 crossed, five times alternately purl 3, knit 1 crossed. Repeat from * to the end of the round. The repeating from * takes place in every round of this description, therefore we shall not mention it again. 2d round.—* Knit 1, five times alternately knit 1 crossed, purl 3, then knit 1 crossed. 3d round.—* Throw the thread around, knit 1, throw the thread around, knit 1 crossed, five times alternately purl 3, knit 1 crossed. 4th round.—* Knit 3, five times alternately knit 1 crossed, purl 1, purl 2 together, then knit 1 crossed. 5th round.—* Throw the thread around, knit 1, throw the thread around, knit 2 together, throw Garden of the Tuileries, at the Pont Royal. Whoever comes first shall await the others on the Terrace des Feuillants."

The three girls shook hands in confirmation of the promise.

"On the 17th of August, 1817," said George, counting on his fingers. "Well, God willing, I will put on my Sunday clothes on that day, and see you all again."

A few days later the three friends separated, and all left Ecouen.

III.

On the 17th of August, 1817, as the clock of the Tuileries struck seven, a brilliant equipage stopped at the Pont Royal. A young and beautiful woman, leading by the hand a little girl, and followed by an elderly lady, alighted from the carriage.

"Mamma," said the child, "why have you come to the Garden to-day, when no one is here? I see no ladies nor children. Why is it, mamma?"

"I will tell you another time," answered the lady, as she looked around anxiously and searchingly. Then she turned to her companion with the words:

"Madame Germain, will you be kind enough to take my little Hortense into the Orange Path? I shall be engaged here for about an hour."

As soon as they had disappeared in the direction indicated, the young Duchess walked hastily toward the Terrace des Feuillants.

"Not here," she said to herself; "neither of them here? In one, I can unfortunately explain it; but the other!—oh, Clara! And yet I am the same—unchanged as then!"

"I must indeed be very much changed that even Marie does not recognize me," said a timid voice.

The lady turned and perceived a woman whose dress, though exquisitely neat, nevertheless told that she belonged to the poorer classes, and whose pale cheeks were furrowed with care. For a moment she threw a searching glance at the features of the stranger, and then cried:

"Clara, my Clara! Oh, how you are changed! My dear, dear friend! What does it mean? What sad fate do I read in your face?"

"A sad, but not unusual one," replied Clara, weeping, as she suffered the warm embraces of her friend, and allowed herself to be led to the nearest bench. "I am ashamed of my weakness, but this meeting awakens so many sad recollections. Who could have believed, Marie, when we separated at Ecouen, that we should become so entirely separated, and that in our reunion, which we almost childishly planned for to-day, one of us would be wanting? When you went into the country to remain with your blind father, while your husband, under the Emperor's colors—"

"but here the voice broke down, and, throwing an anxious look around, she added: "our Emperor, for is he not that still to us, Marie, our good, loving father of Ecouen?—when you went into the country, and Hortense left Paris, in order to ascend a throne, I alone of us three remained in Paris, plunged in a vortex of pleasure, out of which I finally awoke to find myself impoverished, my father dead, and my husband bankrupt. He did not long survive his misfortunes. For three years I have been a widow with my one child. Now you know all the outward circumstances of my life, and now—"

"And now, dear Clara," interrupted Marie, smiling sadly, "you wish to hear my history? It is soon told. My husband rose from the rank of lieutenant to that of general. You know that we both belonged to old emigrant families, and that the restoration of the Bourbons gave us back our titles and possessions. From that time forward I have made every effort to discover you. Tell me, Clara, how was it possible that all my attempts should have been unavailing?"

"Because I was equally anxious to hide myself from you—I, who laughed over your prophecies, and would not believe that circumstances could have any power to separate us. But our positions had changed, therefore I avoided you."

"False friend," answered Marie, "how can you say that to me? But you shall make amends now! Think of Ecouen and our perfect confidence. Yes, Clara, we must renew our old life, and share every thing—house, home, and heart!"

Clara would have made a gesture of refusal, but Marie continued more earnestly:

"No, Clara, you have but one choice! You can not be my friend if you refuse to share my home with me. But I am too anxious in my own interest, and, perhaps, ought not to urge you so strongly."

"You have conquered," replied Clara, in tears. "Perhaps I have already abused your friendship by so studiously avoiding you, for I followed my heart more than my judgment when I persuaded myself that it was my duty to fulfill our vow, and await you here to-day."

A short silence ensued—the silence of satisfied love. Both broke it at the same instant with the involuntary cry: "Hortense!" Then followed another silence crowded with painful recollections.

At this moment an old man in the dress of a peasant approached and accosted them:

"Pardoa, I am waiting for two young ladies who promised to be here to-day."

"Here we are, my good George," said the young Duchess, "for you are surely the gardener from Ecouen?"

"I am, indeed, and have long been so. But I should not have known either of you, you are so changed. It is ten years, just ten years; and I have fulfilled my duty and appeared here as I promised. You are waiting for the third? She can not come, but has intrusted me with this to bring to you."

The old man produced a letter and two caskets. Hastily opening the latter the friends found in each the half of a withered laurel wreath. The letter read as follows:

"Of all the crowns that my family have worn this is the lightest and most imperishable. I send it to you my sisters, my happy sisters—happy that it is not forbidden you to tread your native soil and breathe your native air. Pray for the poor exile."

"Hortense."

Their tears fell over the letter and the crown of the unfortunate queen. Madame Germain returned with the child. They entered the carriage and drove to Marie's home. The closest friendship united them during the remainder of their lives, but they never again beheld their unfortunate friend Hortense, the beautiful Queen of Holland, who, unloved and unwept by her husband, found an early grave in a strange land.

HINTS UPON CROQUET.

By A COMMITTEE OF CROAKERS.

THE following hints have been drawn up in accordance with the practice of several successful players of our acquaintance:

When you arrive at the lawn look over the implements, and if there is a crooked or a crazy mallet among them, or a ball that is cracked or bruised, or not well turned, take care not to be on the side to which these belong. Perhaps they have been provided on purpose, and do not you be the victim.

Upon your own lawn, if any one brings a heavier mallet than yours, either take him upon your side or forbid his using it. Upon a strange lawn, under the same circumstances, refuse to play till it is laid aside.

Upon your own lawn you will, of course, place the best players upon the side that you join, or you will weight the opposite side with one who has never had a mallet in his hand before, or with one of peevish temper who will not be told what to do, or is inattentive to the game, or a little child, or an invalid, or you will give one of them a crooked mallet or a bruised ball; and, with these advantages, joined to that of knowing the ground, you ought to come off with some éclat.

If you meet strangers, deny all knowledge of the game, or at least that you have played it more than about twice before. It looks modest, and may get you a weak opponent instead of one who is your match.

Above all things, endeavor to come to the lawn in a perfectly tranquil state of mind; and, while others are merely amusing themselves, be you wide awake to your interests.

We will now suppose the parties to be made up, and the contest begun. In the course of it you will have opportunities for many tricks and delicate stratagems, or "dodges," and you may gain the character of a fine player by carrying them out adroitly. The more there are in the game, the better your chance; for while others are waiting for their turn they are tempted to get into conversation, and withdraw their attention from it. You will always, therefore, be in favor of the full number of eight.

Thus, you may say that your ball is in a hole, and pick it up and put it before your hoop, or unwire it, or bring it to where it is safe from an enemy's ball. You may miss a troublesome hoop altogether, and go on to the next. You may safely say that your ball struck the turning stake and clicked, if it went at all near it. You may say that it is well through its hoop if it stops under it, and go on to the next. You may spoon if there is nobody looking. You may pick up your ball and carry it in your pocket-handkerchief to where you want it. You may hint to your lady partner to trail her dress over it.

In all these cases, and others such that we shall recommend you, and fifty besides that will occur to you if you have any genius for the game, be sure, if you have the ill luck to be found out, not to apologize or say that it was done unintentionally, or for a joke, or to plead ignorance of the rules. Put a bold front upon it, and, if your opponent says positively that you did so or so, answer him as positively that you did not; tell him that he is strangely mistaken; pledge your honor to what you say; tell him any thing you will, but go on. People generally give way rather than have a disturbance. In any case, go on. We have known players extricate themselves from the greatest difficulties by that simple and decisive course of going on.

If you are asked your hoop by an enemy, refuse to tell it; or, if you think you can without discovery, tell your impertinent querist the wrong one.

In any dispute about a lady's ball, decide against the lady, unless she is your partner. Your doing otherwise would be imputed to courtesy; and at croquet courtesy is a weakness.

Always have two codes of laws to appeal to; for, as they none of them agree, you may usually pit one against the other and carry your point.

If your best player or yourself should, upon becoming a rover, be knocked out by an enemy, protest against it, and declare knocking out to be mean, to be cowardly, to be most unhand-some, and no longer allowed; but if you have yourself put out an enemy, stand up for a rigid adherence to the laws of the game as laid down in the books.

If your ball has been croqueted beyond a gravel-walk, it may prove very advantageous to you with a little good management. Nobody can say to an inch where it left the grass, and it would be arrant folly not to bring it back to a more convenient place.

If there is a bush on the lawn, or a shrubbery near it, you may find it to your advantage to drive your ball into the same, fetch it out, and place it beside your partner's. Maintain, in this case, that a ball shall be placed opposite to where it lay in the bush; and, as nobody else will have seen where it lay, nobody can contradict you, say what you will as to where you found it.

If there is pitted against you a delicate lady, or a grandpapa whose hand is feeble and his sight failing, discard all generous feelings, whack away at their balls, send them to the farthest end of the lawn, follow them up unmercifully. The strength of a chain is the strength of its weakest link. It is your policy, therefore, to weaken the weakest.

If one of your partners should prove to be a bad player, and, in spite of all your endeavors to assist him or her, should be left behind, change balls. It is a chance if you are found out; and if you are, maintain that such exchange between partners is allowable.

If your ball is in a good position, but exposed to be croqueted out of it by the enemy, get a lady partner to stand over it and hide it; or stumble over the enemy's ball, and pick it up and place it so as to be wired from your own. Nobody can charge you with doing it willfully, and, at the worst, you have merely to put it back to where it was before.

It is often worth your while to kick down a hoop quite by accident, and set it up again a few inches to the side, or forward, or backward.

Ladies have an easy and ready means of assisting their partners and themselves. They need only to stand over the balls and scuffle them along with their feet—a very common practice, and a very effective one.

If your ball is lying so near a wire or a turning-stake that you can not strike it with the end of your mallet, use the side of it, and overbear all objections by stating that at cricket you may strike the ball with any part of the bat, and even with the handle. Whatever privileges you claim for yourself, you will, of course, deny them to an enemy, unless you have already availed yourself of them.

If a lady's ball is in a good position do not let any ill-timed feeling of gallantry prevail with you to spare it. Knock it away—send it to Jericho. If she has a pretty foot she may like to display it as she trips over the grass. We have known very good games thrown away by mistaken acts of courtesy to the ladies.

Should your opponent be at all nervous, you may baffle him and cause him to make a bad stroke by suddenly exclaiming, as he is about to deliver it, that he has already croqueted that ball, or made that hoop, or that it is not his turn, or by distracting his attention in any way that occurs to you. With ladies there is none better than inquiring, just before they begin their turn, for the little dear baby or their eldest son, whom you may laud as the model of the growing generation, or asking for some one in whose welfare they are supposed to be particularly interested.

With either the one or the other there is nothing more likely to balk a good stroke than expressing a firm conviction that they will miss, and offering to bet upon it. Thus, at the end of a game, the rovers of the more successful side may often be prevented from hitting the stick till the other side comes up to them and wrests the victory from their hands.

Talking to people while they are playing is a very effective check to their progress, and leads them to make oversights from which you will derive advantage. A dispute upon some point of the game, or a good story, or a bit of scandal, or a mere joke, will sometimes insure you a victory.

There are those who see no harm in mixing up a little fun with a serious contest, and consider it an excellent joke to croquet a ball into a flower-bed, or a pond, or a running stream, especially if the lady of the house is fond of her flowers and a little irritable, or the water deep. If this occurs, exclaim against it as inconsistent with good-manners and the spirit of the game; but while the attention of others is diverted to the recovery of the ball, or they have got into conversation, you may avail yourself of the opportunity to change your position or that of your antagonists, or to move a hoop, or to do any thing else that is advantageous to your party.

If there is a cage and bell in the middle it will afford you many fine chances if you are quick to see them. For instance, if your ball should miss its hoop, hit the bell with your mallet, and say that the ball went through. If it has really gone through one, maintain that to be the right one, whichever it was.

Young ladies are of course inclined to collect into a group and chat over the approaching ball or wedding, or cricket match, or any other subject of interest to them. Let them do so. It is their captain's duty to call them when it is their turn to play, and to tell them their hoop and what they have to do. Ladies meet for an afternoon's amusement, and not as men meet for a drill; and it adds greatly to their enjoyment to see their captains lose temper. In the mean while you can carry out many clever sleights of hand with little fear of detection; and if you miss a ball or a hoop say nothing about it, but go on. We have seen a clever player upon such occasions pull up a turning-stake and take his stroke, and put it in again.

If in making a loose croquet you fail to move the croquet ball, say that it did move, and positive evidence is always stronger than negative. So again, if it does move in making a tight croquet, and is not observed by any one near, go on as if it had not moved. We have known many a good game lost by superfluous honesty that might have been saved with a little common prudence. At the same time we would caution you not to venture these practices against a school-boy; and as a general rule be very much on your guard before any of that class, for they have keen eyes, and a disagreeable habit of expressing their opinions without any respect of persons.

Cases will now and then occur for which there are no rules laid down in books. Upon your own lawn you will decide them in your own favor, and admit of no appeal. Upon a stranger's, maintain your view, which of course is the one favorable to your party, as that of all the best players. Nobody can contradict you.

Avail yourself of every opportunity to carry out these maxims, even where the weakness of your enemy makes it unnecessary to do so; but it is only by constant practice that you can hope to acquire any remarkable quickness of thought, and facility and dexterity of application.

We have now merely to add the rights and privileges of those who do not take a part in the game.

As a by-stander you are at liberty to make your remarks aloud; to tell the players what they should do, or should not do, and where their partners' or their enemies' balls are lying; to act as umpire in any dispute, whether appealed to or not; to applaud a good stroke, or censure a bad one; to countermand the captains' orders; to walk about among the hoops, and talk to the players; in short, to do just what you please, short of hitting a ball with a mallet.

Ladies also are allowed to show their sympathy with the lady players. They may bring a baby upon the lawn, and give them the opportunity in the intervals of their turns to nurse and caress it, and talk to it, and hand it from one to the other. The nursemaid's duty is to be in attendance, and she too may walk about among the hoops. As these are the acknowledged privileges of those who do not play, do not lose temper, but consider how you may improve your game. Let that be the one object of your thoughts; the single object of the croquet player being to win the game.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CLARA C.—There is no depilatory which is safe to intrust to common hands. They are all composed of poisonous substances, which are dangerous to handle without the utmost care. Glycerine or cold cream will probably answer your other requirements. The shirt-bosoms are simply and literally double linen. Two rows of stitching either side of the studs are the only ornament.

W. E. G.—You should consult a physician. It is impossible to give safe advice in such a case without seeing the patient.

YOUNG HOUSEKEEPER.—New-Year's Day is always considered here as a full dress occasion, when the dame "receives" in complete toilette, even to the gloves. Her visitors are offered refreshments at any opportune moment. It is deemed a modish affectation to light the gas, lamps, or candles before the darkness makes it necessary.

KATE S.—You should, in writing to a clergyman, address him as "The Reverend," and not simply "Reverend."

ROLAND.—Be resolute; you are right, and it is your duty to persevere.

ELLA C.—The Venus of Milo is so called from having been found on Milo, one of the islands of the Grecian Archipelago, where it was unearthed by a French Consul, and deposited in the Louvre at Paris. It is allowed to be the most perfect expression of ideal female beauty in existence—a statue unequalled by any work of modern or ancient art. Somewhere in one of Thackeray's novels there is a glowing appreciation of the charms of the Venus of Milo.

MOTHER.—We doubt that "rocking is good for babies." An old physician of our acquaintance condemns it, emphatically declaring that it "addles the brains of children." Rocking is undoubtedly an artificial mode of quieting and putting a child to sleep, which should be used, if ever, with great moderation. It produces a species of intoxication, tending, if carried to excess, to congestion of the brain and various nervous affections. The effect upon the eyes and sight is not seldom hurtful, and it is probable that squinting and other ophthalmic affections are due to it. The excessive use of the rocking-chair seems not without prejudice to grown-up people, who often swing themselves into a state of stupid inability or disinclination to work. The effect of continued crouching in the rocking-chair is certainly very damaging to the graceful and well-proportioned growth of the figure, and young, growing girls should be particularly forbidden the practice.

ROSALIE.—"No man is a hero to his valet de chambre" owes its origin to a Madame Cornwel, one of the cleverest women of the time of Louis XIV. Montaigne had, however, said before her in one of his essays: "Few men are admired by their domestics."

J. N.—The lines are Wordsworth's, and form a part of his charming portrait of a lovable woman. Here is the full picture:

"I saw her, upon nearer view,
A spirit, yet a woman too,
Her household motions light and free,
And steps of virgin liberty;
A countenance in which did meet
Sweet records, promises as sweet,
A creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food,
For transient sorrows, simple wiles,
Praise, blame, love, kisses, tears, and smiles."

MATRON.—Fifteen pounds weight! You must be mistaken. There is no record in all the medical books of a child at birth weighing so much. The weight is generally six, not seldom six and a half or seven, sometimes eight, and rarely nine or ten pounds. Of four thousand children born at the principal Lying-in Asylum of Paris there was not a single one who weighed at birth as much as twelve pounds. General Grant, say the newspapers, weighed ten and a half pounds at birth.

A HOUSEKEEPER.—Papier-maché pails and basins are only fit for kitchen use. This ware is not made into toilette sets. The samples described in the Bazar are $1.50 each. Fluting-scissors with three prongs are the best for small families. The price is from 50 cents to $1.25. The fluting-machine costs from $12 to $18. It consists of two brass cylinders, mounted on a frame. Heated irons are placed inside the cylinders, and they are made to revolve against each other by turning a crank. The muslin is passed between the cylinders. The fluting, or crimping, if you prefer it, is done with great rapidity, and is perfectly exact, besides which there is no danger of scorching it. An Arctic freezer holding a quart is sold for $2. Every additional quart adds a dollar to the price. It can be procured of the house-furnishing firms named at the end of the New York Fashion article to which you refer.

E. A. P.—A blue or garnet silk poplin, or a Scotch plaid, made as a gored princess dress, would suit the child you describe. Trim with pinked silk frills. For the younger child, soft cashmere of any bright color, made with a gored skirt and jacket.

A SUBSCRIBER.—This correspondent will find her inquiry about fluting-irons answered in the reply to Housekeeper.

LAWRENCE S. FREEMAN.—The reply to Housekeeper will give you the information you desire.

FANNIE RISLEY.—We have no knowledge of the lithograph. We shall publish articles on cooking, etc., from time to time.

NEEDLE-WORK DESIGN FOR SOFA PILLOW IN SATIN STITCH WITH FILOSELLE.—[SEE PAGE 729.]

See illustration on page 728.

This design is intended for the embroidery of a sofa pillow, and is worked on cashmere in straight and interwoven satin stitch. The small figures which form the foundation are worked in the interwoven stitch. The design is worked in filoselle silk in Turkish style, that is, in different colors variously arranged. The foundation of the original is red cashmere lined with muslin. The stars of the outer border are worked with golden-brown silk, the cross stitch in the middle being lighter; the stars of the foundation of the middle part of the pillow are worked with corn-colored silk with a central cross stitch of brown silk. The large rosette figures which point toward the middle are worked with three shades of blue and the middle part with two shades of red. The leaf pointing outward is of four shades of the same color. The rosettes at each side of these, as also the corner figures, are in shaded green. The figures between the middle rosette are worked with grass-green, light brown, and white silk. The scale stripes are worked in long satin stitch with dark violet, blue, or red. Work the large figures first in straight satin stitch, after which the figure of the foundation in interwoven satin stitch. The illustration, page 725, shows the manner of working the stars, given, however, in silk twist, in order to render it plainer.

Walking Suits.

VIOLET AND LILAC SILK DRESS.—This dress has a double skirt of violet and lilac silk, the under-skirt with a narrow and the upper with a wide flounce of the same material. The front of the upper skirt is shorter than the back, which is arranged en panier, as shown by the illustration, and trimmed with a violet silk bow.

LIGHT BROWN SILK DRESS.—This dress is made with two skirts, both of which are trimmed with a pleated flounce. A separate piece, also trimmed with a pleated flounce, is added ed to the upper skirt, which is looped. At each side of this piece are arranged long and broad ends of the same material as the dress in the manner shown by the illustration.

MOZAMBIQUE DRESS.—Under-skirt of gray mozambique, dress of lilac mozambique with short skirt, which is pleated as shown by the illustration, and finished with two sash ends.

Black Silk Fichu Mantilla.

This pretty black silk mantilla is richly trimmed with lace and satin folds. The fronts, which are finished with long, broad sash ends, are fastened down under the belt. The back is completed by a short square skirt, which is fastened to the belt; over this skirt is arranged the bow and sash. The pattern of this mantilla is the same as that given for the basque-fichu in Harper's Bazar, No. 43, but the skirt and sash ends require to be lengthened.

PATHETIC TOYS.

THERE are few sights more capable of bringing out a sentimental gush of thought than a glance into a shop in which toys are sold for the very poor. These establishments are to be found in low neighborhoods, and generally do not confine their commercial operations to a single branch of business. You see in the window, next the wooden dolls, green bottles of sweet-stuff, boxes of matches, candles, twine, and often a small pile of apples or some other cheap fruit; inside will be found those tales and songs written for what Mr. Trollope has termed the unknown public, along with whistles, jews-harps, and a few masks of a hideous kind, which are supposed to be especially attractive to the youthful mind.

To children toys are as necessary as fresh air and exercise. The little creatures when learning to talk appear to have a certain consciousness that grown-up people either laugh at them, or do not understand them; with a toy, however, they can be at once familiar and at home. Jack-in-the-box is always ready to play with them—a doll never refuses her company, will submit to any amount of kissing, beating, or dressing, and, as long as the wax, cotton, and bran keep together, will amuse her owner and remain faithful. But it is curious to note the difference between a poor and a rich child in the treatment and management of dolls. To the child lady the doll is a familiar presence. It has not the charm of novelty or unexpectedness; she regards it as an accompaniment of her station. Then if she wants to trick it out she has not the piquant trouble of hunting for bits of ribbon, of gauze, or of tinsel. Then again her doll is horribly mechanical, and allows but small room for fancy. It may squeak and open and shut its eyes, thereby preventing its proprietress from doing the conversation herself. But the meagre, starved present which the workman brings to his cottage or lodgings is differently cherished. It has twice as fine a life. Its mistress never ceases prattling to it, will search and ransack every corner for the dingy shreds of cotton that are to render the effigy magnificent in her eyes. Then it is not subject to the whims which fine ladies take to their favorite even in their tenderest years. It is petted with a constant affection until grime or accident obliterates its features, and in the end it is seldom subjected to a toasting at the bars of a grate—an experiment which has been known to tell unfavorably on the countenance of a wax figure. Poor children must indeed have a good deal of imagination to enjoy the queer things constructed for a few cents to please them. We have referred to Jack-in-the-box. Jack can be bought at a very low price or a very high one, but the poor child gets better value out of him for the money than any toy we know of, except the doll. The entertainment he furnishes both at the Five Points and Fifth Avenue is identical. He lives, as all the world knows, in a constant state of compression, from which he is released by opening a wire hasp. He always surprises you, that is his fun, and the one joke for which he has been made. His ferocity to a little boy is something awfully delicious. He has him securely fastened down, and that gives him a certain sense of power. It is a long time before he disbelieves in Jack's whiskers and the energy of that spring of his. We have heard that the first doubts on the subject arise when a boy begins to think of Jack's legs, Jack possessing a quaint organization in that respect. However, this toy is as democratic as the French gilt jewelry now in vogue. Indeed, of the two, we should prefer the cheap Jack; he is generally of fiercer aspect than his more aristocratic prototype, and the steel in him is stronger and stiffer. This may arise from some law of compensation not yet quite developed. Another favorite toy which is found in low as well as in high places is Noah's Ark. It would be interesting to learn who first invented this. We suspect it must have been the writer of a miracle-play. It is certainly old enough to have been the freak of such an author, and the costumes of them and his brethren suggest—like Mr. Pickwick's gaiters at the soirée—the Dark Ages. Or was it the genius who alighted on the design of the willow pattern plate who constructed the first child's ark? He would have made the elephant and the duck (not according to their kind) of exactly the same proportions as you may now see them, and he would have also sacrificed a custom of old standing to economy, by freightage the ark with only one animal of each species. But let all that pass. Noah's Ark is immortal, although the constituents are occasionally swallowed. If the flock thins they are easily replaced. What a joy is a whip with a whistle at the end of it to a child? There is a combination of delights; you may have a sly lash at the cat, or at the pet dog, and when blasé of these luxuries the whistle still remains to the good. A whistle with a small pea in it is an improvement, giving a tremolo and artistic air to the instrument; but then it is likely to choke it now and then, so that perhaps the whistle pure and simple is to be preferred. This, too, is within the reach of the poor child; so is a drum, or at least a small one, out of which a good deal can be got with perseverance. To see a half-clothed urchin with a drum, albeit a paltry and diminutive drum, whacking it until he falls asleep over it, is a more enjoyable sight than the appearance of Master Howard with an expensive affair that might be played in an orchestra. Master Howard's drum has a hole in it months before the youngest of Brown's children has yielded to an impulse to see what was making the noise inside the sheep-skin of his. We doubt whether a spade and a small cart may be considered as genuine toys. We are inclined to think not. They are of modern growth. A poor child would not see much fun in a spade and cart; perhaps it has a dim notion of its own future at the tail of a plow or the side of a real wagon. A sword, however, or a gun, may be included in the catalogue. Those symbols reveal the common masculine disposition, and are sought by all boys of whatever class.

BLACK SILK FICHU MANTILLA.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

WEDDINGS all the world over are very interesting topics, and so I am going to tell you a word or two about our weddings in general, and those at which I have myself been present lately. One's attention is much directed toward weddings just now, because every one is talking of Patti's marriage with the Marquis de Caux, which took place lately at Clapham Church—the Roman Catholic church, of course, for both bride and bridegroom belong to that sect. People seemed to forget that, and it was announced in the papers, a few weeks back, that the ceremony would be performed at St. George's, Hanover Square, one of our very fashionable Protestant churches. Patti, it seems, looked wonderfully pretty, and was very quiet and self-possessed. She wore a white satin dress, with a long tulle veil over it. Mario and Grisi, and a vast number of friends, were present, among them the Duke of Manchester and Prince de La Tour d'Auvergne. One of Mario's daughters was one of the bridesmaids. The prima donna is not going to relinquish her professional engagements, but will still continue to sing for the next two years. She is twenty-five; her husband, forty-two. I don't think any one thought her so much.

There is a saying in England, that it is more lively to go to a funeral than a wedding; but this is rather hard, when people make so much fuss and preparation for weddings. From six to eight bridesmaids is the usual number. White dresses—either silk, grenadine, or tarlatan, with colored ribbons—have been the most fashionable attire for them, and blue has, I think, been the favorite color—the bright Alexandra shade, which looks so well by daylight. Bonnets are more worn than wreaths and veils, but then bonnets are nothing more than wreaths. The veils mostly fall from the back of the bonnet, but now and then they are worn over the face. The mistake of the present fashion of bridesmaids' dresses is, it seems to me, that they are beginning to be too much like the bride's. A week or two ago I was present at the marriage of Sir John Murray's only daughter with Sir John Trevellyn's only son, and the bridesmaids all wore silk dresses, white dog-rose wreaths, and white tulle veils. There is a very good custom, however, prevalent now, viz.: that the bridegroom gives all the bridesmaids handsome lockets, with his own and his bride's initials intertwined, as a memento of the event.

Wedding presents now are handsomer and more costly than ever. They are generally exhibited with the trousseau a day or two before the event, when the bride and her family are "at home" to her friends; but this is very much disliked by some people, and then they only show the presents on the wedding-day to the friends who are invited to the breakfast.

Friends and relatives meet at the church on the day appointed, between eleven and twelve. Marriages, with us, unless by special license, must take place before twelve. The guests do not go to the bride's house first. The bridesmaids await her coming in the porch, and when she arrives on her father's arm, follow her in procession up the aisle, and group themselves round her at the altar. In fashionable life it requires one or two clergymen to marry the happy pair, and if a bishop is to be had, so much the better. The Bishop of Oxford did the principal part of the service when the Duke of Marlborough's daughter married Sir Ivor Guest, a very wealthy Welsh baronet, whose grandfather was a hard-working ironmaster. This was one of the most brilliant weddings of the season, and took place at St. James's, Piccadilly, a fashionable church, and a very handsome building, which St. George's, Hanover Square, certainly is not—one of the dull-est, most smoke-begrimed edifices you can well imagine. These two, and St. Peter's, Knightsbridge, are the three churches where the great folks in London are united, for better and for worse. At the latter Lord Dudley married his present countess, a Miss Moncrief, one of the prettiest women in London. She belongs to a pretty family and a lucky one. There are, I think, seven sisters, but I am not quite sure of the number, and they all marry well, though they are only a poor baronet's daughters. One is Duchess of Athole; another, Mrs. Forbes, the wife of a millionaire; another, Lady Mordaunt, and the younger sisters are following equally brilliantly their elder sisters' example.

But to return to my account of an English wedding, or rather a London one. The service over, the party repair to the vestry to sign and seal—that is, if kissing is sealing—for every body here claims a kiss from the bride; and the affair which has hitherto been of the serious, nervous, and trying order, begins to assume a brighter aspect. The bells peal, the organ plays the wedding march; and the bride, half smiles, half tears, walks down the church on her husband's arm to the carriage and is whirled home again, quickly followed by the bridesmaids and the rest of the company, who tender their congratulations. After an hour's waiting—a rather tedious hour, which used to be diversified by the handing round of tea and coffee, but this is out of date now—breakfast is announced and a very substantial meal follows, mostly cold, save cutlets and soup, but very prettily served, the table covered with flowers. The newest thing in table decorations lately has been the ribbon bordering as it is called, viz., little tin troughs filled with flowers made in a kind of vandyked form and arranged down both sides of the table. These are so low and flat that they look as if the flowers were growing from the table-cloth. Large blocks of ice for the centre-piece, surrounded by flowers, are also much in vogue; in fact, we have been suffering so intensely from heat that any thing cool has been pleasant. Besides these blocks of ice cool the atmosphere wonderfully. At the famous India House ball last year there were several of them dotted about on raised gilt stands, and they did a great deal toward keeping the temperature even.

But at weddings the most prominent object on the table is, of course, the wedding-cake on a raised silver plateau. This the bride is expected to cut with her own hands, and morsels of it are slipped through her wedding-ring and presented to the bridesmaids, who, if they put the valuable atom under their pillows, are sure to dream of their future lords, they say. The decrees of fate are a good deal thought of on these occasions. Round the cake there are often bows, as many as there are bridesmaids, who each of them untie one in turn. One contains a ring, and whoever this falls to will be the first bride; another a thimble, the sure sign of spinsterhood; another a piece of money, the sign of wealth.

No wedding breakfasts would be complete without a few speeches at all events, though they are trying to do away with these as much as possible. The bride and bridegroom's health must, of course, be drank, for which the latter must return thanks, and propose the bridesmaids'; then the best man must return thanks for them. The father and mother of the bride must also come in for their share of pretty speeches, and then the bride leaves to prepare for her journey, and in a very short time disappears with her husband amidst a shower of old satin shoes. No wedding would be considered complete without this, and if one should happen to lodge on the top of the carriage, and so tell its tale to all the passers-by, so much the better for the fun of the thing. The bride and bridegroom have a month's tour, or go for the time to some friend's house, and then their friends welcome them back. "No cards" are used now, and a great pity, too, for if you happen to miss the announcement in the morning papers, it is very difficult to know who's married.

The wedding favors have been prettier this season than ever, and at one or two weddings I noticed that they were mixed with colored flowers.

Country weddings in England are far prettier than any in London. There the church, if not the whole village, is decorated, and the village children strew the path with flowers, and shower flowers on the bride and bridegroom as they drive off; and there are school feasts, and poor men's dinners, and all kinds of fun. In London the guests very often disperse as soon as the bride and bridegroom leave, though now and then there are balls in the evening in honor of the event, or the whole party go to the theatre. This year there have been more fashionable weddings than at any previous season I can remember; but now nothing can exceed the heat and dullness of London. Every body is rushing away, for it is almost unbearable. The House of Commons is prorogued this week, and that will take the rest of the people who have not yet taken their departure. At Goodwood there is a large and merry party for the races which are this week.

The Princess of Wales is recovering very rapidly, and was out driving yesterday. The poor Princess of Teck, the Queen's cousin, has been in great trouble about her baby's illness, but it is recovering now. Prince Alfred is not to remain long in England, but will soon be starting off on a fresh voyage. The Queen is going to Lucerne next month, and travels as the Countess of Kent. There is not the smallest doubt that her health is in a very weak state. She suffers from most fearful sickness. At one of the Drawing-rooms there was a great hue and cry because she left so soon, for people are by no means well pleased that she shows herself so little among them; but one of these attacks assailed her then, and she is always in a state of nervous agitation lest they should come on.

Cricket matches have been more eagerly patronized this year than ever. Lord's was crowded to suffocation for the Eton and Harrow match, which, with Oxford and Cambridge, are the two great events of the cricketing year. Great improvements have been effected of late at Lord's. It has been bought by the Marylebone Cricket Club, and a capital grand stand built, and new refreshment buildings also. The carriages are as thick there as they well can be, tier upon tier all round the ropes which mark the space appropriated to the players. Hampers are brought by pretty well every carriage, and you see people enjoying a picnic meal just as they would on a race-course. Every cabman and omnibusman in London sports the light or dark blue that week, and every private carriage, too. You hear of nothing but of this match from morning to night. The boys from both schools have a holiday, and, of course, they enter into it with great gusto, which is not surprising, but it does seem surprising that their elders should be quite so enthusiastic. In nearly every village there is a cricket club, and all the young nobility and gentry play a fair game—the Prince of Wales an excellent game, they say.

There was a grand match at Sandringham the year before last, in which his Royal Highness played. Now Sandringham is being almost completely rebuilt, and it will be some time before any more entertainments of any kind can be given there, which is, perhaps, as well; for the Princess of Wales has so much gayety in London she wants rest now and then; but people are perfectly unreasonable in their demands upon her. They would like to see her from morning to noon; and if you can only show your country cousin our pretty Princess, they leave the metropolis quite satisfied.

Lord Cranworth's death came upon us quite unexpectedly, and now every body is on the qui vive to know who are to be the new peers, for there is to be a new batch at the end of the session.

ARDERN HOLT.

HOW FRANK THORNTON WAS CURED.

"LOOK here, Bob! I just put this to you; you're not a sentimental fellow—you're hard as nails, I know that—but I ask you, What do you say to a woman who, when she hears the family doctor declare that her husband, the man she married for love three years ago—no, it ain't three, it's but two and seven months—when she hears that his heart is affected; that the valves—the valves, mark you—are attacked; that ossification is apprehended—I suppose worse couldn't be; the very evening she hears this, goes out to a ball, and says, 'Poor Frank couldn't come: he imagines he has a something—a something!'—the matter with his heart; and the stupid doctor humors him, and I'd not wonder if he kept the sofa these six months?' I pledge you my sacred word of honor these were her very words. I had them taken down verbatim, and I made Leonard and Mrs. Crawford sign their names to the document, declaring that they heard them as she uttered them. Now, none of your hair-splitting or refining; but speak out in a frank, manly way, and say, what do you think of this?"

"I simply think that your wife did not agree with your doctor."

"Oh, indeed! that is, that she formed another impression of my case; that her experience of heart-disease led her to a different conclusion from Duffey's—the first man in his profession, by-the-way; and that doubtless she would have suggested another line of treatment."

"No, no; don't run away with the theory. I merely meant that she thought there was not much the matter with you, and that old Duffey was a bit of an alarmist."

"By Jove, I must say he did not alarm her! She had that confounded toy terrier in her lap while he was telling it to her, and the first words she said were, 'Do tell me, Doctor, will it hurt Tricksey to have his ears cut?' My cousin Staples says they must be pointed." If there be a fool in the Household Brigade—and I suspect there are some—I'd back Howard Staples against the field. But to come to what I was saying, please to answer if you ever heard of a woman talk about her terrier's ears at the moment they were breaking to her the news that her husband was doomed: that any day, any hour—"

"Come, come, don't take on in this fashion. Be a man; keep up your pluck."

"It's not for myself I am moved—not a bit of it. It is the heartlessness of that woman stabs me. It is the cold indifference of her whose life ought to have been bound up with my own—it is that unmans me. I declare to you, on my honor, I didn't believe it was in human nature to behave so. I tell you, Bob, if that woman heard of my death to-morrow, her first thought would be to send over to that milliner in the street yonder to inquire what was the most becoming mourning she could wear in a recent affliction."

"I take it you don't want suttee in Europe, nor expect that your widow is to burn herself in honor of you."

"No, Sir; I ask no such sacrifice; but I certainly do ask that while here, above ground, though sentenced to all the tortures of a heart affection, I may meet with some tenderness, some sympathy, some—some—never mind. She sha'n't unman me—that I'll promise you; but I promise you, also, I'll be shot if she shall keep her jointure if she marries Howard Staples. It's insulting enough the way that idiot treats my house. If there's a thing I detest, it is to hear the clank of a sabre on one's stairs. And then the cool way those fellows unbelt, as though your drawing-room was a mess ante-room. 'Well, old boy,' he said to me 'other day, 'how are the valves?' 'Not exactly so safe, Sir,' said I, 'that you may not apprehend an explosion.'"

"That was very ready." The heart may be attacked, but it's all right up here; and he touched his forehead significantly as he spoke.

"All the more reason, Frank, not to take a gloomy view of life. There can not be much amiss with a man who carries himself as you do. Why, it was only yesterday you sent the groom back with your horse, and walked the whole way from Waterloo to this."

"A great feat, truly! it's under twelve miles; and I'd rather have walked forty than ridden back with that idiot Staples. I told Georgina so; and as she didn't send him off, I just dismounted and left them there."

"And very wrong of you it was."

"Oh, of course. I know the theory; I know the whole case. A well-bred husband sees little, and resents less."

"In this case there was nothing either to see or to resent."

"Very nice of you to say so, considering you were full a quarter of a mile to the rear, and riding with your own wife—whom, by-the-way, you never quit for an instant."

"No; I like to keep her company."

"People remark it, though. I assure you, people make the most absurd comments upon it. I've heard you described as a sort of Othello for jealousy."

"With all my heart. So long as they don't come to tell me their opinions, I'll not quarrel with them for holding them."

"Well, I don't pretend to be as indifferent about public opinion, and it pains me severely when I am told things people say about Georgy's high spirits and gayety of temperament. I know well the world calls these by another name behind backs."

"I wonder how you can go on worrying yourself in this fashion. It is little short of insanity."

"I'm quite prepared to hear that name for it some of these days. Only look here, old fellow; I'd rather, for old acquaintance sake, that you would not be one of my accusers. Take my word for it, they'll get the thing up quite cleverly without you; and it's a sort of case an old friend never figures in very gracefully."

He arose as he said this, put on his hat, gave me a familiar nod, and walked out, leaving me, not exactly angry, though I was a little irritated, but certainly not at all disposed to prolong the conversation.

A few words will suffice to tell my reader all I need say of him. Frank Thornton had served in the 8th Hussars in India, and distinguished himself several times in the campaign of the Mutiny. He was a splendid soldier, who gloried in his profession, and was greatly loved by his comrades; though all acknowledged that, while Thornton was a fellow to go through fire and water for a friend, he was so touchy, so nervously sensitive, so alive to things which never were meant to hurt him, that his life was one unceasing round of tortures and explanations. This disposition, strengthening with years, made him at last so irritable and quarrelsome that, popular and liked as he once had been—the pride of his own corps and the delight of the mess—men heard with pleasure the news that he had "sent in his papers," and was about to leave the service.

"You'll be glad to know I'm going to leave you," he said, one night after mess; "and I'm only sorry I didn't go when you might have regretted me. A fretful temper is like the 'prickly heat'—it doesn't make a man an agreeable neighbor; but take my word for it, the poor devil who has the malady is worse off still."

"He's going to marry," said one of his comrades as he left the room.

"To marry!"

"Yes, he's going to marry Georgy Gordon. Poor girl! she'll need all her high spirits to carry her through it."

"She's got what's better than high spirits," said an old Scotch major; "she's got the sweetest temper of any lassie from this to her father's house in Aberdeenshire."

"Has no one told her what a temper Thornton has?"

"She's a sort of cousin of mine," said another; "and I had a long talk with her about him 'other day. Her notion is that men only make each other worse when they attempt to correct faults of disposition; that a woman only can do so with success, but that she must be wife or sister."

"That's possible enough in ordinary cases; but where a man contrives to invert every thing he looks at—where he never will believe that the world has not some covert design to deny him his due or sneer at his deserts—where it's an even chance every day that he shoots one of his best friends before night—all I can say is, that if I were Miss Gordon's brother—"

"She has none."

"Well, her father—"

"Dead twelve years ago. She was brought up by her uncle, Sir Hercules."

"Well, I'm not particular as to the degree of the relationship. I only mean, if I had the claim to counsel her, I'd certainly say, Rather never marry at all than marry Frank Thornton; though I'm quite ready to admit he's as true-hearted a gentleman and as gallant a soldier as ever served her Majesty."

It would appear that Miss Gordon was not to be terrified by the stories which reached her, or that she relied implicitly on her own powers to avert the evils with which they menaced her; for she returned from India Thornton's wife, and accompanied him to visit his mother, who lived in a beautiful part of the Isle of Wight.

A few lines announcing his marriage and return to England were all I had from him for years, when one morning the post brought me the following:

"MY DEAR BOB,—I have just got an ugly blow. I had invested all the stray cash I possessed in indigo, and the ryots have gone and smashed the dykes and played old gooseberry with the young crop. They say I shall lose twelve thousand pounds, which may turn out to be fifteen. At all events I must economize; and as I hear Brussels is cheap, and as I know you are there, I mean to try it. Look me up a small house—furnished, of course—rent not above a couple of hundreds, and stabling for a pair of horses. I'll bring our riding-nags and job a carriage. Tell me all you can about the place—I don't mean socially, for we shall not go out anywhere—but about its markets, servants, and the other abominations of house-keep. By-the-way, old fellow, isn't this domesticity a devil of a mistake? Wouldn't you and I give something to get back again to the place from whence we came? I take it we'll have plenty of time to talk this over together. I hope our wives will 'hit it off' with each other. Yours always, FRANK N. THORNTON."

I was not able at a moment to secure the sort of house he wanted, but pressed him to make ours his home, till he could look about and suit himself. They came in due course, and certainly nothing could be more complete than the friendship which at once grew up between our wives. Some points of resemblance there certainly were between them, but in many things they were totally unlike. At all events they were both young and good-looking, and as happy and well pleased with life as is permitted to most of those who are supposed to have drawn fair prizes in this big lottery.

The Thorntons had not been our guests above a week when I saw that Frank's temper, so far from having been bettered, had been painfully aggravated by marriage. He no longer, indeed, permitted himself those outbursts of passion he once indulged in. There was nothing violent or demonstrative in his anger; but the control he exercised over himself almost drove him to madness, and he would come into my smoking-room, after dinner, in a state of excitement and irritability that were almost fearful to witness.

"I suppose you saw it to-day?" cried he to me one evening as he walked the room. "I take it that you could not help remarking the considerate manner in which my wife corrected me about Kechmacarrachee. Now, I tell you distinctly and deliberately, the durbar was not held there, and the place where they poisoned her uncle's elephants was Tammadar, on the other side of the Ganges. I only wish they had poisoned the old beggar himself, and he would never have lived to come to Calcutta, and I should never have—no matter what. But I'll tell you why she did it, Bob. You couldn't guess that, nor your wife either, though she is as keen as any woman I ever met. She did it just to bring up the name of a fellow whom she knows I hate as I hate nothing else on earth. It's a woman's way to stab a man. She watches till she has you before the world; she waits till she catches you at a dinner, or one of a party round the fire; and she'll beat about till she finds an incident or an event in which a fellow figured, and she'll bring him in with a sort of half-consciousness as though she knew the ground was dangerous—just the most offensive thing she could do, except the appealing look she'll give you across the table, as if saying, 'Don't be angry with me.' Your wife saw that to-day—I'll swear she did. As for you, I don't expect you to remark any thing, nor tell it if you did."

It was no use to protest ignorance of all he assumed. He only grew more irascible and violent at each assertion. Nothing short of my fixed resolve not to take offense at any thing he should say in his passion saved me from feeling deeply wounded by some of the expressions which escaped him.

"There now!" cried he at last, "it only remains that you should turn me out into the street, and my blessed temper will have lost me the last man of all who once befriended me."

He rushed out of the room after this, and I saw him no more till next morning. I will not pretend that my life at this time was a very agreeable one; for, while Thornton never ceased to make me the depositary of his grievances, my wife, with equal insistence, persecuted me by stories of his peevish, nagging disposition, invariably concluding with the assurance that no patience could hold out much longer, and that in the end Georgina must sink under it. Not that Mrs. Thornton looked at all like sinking. She was a blooming, bright-eyed young woman, on whose features, with the closest scrutiny, I never could detect the trace of sorrow, except a slight darkness about the eyelids, and a very faint "drag" at times—only at times—on the angle of the mouth. She had a variety of accomplishments—sang, rode, drove well, was always ready for any plan for pleasure, and the life of it when it came off. It was plain enough that her high spirit occasionally chafed against her husband's humor; and I was often struck with the tact she exhibited in subduing her buoyancy and sobering down her gaiety to the tone of his temper.

My wife hinted that she had seen her in other moods, and often came away from her looking herself so sad and depressed that I shrank from inquiring the cause. It is scarcely necessary that I should say Thornton was not a favorite with my wife. She was ready enough to admit that his manners were easy and polished, his tone invariably well-bred, and his conversation charming; but against these gifts there was the terrible set-off of his captious nature, his unceasing suspectfulness, and that morbid tendency to inquire whether every the slightest incident had not some covert meaning which it was his duty to resent or repel.

"I don't think I shall pitch my tent here," he said to me one morning as we sat over our cigar; "the place does not suit me. It's not English, and it's not foreign. You have a continual influx of our own people who trouble society without contributing to its pleasures; and I shall either go back at once to town, or seek out some out-of-the-way old place in Germany and barbarize."

"Will your wife like that?" asked I, carelessly. He turned suddenly on me with a glance of keen penetration, and, after staring fixedly at me for some seconds, said, "I suppose she has declared she will oppose this plan?"

"Not that I have heard," replied I, coldly. "I'll do it all the same, however," said he, sternly. "Your wife may break the news to her when she will."

I said nothing. I was certainly provoked both by his words and the manner in which he spoke them; but I resolved that nothing like anger or even impatience should escape me, and I sat mute.

This was said on a Saturday morning; it was settled that the Thorntons were to leave us on the following Tuesday—for the Rhine at first, and thence as chance or caprice might determine after.

What with packing and preparing for the road, getting maps and guide-books, and consulting them for routes and roads, I saw little of Thornton for the whole of two days. I was sitting alone in my study on Monday evening when he entered the room and threw himself into a chair. I had but to give a mere glance at him to see that he was unusually agitated and excited; his face was lividly pale, except a small red patch on one cheek, which, with the unnatural lustre of his eyes, imparted a look of something like hectic to his features.

"I suppose, Bob," said he, with a forced effort to seem calm, "I am the most unhappy fellow as regards temper that ever you knew."

"You certainly do contrive to give yourself no small share of misery."

"To give myself! I understand," said he, fiercely. "I am one of those with whom the world has gone admiringly. I have all the blessings of health, fortune, and affection around me, but I manage, by an ingenious use of my faculties, to make myself a terror to my friends and a torment to my own home; and without a reason, or the shadow of a reason, I pick out all the disagreeable accidents of life and make my world out of them. Isn't that the theory? Out with it, man; I'm not so terrible but you can be frank with me."

"I'll not go so far—" I began.

"But I'll go farther," cried he, wildly. "I'll finish at once this dreary comedy. I have only to look at your wife's face, Bob, to see what she thinks of me. I never meet her that I don't read a perfect indictment in her looks:—You are killing that dear sweet wife of yours. You are making her life a bitterness and a sorrow. You know you are, and that you hate yourself for it. You can't desist; there is something demoniac within you that cries, 'Go on, go on—she must succumb at last.'"

"Why, this is all madness," said I, not thinking in my eagerness of the word I used.

"That is exactly the name for it," exclaimed he, "though you never had courage to say so before. It's precisely the amount of incoherency and misdirection that medical men call insanity, and on which one's friends obtain leave from the Lord Chancellor to lock him up and administer his fortune for him. Well, now, I do not like that part of it. I tell you frankly, I couldn't stand the being immured in a mad-house, and so I have resolved, fairly resolved, to cut and run for it. I'll no longer be the cause of misery to others. I'll keep my stock of wretchedness for home consumption, and I'll go away where I shall never be heard of again. Georgy, once free, will marry again, if she has the pluck to take another ticket in the lottery she has fared so ill in. You'll be quit of a very tiresome friend, and your wife relieved from the acquaintance of one who never could be a pleasant intimate or a very safe example. Don't try to turn me from my plan. I declare to you on my honor I am irrevocable. I shall go off to-morrow to Tervueren for a day's shooting. I have been talking of it for some time back. When there, I shall meet with a gun accident—that's the phrase they have for it in the newspapers; you'll hurry off naturally at once, but it will be all over before you arrive. I don't trouble myself about the details. You shall fill them in with all due regard to your own respectability, and what becomes your regard for a friend's memory. I mistake Georgy much, or the first shock, the horror of the event, will be the worst of it."

"You mean to shoot yourself," said I, with perfect calm.

"Not necessarily," said he, in the same easy tone, "if you will agree to aid me by propagating the story of my death. I have no particular desire to die. I can go away to New Zealand or some out-of-the-way place, under another name, and never be heard of. All I really want is, to cut the tie that binds that poor woman to my wretched identity, and by leaving her free, to make her the only reparation I can for all the misery I have brought upon her."

I will not repeat how eagerly I tried to combat this resolve, and turn him from his rash purpose. I exhausted every argument I could think of, and told him at last that it was a cowardly submission to his own selfishness that prompted a measure which could be infinitely better secured by the exercise of some self-control, and a victory over his own temper.

"It may be all as you say," replied he, "but there are certain things I can do, and there are others that are above my strength. Let me at least be the judge of what I am equal to."

The utmost I could obtain from him in the way of concession was, that he would await in some secret place the result of his experiment, and if it should turn out that, contrary to all his belief and conviction, his wife should prove inconsolable for his loss, and given up to unceasing sorrow, that he would consent with me what steps to take to satisfy her he was yet living, and at the same time not unworthy of her love and affection. I own I did not see my way to this at all, but as it left something open to a contingency, I accepted it as the best compromise that offered. The plan was then modified to this extent, that he was to go first to Tervueren, thence to Wavre, where there was a small cabaret where he could stop unnoticed, and receive my daily bulletin of the state of things in Brussels—how his wife bore up, and what effect the terrible event seemed to have upon her.

We accordingly arranged a few ciphers for correspondence by the use of numbers, all of which I can remember now was that the number "three" thrice repeated meant extreme dejection, four "nines" implied she was taking things with much resignation, and "five" suggested she would soon get over her affliction. He was very eager to supply signs to represent a heartless degree of indifference and even joy, but I suppressed these as mere emanations of malice and bad temper.

He amazed me that evening at tea. There was not a form of agreeability that he did not display. He talked his very best; he sketched little descriptions of places he had visited and people he had met with in a style of picturesque brilliancy I had not believed him capable of. He was all good-humor too, and took the banter we had the courage to bestow on him for once with a geniality and pleasantry positively charming; and finally sang seconds to my wife with an expression and correctness that vouched for a warm desire to please, in which I must say he had a perfect success.

"How delightful he can be!" whispered my wife, as he left the room. "I declare he has no equal when he condescends to be agreeable. I wonder why he will not be always thus; and then, after a pause, she added, "Is it that Georgy does not understand him?" I made no reply, but took my flat candlestick and walked away.

If my reader be married, he or she will easily guess what I did next: I went and told the whole to my wife. She was terribly shocked at first. She even wanted me to hasten off to the Legation and bespeak the Minister's interference, as though her Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary had any special power to control the bad passions of British subjects, or could make ill-tempered people keep the peace toward themselves. Next, she suggested that Thornton should at once be put under restraint. She would not hear of any other name for it but madness. I warned her strongly against this course; and then, as she calmed down, we talked over the whole "situation," canvassing it under every aspect we could think of, and imaging how the public would pronounce upon each distinct view of it.

I knew well enough what my wife was drifting at all through. She clearly thought that if every thing tragic could be avoided—if there were to be nothing to shock the feelings or leave a terrible memory behind it—the very best thing that could happen to dear Georgy would be to be well rid of him. She did not like exactly to say this in so many words, but she dropped little half-pious sentiments and devotional apophthegms that showed me what worldliness was passing in her head; and when she said something about "a happy release," I felt poor Frank's sentence had been pronounced beyond recall.

"Stay," cried I, suddenly; "another notion has just occurred to me. Frank is to loiter about the neighborhood in disguise till he learns how his wife bears up under his loss. What if we were to go and tell the whole story as it stands to Georgina? She may feel shocked for a moment, but she has plenty of good sense and plenty of courage. She knows Frank far better than we do, and she will know exactly what it is he calculates on in submitting her to this test—whether, in fact, he would like to think that she was inconsolable for his loss, or that she struck a sort of balance between her affection and her sorrow, and left him at the end with a small sum to his credit. I say neither you nor I could possibly guess this, but she might. She has abundance of brains, you say, and she is so fond of him. Reason the more to do what she can in his behalf. Now, I remember a physician once telling me of a case where a lunatic of the most violent and hopeless kind was perfectly cured of his insanity by having jumped out of a window three stories from the ground. He smashed both his legs, but he recovered his intellect, and never relapsed into madness. Now, Frank is not insane, or any thing like insane, but there is a morbid excitement in his brain which can not be healthy. Who is to say what a smart shock—something that would give his whole nature the effect of a sudden awakening to new perceptions—might not do for him? At all events, it is worth the trial. Go and see Georgy, and if you find the moment favorable, break the whole affair to her, and ask her advice."

My wife was away rather more than two hours. I don't think I ever passed two such hours in my life. It was a perfect eternity of feverish anxiety. I sat down, and got up, and walked the room. I opened the window and shut it. I listened at the door to hear if my wife were coming; the dead silence appalled me, and my heart sank under a weight of something inexpressibly heavy and oppressive. As the clock struck three, I heard the rustle of her dress on the stairs. I went out to meet her. She looked calm and composed, but I could see traces of fatigue in her features, and she passed into the room and sat down before she spoke.

"You told her?" asked I.

She nodded an assent.

"And how did she bear it?"

"I should say wonderfully. She never once interrupted me, or even interposed a word till I had finished; then she lay back on the sofa, and, heaving a heavy sigh, said, 'I had hoped he had given up these sort of things.'"

"You don't mean to say," cried I, "that he has done this before?"

"No, not this. This is perfectly new; and, indeed, it is a piece which does not admit of repetition; but he used to be very fond of these 'surprises,' if that be the name for them, and when we were first married I think I was subjected to as many temptations as St. Anthony. His great anxiety seemed to be to know how I should behave in certain contingencies which need never have occurred. His theory—he announced it openly—was this: No man knows any thing whatever about the nature of the woman he marries till he has submitted her to certain tests. So long as she lives surrounded with affluence and luxury, how can he possibly say in what spirit she will meet poverty and privation? If he is eternally at her side, showing her all the assiduous attentions of a lover, how is he to know in what way she will behave if she should have, or fancy she should have, cause for jealousy? Indeed, on this last, he tried me pretty sharply. He made himself very remarkable with a beautiful widow at Calcutta before we were two months married, and only desisted from the pursuit when he found that I had fretted myself into a low fever, in which, for a time, I was despaired of; and on my recovery he declared that the whole thing had been got up to satisfy his mind on the score of my susceptibility to jealousy, and that, as I had come through the ordeal apparently to his satisfaction, I should not in future be exposed to a test on this score. I assure you I never was quite certain—I am not yet—how much of truth there was in that story of our losses in India. I could not say that it was not another of these experiments on my disposition. If so, he must have been charmed with my conduct, for I care less than most people for luxuries, and am not a bit afraid of narrow fortune."

"And now, dearest Georgy, as to this last threat, if he should really go away—if he should imagine that there is no other reparation to make you for all the misery he has caused you than to banish himself forever—can you possibly frame to your mind in what spirit he hopes to see you meet this new disaster?"

"First of all, let me assure you that what he says he intends; he is not a man to make vain menaces. As to your second question, it is harder to answer; but my impression is, that though all he means is generously intended, he would be heart-broken if he thought I could accept his loss as a relief."

"We talked a long time after this, but I don't think we ever arrived any nearer to a solution of the difficulty. She continually repeated, 'I rely on your husband's friendship, and on his judgment for every thing.'"

"If this should be happily his last trial of you, and that, after it, he had no more doubts to solve about your character, it is all-important to divine now the exact way in which he wants you to behave."

"Very wretched and miserable, I have no doubt, and with something not very remote from self-accusation for all that has happened."

"These were her words to me at parting. I came away hurriedly, for I was afraid to excite her further."

"Well, he's gone now!"

"Gone!"

"Yes; he wrote me one line to say good-by. It ran thus: 'They'll find a hat on the river's bank, near the falls, easily identified as mine. I am at Wavre. Address—Jean Maurice, Cadran Jaune.' He's to be drowned it seems—not shot."

"Humph!" said my wife, with a toss of her head not at all complimentary to the hero of the adventure. "And have you hit upon any thing to be done?"

"Not as yet; I must turn over the whole matter quietly in my mind. It is a case where the least mistake might be ruin. He is a man who would resent any publicity as an offense never to be forgiven; and this makes the affair all the more difficult to deal with. Leave me now to think over it, and perhaps I may chance on some expedient to get us well through the scrape."

It was late in the afternoon of the following day when I next saw my wife, and was obliged to confess that I was just in the same condition of doubt and indecision in which she had left me. "Georgy's in the garden," said she; "come out and speak to her."

It was not exactly an easy thing to do, but I went. She was very pale, and her eyelids swollen, but she met me with a faint smile, and said, "I know you have not been to bed, and have been thinking of me all night; but I believe we must just suffer some events to roll on, and if a happy moment to intervene should occur, seize it. Isn't that your own thought?"

I nodded twice, and we walked along without a word on either side.

I remember very little of all that passed between us that day; the impression I carried away, however, was, that she was one of the best-natured, best-tempered women I had ever met; and this thought certainly did not in any way tend to the elevation of Frank in my esteem.

My reflections, as I sauntered about that evening, were not very agreeable ones. I pictured to myself all the versions of the story, each containing some minute particle of truth, that would get abroad, and I fancied how many little heightening incidents would be added by an eager and truth-loving public. I next bethought me of the comments that would be pronounced—those acute and wise remarks half-informed people deliver like solemn judgments. What was Mr. Considine about all this time? Can any one explain this gentleman's inactivity, his actual apathy? Then I fancied the impertinences of the press holding me up to rebuke or ridicule. Mr. Considine, who knew every thing and did nothing, does not appear to us the least reprehensible actor in the unhappy drama. It is sure to be a drama, occasionally to be called tragedy. There would be indignant inquiries, Why is not Mr. Considine examined? What steps have the authorities taken to ascertain the part played by this gentleman in this disastrous history? One is never very sure of what foreigners will not dramatize, and I had no fancy for figuring on the boards as the villain of the piece; perhaps—by no means unlikely—announced in the bill, "secretly in love with Frank's wife." I will not recall the horrors that tormented me; but I calmly declare that I think my sufferings on that occasion were scarcely inferior to Frank's own, though I don't suspect he would have agreed with me in this conviction.

I hastened off to a friend closely connected with the press, and engaged him on no account to let the newspapers occupy themselves with this story if it ever reached them. My friend consolingly assured me that I might set my mind at ease on that score, as the sharp-shooting "ver-ein" from Dusseldorf had just come down to contest for a prize, and drink beer with the brothers of St. Joseph te Noode; and that an earthquake that should swallow up half Europe would not obtain a paragraph at a moment so interesting and eventful. Although, then, the man who brought me the first tidings of the missing Englishman at Tervueren went the round of the papers with the news, not one of them would condescend to "set up" the information.

The piece had now begun—the curtain had risen; and I at once determined that, if possible, it should be a comedy—melodramatic, if you like—but still comedy. If I could not give it this turn that poor young woman would sink under it. I must make it droll, or it would be the death of her; and so I announced my news at the breakfast-table, saying, "First tableau—A stranger missed—hat found near the river—maker's name Whitty, Bond Street;" and then, before they had time for a word, I opened a note written in pencil. "Wavre.—Got here at twelve; shaved off beard and whiskers, not to be recognized by any one; engaged as second hostler; send news of her at once."

I led the way by a hearty laugh; my wife chimed in; and Georgina, though her eyes were very glassy, could not help joining; and thus, by one coup de tête, my victory was won.

"Here's the cipher," said I, taking out my note-book; "what am I to report you? Surprisingly wretched, or will you be stunned and insensible?"

"Put down 'three' four times," said my wife. "That's one too many," said I; "three threes means a triple X. of affliction."

"I'd rather say, 'Bearing it wonderfully,'" murmured Georgina; and her lips trembled with a struggle between a smile and a sob.

"I'll say, 'Behaving like an angel,'" said I; "and I'll write it in a bold hand, and no cipher at all;" and accordingly the bulletin was sent off by post: "Behaving like an angel—11 o'clock A.M." A special messenger arrived from Wavre the same evening with the following: "What do you mean? No enigmas. Report at once, and intelligibly, how does she bear it?"

It was almost with a cry of triumph I read this aloud in the drawing-room. "I see every card in his hand," I exclaimed; "the game is won already."

"You are right," said my wife; "he is in torture till he hears that she's inconsolable. The man can't endure the thought that you are able to survive him, dearest! There's the whole secret out! Yes, darling; it was one of those beautiful instances of the way husbands love their wives. They invariably expect that devotion is to be the return for the most outrageous bad treatment."

It was such a very rare thing for my wife to give way to a burst of eloquence after this fashion that I stared at her in speechless amazement.

"Look astonished if you like, Berto," said she to me, while her cheek was hot and her eyes flashing; "but it is not a thing to be calm upon. I know that if I—"

"Well, dear," said I, "continue."

"Don't ask me, or rather don't give me the provocation," said she, warily, "that's all."

This was a curious and somewhat unexpected turn for the discussion to take, but, on the whole, not altogether unfortunate. It created a sort of diversion which relieved Georgina from the uncomfortable prominence of being the person under consideration; and this enabled her, after a brief pause, to ask, with an air of calm, "Will you tell me why you believe that we have won this game?" She smiled as she repeated my own words.

"I'll tell you," I replied—and I spoke now slowly and collectedly. "Whenever your husband submitted you to any test you always came through the ordeal precisely as he desired you should. He wished he could make you jealous, and you satisfied him that he could. He wished that you might bear up courageously under a change of fortune, and confront even poverty without repining. This test also you stood victoriously. — Last of all, he would ascertain what effect his loss would produce upon you; and you have only to content him on this point to minister to that inordinate self-love which is never weary of feeding itself by your sacrifices, and the man will go on with this game forever. Just read his message, and you can not help seeing that I am right: 'No enigmas. How does she bear it?' means, 'Tell me she is overwhelmed with affliction—tell me she will listen to no words of comfort or consolation—that the cup of her misery is full to overflowing—that life must henceforth be a blank to her. In one word, he wants to hear that you sorrow without hope, and never care longer for life. This is what he asks for, and this is exactly what I'll send him.'"

"I declare I believe Berto is right," said my wife.

"I know I am. Frank would have given up these persecutions years ago, but his success dazzled him. With every fresh experiment he came out a gainer. He had only to fancy that you would be more lovable by this or that quality, and straightway you proved to him that you were what he so wished you to be. Now, without being in the least his apologist, I declare frankly I'm not a bit surprised at his being led away by such a bait to his vanity. Take my word for it, I have hit the blot. This is the true explanation of all he has done—of all he is doing."

"Am I then to appear as if I was indifferent, as if I was unconcerned?"

"No, not that. That would be as great an error on the other side. Utter heartlessness would revolt him as soon as he could be brought to believe it. We must go very cautiously to work here; and, to begin, we shall puzzle him a little; his impatience will soon show what our next move ought to be. My present message will not be a great deal clearer than my last. I will say, 'Health not worse—fortitude incredible.'"

"It's clear enough what you mean," said my wife; "you intend he should taste a little of those same anxieties he was so fond of inflicting on Georgina."

"Precisely word for word what I meant. He shall have a few days of that torturing uncertainty he has given her years of, and if he disapprove of the regimen the chance is he will not return to it."

I will not dwell on the days that followed this. I will simply state that I continued, by a system of partly vague, partly significant messages, to keep Thornton in a state of suspense, anxiety, and anger only short of mania. His interest in the game—for game it was—became intense; and when, to his wildest entreaties for a "Yes" or "No" answer to some urgent question, I returned an equivocal or totally unintelligible reply, I could see that there was great hope of his being cured at last of his fatal infatuation.

If I can not, however, dwell on this, as little do I like to recall the scenes I had to encounter at home; for though at first my wife and Georgina consented to aid me in my project, and appeared assured of its success, they soon began to feel misgivings about "our right" to do this, that, or the other. They questioned the propriety of one thing, and retreated from any partnership in another. In fact, they behaved like people who were already preparing their defense against some future accusation, and comporting themselves like persons already arraigned. This sort of opposition did not conduce to my comfort, and probably did not contribute to my prudence, and I am afraid—yes, I am obliged to own—I lost all patience, and told my wife, "If Georgina continues to thwart me I give you warning I will pitch up the whole affair—tell Thornton he may come back, or go to Jericho if he likes better—and leave the imbroglia to unravel itself how it may."

"What in the name of all patience," cried my wife, "do you want the poor woman to do?"

take Georgy out for a drive. It is above a month since she was in the air. Let us go and dine in the wood at Boisfort. There is no fear of meeting any one at this time of the year. Let us make a day of it, and try if we can not rally her spirits and amuse her."

"Is this to be another move of the game?" asked she, smiling.

"Well, as you ask me so frankly, I will own it is."

"There's Georgy now in the garden; let us go and talk it over with her;" and so saying we opened the glass door and went out.

We had not gone many steps when we saw Georgina running toward us, her face radiant with joy. "Oh, what do you think?" cried she, in a voice ringing with delight; "I have seen him—he was there."

"Where?"

"In the stable-yard. Your people were taking in hay, and there he was among the country people, dressed like a peasant, beard and mustaches shaved off, and so changed that no eyes but my own could have recognized him. He crossed over the little pathway and stood looking up at my window till apparently some one remarked it, when he moved away and disappeared. But I knew him. Poor fellow, how worn and ill he looked! not but it has done my heart good even to catch a glimpse of him, and to know that he was longing to see me."

"I told you how it would all turn out," said I, triumphantly. "It only required a little patience and persistence, and I knew he must succumb."

My wife said nothing, a clear proof that she felt vanquished at last. With a half irritable tone, as of one who did not like to quit the field without a shot, she said, "And your fine project about Boisfort, and the dinner in the wood—how does it fit into the present conjuncture?"

"As if it was made expressly for it. Frank

Never, and I have had a long experience of it, did I see it looking more beautiful than on this bright day of early May, as we drove into the little cour, and were surrounded by a cordon of delighted waiters, beaming with joy at the first harbingers of the coming season.

I had ordered a very choice "little" dinner—that is, there were to be very few dishes, but each was to be a capo d'opera, executed by the gran maestro, Mons. Dubos, himself; and how glad am I to commemorate, even thus passingly, one whose genius has so often delighted, whose resources have so often refreshed me! Oh man of many entrées, separated by long distance of weary miles from you, how often do I wonder whether your oyster pâtés are as exquisite, your suprêmes as superlatively delicious, as of yore! Your little garden amidst the feathery beech-trees, with its clear fish-pond, its myriad of singing-birds, and its snow-white napkins, rises before my mind's eye; and I can revive hours of enjoyment as I recall the time when I sipped my iced Champagne, lying, Melibœus-like, among the cowslips.

Our table stood under a magnificent beech-tree, whose lower branches were perfectly festooned with a gorgeous japonica, that hung in graceful clusters above and around us: a little hedge of sweet-brier flanked us on one side, and a small artificial mound, covered with hot-house plants for the occasion, delighted the eye on another. A tiny fountain threw a spray-like shower over the leaves, imparting that sense of cool and freshness so pleasant at meal-times.

My wife and Georgina were in ecstasy with it all. There is nothing like a woman to appreciate the double delights of rusticity and an exquisite dinner. The charms of nature, the song of birds, the odor of flowers, seem to dispose her to a higher sense of enjoyment of the good things of the table; and she can blend her delights in a way utterly unknown to our coarser natures.

"Yes," said my wife, in reply to a whispered remark of Georgina's—"yes, it is one of the things he excels in."

I knew this was a panegyric on my talents as a host; and as I arranged my napkin I felt a thrill of proud triumph through me. I ought to mention here that Georgina, yielding to my wife's insistence, had given up wearing black, which she had done since Frank's departure, and was dressed in a gray silk, with a quantity of lace about it, that became her vastly; indeed she looked handsomer than ever I had seen her.

I read over the bill of fare aloud, and we began our dinner. I will own I sipped my soup with an anxious heart. I had given Georgina her lesson—I had taught her all she was to do—I had thoroughly drilled her in her part, and made her even rehearse it in my library before we started; but what assurance had I that she would not break down, after all? What certainty was there that her agitation might not overcome her at the eventful moment, and a pitiable exhibition of emotion end in utter failure? I did all that prudence could suggest; and when I had filled her glass with choice Madeira I muttered to myself, "the Fates must take charge of the rest."

I could notice that her agitation was very great, but that she fought nobly against it, and especially that my wife should not observe her emotion. Our talk at first was chiefly of the dinner; and fortunately there was nothing to say on this head but praise.

As I deemed it likely that I might detect Frank and his disguise before his wife might be aware of his presence, I had prearranged with Georgina that I would signal the fact of his being come by ordering the waiter to give me Champagne, which if I took in a glass intended for Bordeaux was to mean that I saw him. I was relating some commonplace anecdote when I gave this order, and then went on with my story. I watched her, however, steal a glance toward my glass, and saw a slight tremor pass over her as the man filled it.

"Do you really like dining in this fashion?" asked I, with a half-careless air; "or is it too irregular, too disorderly, for your taste?"

"I like it," said she, hastily, but not raising her head as she spoke.

"I like it too," said my wife; "but I own M. Dubos and his good cookery go a considerable way in biasing my judgment; and I half suspect, if we were able to have such a chef at home, I'd rather dine there than here."

"I protest loudly," cried I, "against any warped opinion. I stand up for my rural delights, and will do battle for my rose-buds and nightingales and almond-blossoms against all comers." I watched Frank while I was speaking, and by a concerted sign encouraged him to draw nearer, and busy himself at a side-table. I then filled Georgina's glass with Champagne,

"FRANK WAS NOW STANDING BEHIND HER CHAIR, ALMOST BENDING OVER HER."

She does her utmost to look cheerful and contented, but if I go to her room I always find her in tears. She went with you at first when you said that her husband might be cured of his unhappy misgivings if he only once experienced the sort of misery they produced; but now she owns she sees him no nearer to this goal than ever; and I agree with her perfectly."

"And whose fault is it if it be so? Did she not refuse me t'other day permission to tell him, as I suggested, that she was actually shocked with herself for being so happy?"

"Yes, and quite right, too. The poor thing cries her eyes out, and why should she say an untruth?"

"But don't you see it is a finesse of the game?"

"Oh, I'm sick of the game! If a man can not behave well to his wife without being cheated into it, the sooner she gets rid of him the better."

I believe the discussion grew animated, and even warm; but after many little sallies into each other's lines, we came back to where we started, by my wife abruptly asking, "Is this, then, to go on for years? He was, if I understood you aright, to be so stung in self-love, so wounded in pride, by finding that his wife could live without him, that he would hasten back to assure her of his undying affection. Wasn't that the theory?"

"Yes," said I, haughtily, "that was the theory."

"And has it proved a success?"

"It would have had a triumphant success if she had followed my advice."

"Oh, are we back there again?" cried she, with a weary sigh.

Controlling my temper as well as I could, I made a few turns in the room, when suddenly a thought shot across my mind, and I said, "You were advising the other morning that we should has now shown how miserable he is at not having any intelligible news of Georgina. But my messages, as I meant they should, have almost driven him crazy. He could endure the uncertainty no longer, and hence, at any risk, he came up here to try and see her. Boisfort, or I greatly mistake, must finish the drama, and display him penitent and imploring pardon at the fall of the curtain."

"It is all far too astute and too subtle for me," said my wife, saucily. "I am heartily glad that the success of the piece depends on much finer intellects."

We were again getting into skirmishing-ground, so I beat a retreat into the house, and sent off the following few lines to Frank, at Wavre:

"We mean, by way of a little change of air and distraction, to take her out to dine at Boisfort on Saturday. I shall order our table to be laid in the garden, near the lake. If you wish to judge with your own eyes how she looks, you could easily disguise yourself, and affect to be engaged in arranging another table in the vicinity. The hour will be five o'clock."

That little garden at Boisfort, in the midst of the forest of Soignies, is a very pretty spot, and never prettier than in the spring, when the fruit trees are in blossom, and the bright green grass is covered with a perfect shower of apricot and cherry buds, and the air loaded with their delicious perfume. One is sure to have the place to himself, besides, at this early season; for, no matter how fine the weather, or how tempting the day, no sensible Belgian would go out to dine under the trees till the almanac had given him assurance that the time for such festivities was duly come; nor is it by any means certain that the carp in the pond would permit themselves to be tempted to the surface by crumbs of bread at a season unconsecrated by custom and tradition.

and whispered a few words to her.

"Yes," said she, timidly, but still aloud—"yes, he liked it: but, as in every thing else, he was so capricious that one never could say when he would declare it was odious."

My wife actually started with astonishment at these words. Never before had she heard from Georgina any thing but unqualified praise of her husband.

"How tiresome these capricious people are!" said I. "They impart to existence all the miseries of the ague; to think when you are not burning you are shivering."

"Worse than that," chimed in Georgina, "they make one distrust his own nature. The very fact that you see what you intended accepted as something exactly the opposite, leads you to suppose there must be some terrible want of right perception in yourself, and you begin to distrust not only every thing but every body."

"If one were to analyze all his food before he began to eat it nutrition would go on somewhat slowly," said I.

"And wouldn't the food be very appetizing, besides?" said Georgina, laughing.—

"I declare to you, I was quite worn out with eternal trials; for I wasn't merely questioned, like the man in the book, what I should do if I saw a white bear, but I was threatened with a whole region of bears."

Frank was now standing behind her chair, almost bending over her, his face glowing with rage, and his eyes starting out of their sockets.

"I don't think I ever heard you speak in this way before," said my wife, whose voice had a twang of rebuke in it very palpable and remarkable.

"Perhaps not. Perhaps these surroundings," said she, with a laugh, "have led me on to expansiveness; perhaps I couldn't repress it any longer."

"What was the feather that broke the camel's back?" said my wife.

"My dear friend, it was a wool-pack! Please tell this man not to lay his hand on my chair."

Frank started back, almost staggering, and then recovering himself he walked slowly round the table till he came directly in front of her.

Georgina glanced at him hastily, and said, "These people, I take it, don't understand English?"

"Of course not," I replied; "but why do you ask?"

"There's a creature yonder has a wonderful look of Frank, if it were possible that cutting off his beard could make him so hideous."

"Good Heavens, woman!" shouted he, in a voice wild with passion, "are you so utterly heartless, so shamelessly lost to all feeling as this?"

Before this short burst was over Georgina had fallen fainting to the ground. Her effort had been more than she had strength for, and it was long before we could bring her back to life and consciousness. When at length her heart rallied, and the film passed from before her eyes, the first object she saw was her husband kneeling at her feet and covering her hand with kisses.

We had told him every thing, and his delight was boundless.

Frank was cured; but I declare I'll not treat such another case as long as I live.

MARRIAGE

CELIBACY

MARRIAGE OR CELIBACY?

I.
MARRIAGE or Celibacy? That's the question
Which worries men and women nowadays:
Our land's too small for us, so people say;
And no one has a sensible suggestion.
What is the luckless bachelor to do
Whose wants are numerous, whose hundreds very few?

II.
See at his club he sits, and the effervescent
Fluid beside him laves the lucid ice;
Witty his friends, his coats extremely nice,
Fragrant his weeds. Why can't he be quiescent,
Dismiss his matrimonial dreams, and harden
His heart against the girl he saw at Winter Garden?

III.
Her voice was musical, her eyes were luminous,
Her fair fresh face was like a rich rose-cluster,
She was a dream of loveliness and lustre:
Ay, that's the way our friend becomes voluminous
In eulogy. His cronies, in derision,
Should ask him what 'twill cost to keep the pretty vision.

IV.
No: best keep single, if you are not strong.
Eat your gay dinners by the breezy shore;
Laugh with light LESBIA: deem a wife a bore;
Do all that's pleasant, whether right or wrong.
What though you pass, and leave no name or trace?
Our country little needs your weak and frivolous race.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE old-fashioned method of converting fruit into rich sweetmeats by adding "a pound of sugar to a pound of fruit," has been almost entirely superseded by the various processes of "canning." By hermetically sealing fruit the original flavor is very perfectly preserved, and a much more wholesome condiment for the table is secured than the rich preserves in which our mothers used to take so much pride. To be sure their store-rooms made a fine display of rows of glass jars and tumblers filled with brilliant-colored contents. And it was a matter of friendly competition among housewives whose sweets should look the handsomest. But nowadays the great point is not so much the color as the flavor of the fruit.

Great care should be taken in the selection of fruit for canning. Some varieties can not be preserved at all, unless canned when perfectly fresh, and success is more certain if this particular is always regarded. The fruit should be nearly or quite ripe, but bear no signs of decay. Instead of boiling the fruit, it has been recommended to steam it, thus preserving it unbroken. Many put it into jars before cooking at all, boiling it in water a few minutes afterward. A little sugar is frequently used in canning, but many who have been very successful in this business say that no sugar is necessary, and that the flavor of the fruit is retained better without it.

Nova Scotia is recommended as a summer resort. It is said that throughout all of our heated term not a single case of sun-stroke was reported there, and the residents and visitors—of whom there were many—were enjoying splendid weather, with pure and refreshing breezes from the Atlantic. Halifax is much frequented by summer visitors, and yet the Province contains many pleasanter spots, which would be specially attractive if there were good accommodations for visitors.

An exchange cautions young ladies against traveling alone in the cars—mentioning the case of a young lady who was recently traveling on one of the principal lines of railroads in this State, and in order to make certain connections, was obliged to prolong her ride through the night. An intelligent-looking gentleman occupied the seat with her, and commenced conversing. The lady made little reply, and soon turned toward the window; and leaning her head upon her hand, appeared to be asleep. She was, however, too well experienced in traveling to sleep under such circumstances. It was not long before she became conscious of the fumes of chloroform arising beneath her face, and instantly the real character of her would-be companion flashed upon her. Waiting a moment in calm self-possession, she distinctly heard the motion of the villain's hand, which had found its way behind her, compressing a rubber vessel from which the deadening fumes were arising; and then suddenly throwing open the window, she breathed the fresh air before her senses had become affected. Having thus rescued herself, she bestowed one significant look upon the rascal, who speedily left the car. She preferred going on her way to being subjected to the delay that would be caused by seeking an exposure of the attempted villainy.

The happiness of a family depends largely upon a wise regimen of food. Yet, as a general thing, there is too much cooking done. Rich cakes and pastry are not what children or even grown people should indulge in freely. But ripe fruit might with great advantage be used instead of hot breakfast dishes and unwholesome desserts. If it is desired to cook the fruit, excellent puddings, far more healthful than those compounded with the ordinary rich or heavy pastry, may be very easily made with apples, peaches, huckleberries, or any well-flavored and juicy fruit, in this way: Take a fresh loaf of baker's bread, or better still, what are called "Sally Lunn's," cut in slices, spread with butter, and line a pudding-dish with them. Put in the fruit, properly prepared; when peaches are used, the flavor is better to retain the stones. If the dish is deep, put a couple of slices of bread-and-butter between the fruit. Cover the whole with slices, and bake. If the fruit is not very juicy a little water should be added. With a nice, sweet sauce the pudding is excellent.

There is an article used in Paris for cleaning watches called "Essence Lemoine." It has been proved that it is simply pure benzine, combined with some substance to give it a pleasant odor. Benzine is said to be excellent for cleansing watches, removing all the grease and dirt, without disturbing the gilding or affecting the shellac cement used for fastening in the jewels.

Those who are now in the country might lay up treasures for winter by gathering grasses, ferns, and leaves, and drying or pressing them. A tasteful combination of these make pretty and enduring bouquets, which will give the parlor a cheerful look in winter when fresh blossoms are difficult to obtain. Even the common grasses are graceful and beautiful; and by adding to what can easily be obtained in summer, a good selection of autumn leaves, the variety in color is charming. Ferns need to be pressed with great care, but when well pressed and carefully placed in vases, they last a long time, and look well.

What is said to be the prettiest cottage at Nantah is a log-cabin, every log of which was brought from Canada wrapped in cotton wool. This cottage is embowered in trees and shrubbery, and, with its vermillion-colored wood-work, and the gray lichens on its sloping roof, is one of the most picturesque objects in the village.

The French impart an artificial flavor to apples and pears by plucking the fruit before quite ripe, pricking it all over with a fine needle, and placing it in a vessel with essence of any desired kind. The exhalations of the essence are absorbed in a few seconds by the fruit, and the operation is repeated several times until the fruit is ripe, when it will be found to have acquired the desired taste.

The Marine Garden at Toulon, France, boasts of containing the largest rose-bush in existence. It is called the Lady Banks, and covers a wall seventy-five feet in width and eighteen feet in height. The trunk measures, near the root, two feet eight inches. During the month of April it produces 50,000 white roses. The oldest known rose-bush is the one which grows upon the wall of the cathedral Hildesheim, Prussia. It is one thousand years of age, and from its trunk, which is one foot in diameter, extend six branches fifteen feet in height.

The recent eclipse of the sun, which was visible only in parts of the eastern hemisphere, was, from a combination of many circumstances, a very remarkable astronomical event. According to all calculations, a similar one will not occur for centuries to come. The duration of the total eclipse, in places where the phenomenon reached its highest point, was estimated to be not less than six minutes and fifty seconds. England, France, and Germany sent expeditions to various places in India and elsewhere, which promised to be favorable points for observation. The physical structure of the sun is a matter which science has found but little opportunity to investigate; and the results of these expeditions will be looked to with much interest.

A singular occurrence—the bursting of a glacier—occurred the latter part of July, at Chamounix, Savoy. It was announced by a peal of thunder and a continuous roar, which aroused every one in the village. Presently what seemed a puff of smoke was seen on the crest of the mountain that supports the Glacier des Pelerins, and a cry was raised that the glacier had burst, bringing with it part of the moraine that had kept it within bounds. The avalanche rushed on, bringing with it pine-trees, huge boulders, rude bridges, and deserted chalets, until it reached the pretty Cascade du Dard. Here, tearing down trees, it opened an immense track and overflowed the meadows and gardens of the Hotel Royal. After spending its fury for twenty minutes on meadow and peasant land, this muddy mass formed itself into a large lake, which will remain some time, to be regarded by tourists as an event which is very rare in the valley of the Chamounix.

A stylish-looking young girl was standing on the piazza of Congress Hall, Saratoga, a short time ago. She was chatting with a gentleman who appeared to be a highly respectable business man. She was overheard to say to him: "Now, I bet on the horse you told me to bet on, and I lost my ten dollars." "Well, I lost twenty-one hundred dollars on the same horse," was the answer. "Too bad, isn't it?" "What a pity that young girls should be drawn into the practice of betting!"

Punch says that fashion, in regard to color and caloric, is more unscientific as touching male than female attire. It requires men to put themselves into suits of black when they go to dance in crowded ball-rooms. The consequence is liquefaction. In such weather as we have had lately men should wear a fatigue dress-coat, waistcoat, and trousers made, as the Lancet suggests, of white flannel. It might, if needful, be trimmed with pink, scarlet, or sky-blue, or any other tint suitable to the tomfoolery of capering, and satisfactory to the ladies.

A snow-storm is reported from Mount Washington. Very refreshing in August!

From Rome we learn that Miss Hosmer has completed her "Waking Fawn," satisfactorily to herself. Her first conception of this idea did not please her, and although completed in marble, and a large offer made for it, she refused to allow it to leave her studio. Its successor is undoubtedly finer, and it is already bought, and will be immediately put into marble and sent to England.

In Madrid it is not the custom for ladies to take any special care of their children: they commit them, when infants, to the charge of Asturian nurses. These nurses are dressed by their mistresses, who seem to vie with each other in adorning them as richly as possible. The costume is very pretty. A short skirt of silk or velvet, generally scarlet or bright blue, with a bodice opened in front and laced across. An apron of black and silver, or black and gold, tied behind with a bow, and long ends; a colored silk handkerchief over the head, from under which the hair hangs in two long plaits below the waist. The skirt of the dress is generally trimmed with broad bands of velvet, sometimes edged with gold or silver, and the body, which is cut square about the throat, with innumerable little silver buttons. Long ear-rings are worn, and a chain of silver or coral is coiled many times around the neck.

A highly cultivated circle in Paris are at present much interested in a new and great marvel. A young girl, about thirteen years old, who has received only an ordinarily good education, has exhibited remarkable mental precocity. She speaks a number of languages with extraordinary ease, and has rapidly developed within a few months a depth and extent of knowledge of every kind which is literally miraculous. Her reading has been limited, and her knowledge of the world slight, yet there is scarcely an event in history, a great work of art, a distinguished man of letters, an artist, monarch, or statesman, unknown to her. Of all these she speaks as if they were known to her by experience. Her mind darts like lightning in conversation from hint to conjecture, and she surmises and draws forth facts and truths with a strange power. There is nothing supernatural about her, but the power she has appears to be purely mental.

The latest fashionable diversion in Paris is to spend an hour in the air in a balloon, which is confined to the earth by a strong cable. Elegant ladies and gentlemen take their afternoon airing thus instead of on wheels.

There are a good many people in the world who are about as reasonable in their complaints about men and things as a certain little boy we once heard about. His dinner did not suit him, so his mother made that all right; then his cup did not satisfy him, so another was brought; then his chair was not right, and his father took him on his lap, saying, "Are you all right now?" The boy looked around the room, and seeing the cat crossing the floor with tail erect, he said aloud, in a vexed voice, "There! the old cat's tail sticks up!" The cat's tail was, in his case, the straw that broke the camel's back.

Market-prices in Alaska present a great temptation to emigrate—not to mention the weather. For example: Deer, from $3 to $4; grouse, 25 cents each; ducks, 25 cents each; wild-geese, 75 cents to $1; snipe, 50 cents a dozen; clams, 25 cents a basket; halibut, as much as you can carry for 75 cents; cod, 50 cents for a big fish; salmon, during the season, from 10 to 25 cents each.

In a recent "Book About Spain" the writer gives a more pleasant view of the Queen of Spain than is usual. "She is exactly like her photographs, except that you must add to them a nose and lips that look as if newly stung by a wasp. She has, however, a frank, pleasing expression, which makes you fancy she must have been comely enough when she was young; and her manners are said to be singularly agreeable, and withal queenly. Every one says that after you have been a short time in her company you forget what she is in the charm of her manner. Among the lower classes and the country people she is popular. Whatever the Queen may be, she never had a fair chance of being an honest woman, and she is at least as much sinned against as sinning. In her younger days she was regularly encouraged and trained in all sorts of excesses by her mother, who was anxious to keep the power in her own hands by any means within reach. The King looks like a little boy who has been very well whipped, and he is almost lost to sight behind his wife's portly figure. He is always spoken of with the greatest contempt, and is called 'Piquito,' the extreme diminutive of Francisco. He is a meagre, weak-looking little man, with a high treble voice, which makes him still more ridiculous."

 GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 33c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N. B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY

OF

THE GREAT REBELLION

IN

THE UNITED STATES.

By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN.

With nearly One Thousand Illustrations.

COMPLETE IN TWO VOLS. QUARTO, CLOTH, $12 00.

This work contains 998 Illustrations. Of these 562 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, among which is a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the great lines of communication; and 337 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

From the Agent of the Massachusetts State Board of Education.

STATE HOUSE, BOSTON, August 18, 1868.

I have seen no other History of the Rebellion that seems to embrace so many admirable qualities as this does. I wish that so carefully prepared, beautifully illustrated, and reliable a History of our late Civil War might be placed in the library of every Grammar and High School and Academy in our country.

THE MOONSTONE.

A NOVEL.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "Armada," "The Woman in White," "No Name," "Antonina," "Queen of Hearts," &c., &c.

With many Illustrations.

8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

 The carefully-elaborate workmanship, and the wonderful construction of the story; the admirable manner in which every circumstance and incident is fitted together, and the skill with which the secret is kept to the last; so that, when all seems to have been discovered, there is a final light thrown upon people and things which give them a significance they had not before.—London Athenæum.

The style alone would secure for it a prominent place among modern works of fiction. Its merits in this respect are apt to be lost sight of in the very remarkable plot, to the construction of which Mr. Wilkie Collins has brought endless ingenuity and labor. The arrangement of the materials is admirable.—London Review.

 Altogether The Moonstone is one of the most remarkable novels of the day, its literary excellence being not the least of its many merits.  If any writer of the time possesses the faculty of interesting his readers in his work, it is Mr. Wilkie Collins. Indeed, he possesses it in so great a degree as to withdraw attention from other faculties of his, which are full as worthy of admiration. The mass of his readers are so astounded at his skill in concocting and unraveling plots that they forget to observe his skill in delineating character. In The Moonstone the characters and the scenes through which they move are exceedingly life-like.—Albion.

LOVE or MARRIAGE?

A NOVEL.

By WILLIAM BLACK.

8vo, Paper, Fifty Cents.

The narrative is readable and consistent. Throughout the volume there are marks of reflection and study, and the most embarrassing situations are managed with great delicacy. . . . There is a strength in it.—Daily News.

In one respect it is emphatically distinguished from the enormous majority of novels—the author possesses an amount of speculative intelligence which is, perhaps, not less than his direct productive power as a writer of imagination. In this particular he is superior to all recent novelists—it would not be too much to say, superior to all English novelists whatever, except George Eliot.—Illustrated Times.

We must take it out of the category of works composed by the Camillas who skim over the fields of fiction and display their ankles in the flight. The characters of Helstone and Glencairn are well conceived and developed. The latter especially is a good study, and seems to have been thought out fully and carefully by the author. . . . Whenever Mr. Black paints a landscape, he does it with a grace and a tenderness which are only equalled by his photographic power of rendering it distinctive.—Pall Mall Gazette.

FACETIÆ.

A HINT.—If you want to induce a friend to give up any unnecessary habit, this is the weather to do it.

A traveler, among other narrations of wonders of foreign parts, declared he knew a cane a mile long. The company looked incredulous, and it was evident they were not prepared to swallow it, even if it should have been a sugar-cane. "Pray, what kind of a cane was it?" asked a gentleman, sneeringly. "It was a hurricane," replied the traveler.

One of our crockery merchants will hereafter import fashion plates. He has an eye to business.

An elderly Pennsylvania woman, with her daughter, looking at the marble statue of Girard in the college building the other day, startled the by-standers by exclaiming, "La! Sally, how white he was!"

In Nevada, a contemplative Digger Indian sat watching a party of baseball players, who seemed to him to be working very hard. Turning to one of them, he asked, "How much you get one day?"

A widow lady received a present of a turkey. "Who sent it?" she asked of the Irish porter. "I was told not to tell," said he. "Ah! I can guess," said the lady. "Bedad," said the porter, "that's just what I told Deacon Grant."

Biddy came back from whortleberrying, and was asked if she found the berries plenty. "Sure, yes," said she, "but the dry weather has made them so small that it takes the whole of a peck to make a quart."

EPITHALAMIUM.

Something Patti-cularly gay
We're called upon to tell;
How dainty Patti, 'other day,
Got married to a swell.

For Dia's reasons, to be wed
Patti resolved, we know;
Co-partnership, no doubt, was one
That made her take a Caux.

In church sweet Adelina leaned
On Caux, so brave and strong.
The Cockneys said, "Twas plain, for him
She 'ad a leaning long."

The bridesmaids, as in duty bound,
In copious torrents shed
Salt tears—when Caux his Patti kissed
And patted on the head!

The déjeuner was served, of course,
In silver Patti-pans;
And all the beverages were Brought up in coco-cans!

But here we hope that Patti may
Be happy as she's meet,
And some fine day, his new bonne bouche
Caux may not try to eat!

That Marquis Caux may never find,
We pray, his Patti cold—
Nor Patti lose her appetite
For love, and turn a scold!

HEATED FANCIES.

DEAR SIR,—In this unusually tropical weather any hints that conduce to the comfort of our suffering fellow-creatures must be very acceptable. I venture to send you a few ingenious devices by means of which I have experienced great relief during the intense heat of the last few weeks:

Diet.—This is a very important point. All sweet things should be avoided, as tending to heat and acidity. By taking a tea-spoonful of common salt in a large cup of hot tea every two hours, the whole system will be refreshed, and the stomach kept cool. Meat should be avoided. West India pickles and capsi-cums are an excellent prophylactic.

Dress.—This should be light and porous. Thin sponges sown together, and kept moist, form a very comfortable garment. I have tried as a head-dress a square helmet of light wicker-work covered with green gauze curtains to keep off the flies; it should be lined with cabbage-leaves at the top; or a few branches of the sycamore-tree, arranged like a wigwag, will be found to shade the eyes and keep the head cool.

Bathing.—This should be carefully avoided, except in very hot water. I have found it very useful to have my bath fitted with a large spirit-lamp, and I stay in till the water boils; I find, on coming out, that the air feels comparatively cool, even in the hottest part of the day.

As for general directions, I strongly advise the avoidance of all excitement or emotion of any sort. For instance, if you should happen to fall head foremost into a wasps' nest, as I did the other day, you will find it much better to lie still and allow the busy little insects to amuse themselves by stinging you than, by trying to escape, to heat and flurry yourself.

Above all, avoid politics, unripe fruit, duns, strong spirits, fatal accidents, and high animal food: you will then find that the heat is by no means so unbearable as some would lead us to think. I remain, Sir, Yours coolly, ISIDORE ISIR.

COUNTRY FARMER (at the Art Exhibition).—"I've heeard as the paint on some o' these yere 'picters' comes to a matter o' ten dollars sometimes, let alone the man's time a-layin' of it on, yer know!"

SUGGESTIVE ADVERTISING.

We read in a paper:

A FOREIGN LADY, who is about to travel, wishes to meet with a cheerful young widow, who would join her.

The lady is, no doubt, particular; but would not some hilarious bereaved mother or jolly young orphan do as well?

TRUE INDEED.—He who would make a name in life must have an aim in life.

A PRACTICAL ARTIST—A man who can always draw his salary.

NO PLACE LIKE THE CITY.—The man who has a stake in the country writes to say that he is longing to get back to a chop in town.

THE CLOTHES OF THE SEASON—The "Latest Fash-ions!"

APPROPRIATE EPITAPHS.

On a Liar.—He lies here, his spirit's fled; he can not lie because he's dead.

On a Cobbler.—He spent his all (and) he lived too fast; and at death's call he breathed his last.

On a Printer.—He locked up forms while he had breath, and now he's locked in the arms of death.

On an Editor.—He who lies in this small space was good for he did right (write) always.

On a Beer-seller.—In life he measured out his beer, and now he measures his length here.

On a Fishmonger.—No longer in good fish he deals, for death has got him by the (h)eeels.

CARRIAGE AND DINNER DRESSES.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

Carriage and Dinner Dresses.

Fig. 1.—CARRIAGE DRESS. Under-skirt of plain blue foulard, with a deep flounce, three-eighths of a yard wide, cut in points on each side; these points are edged with white guipure, the top ones forming the heading of the flounce. Over-skirt of white foulard, sprigged with blue, and trimmed with two flounces bordered with narrow white guipure; this skirt is caught up on each side by two blue ribbons, an inch and a half wide, covered with guipure insertion, and edged on both sides with narrow guipure. Low corsage and Marie Antoinette fichu like the over-skirt. Round, flat hat of white straw, trimmed with roses, with black lace strings.

Fig. 2.—DINNER DRESS. Pink silk under-skirt, trimmed with three flounces. Over-skirt of white gauze, with stripes alternately opaque and transparent, trimmed with a flounce, surmounted by two ruches turned in the contrary direction, and confined by a fold of pink silk. This skirt is looped up on each side by bows of pink ribbon, and is short in front and very long behind, in the Watteau fashion (with large pleats in the back).

A GLIMPSE.

Oh, when the night is clear, I meet,
Reeling through his yellowing vines
Tired Autumn, both his ivory feet
Stained in the brown juice of his wines.
With purple grapes his forehead crowned,
And shocks of corn about his ears,
And from his shoulder to the ground
Long webs of rime whose woven spheres
Trail torn and hoar and grayly drowned
In myriad twinkles, and the year's Aroma in his bosom bound.
Seeing no artifice he vain
In these cool hours he numbers them again,
With his completed work a moment lingers,
Powders with golden dust the millet glume,
Curls the crisp leaf, and in his dripping fingers,
Pinches the pomegranate's carbuncled bloom.
Threading with cunning care his gorgeous mazes,
Freezing fantastic mist above the springs,
Veiling the distances in happy hazes
And all the woodland under filmy wings,
Slowly he glides, rapt in his subtle fancies,
Now burnishes a bough with golden gleams,
Now reddens all the leaves beneath his glances,
And, beckoning the northern lights' wild streams,
Smiles well content among his necromancies
And seeks the sweet companionship of dreams—
What time with one star on the tip
Of each extended wheel away,
While his meridian wheel and dip
The Swan flies down the Milky Way.

BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES.

IN case of any sudden attack of disease it is well to know what to do, or avoid doing, to the sufferer during those anxious moments before the doctor comes. Specific directions can be given for particular cases, but there is this general rule applicable to all: Don't go to the medicine chest, if you have the misfortune to possess one. More maladies are to be found in it than remedies, and it is an axiom that in those houses where most drugs are used the greatest number of diseases prevail.

There are, however, certain things which can be done by unprofessional persons even, for the relief of most diseases, provided that they will take the trouble to inform themselves of what is proper to do. This information, indeed, it is the duty of every one to acquire, for upon its completeness and proper application may depend the lives of thousands. There are few diseases, if any, which require active interference, and the main thing to learn is how to abstain judiciously from it. There is an almost irresistible tendency to force some disagreeable stuff or other down the throat of a sick person. No drug of any kind, unless its action is thoroughly understood, and the occasion for its use perfectly apparent, should ever be given by other than the doctor. It is a mistake to suppose that medicines are essentially beneficent in their operation, or, if not positively beneficial, are innocent. If drugs do no good they are sure to do a good deal of harm, and physicians of the wisest experience are the most distrustful of them. As a general rule, then, in case of a sudden attack of disease, whatever it may be, don't look to the medicine chest for relief.

The main object of a non-professional person should be, as in fact it must be of the professional, to facilitate the satisfaction of the apparent wants of the sufferer from disease. If there is evident thirst, give him drink; if a gasping for air, let him have it; if there is a sensation of heat, apply cold; and if of cold, supply warmth. It is always more prudent to act in accordance with the instinctive desires of the patient than the acquired opinions of the attendant. Nature is a surer guide than art.

There is no greater mistake than the prevalent idea that when we have a sick person we must always be doing. A great deal of mischief arises from this benevolent but harmful diligence. A person falls down in a swoon, and we forsooth, in our well-intentioned but fatal ignorance, murder him by putting and keeping him on his legs. Another lies prostrate from exhaustion, and while a provident nature strives to restore him with repose, we torture him to death by an affectionate but worrying solicitude.

In case of any sudden attack of disease, the first thing to do is, of course, to remove any apparent cause of it. The next is to place the patient under those circumstances known to be favorable to the comfort, convenience, and health of all people, well or ill. Unloose every tightened garment, lay the sufferer upon a bed or sofa where the limbs can be stretched at perfect ease, and after supplying the immediate and apparent want, whether of air, water, heat, or cold, let him alone until the doctor comes.

CHILDREN'S NAMES.

PARENTS are apt to think that they have the right to call their children what they please. We would remind them, however, that, apart from the claims of good taste, which should never be disregarded, every mother's son and daughter have a vested interest in the names bestowed upon them. Parents have no right, socially, to disqualify their offspring by affixing to them either inappropriate or unseemly appellations.

In well-regulated families the simple rule is followed of giving the children the names of their grand-parents, parents, and other relatives. In Scotland the first son is named after the father's father, the first daughter after the mother's mother, the second son after the father, and the second daughter after the mother. This is a good general rule to follow, which however admits of exceptions. No one, for example, should perpetuate an ancestral name which has graced the Newgate Calendar, been affixed to the village stocks, or swung from the gallows-tree. If the appellation, moreover, should be positively ugly, it ought to have the go-by. There is nothing gained by reviving the Hezekiah Hogshead, for example, of some near relative, however reputable and dearly beloved. Parents can do no better than strengthen the family bond of union by a repetition to the furthest generation of the family names from which the ugly and disreputable have been weeded out.

The prevailing Christian names in an English or American family are an indication more or less of its origin. The predominance of Franks, Charleses, Hughs, Isabels, Louisas, Catherines, etc., is a proof of cavalier, as that of Hezekiahs, Reubens, Jonahs, Jonathans, Rebeccas, Marthas, etc., is of Puritanic descent.

Names, however, are now frequently given which indicate nothing more than the peculiar sentiments, tastes, caprices, and fancies of those who bestow them. The pious are apt to turn to the Bible for a choice, and affix to their children, with a fond and almost superstitious hope of sanctification, the names of some patriarch, saint, or apostle. It is curious how little discrimination is sometimes used in selecting appellations from the Holy Book, which is supposed with simple reverence to render sacred every thing it may contain. We have all heard of the mother who insisted upon calling her first-born Beelzebub, for it was, she declared, a Scriptural name, which none could gainsay. We know two promising scions of a serious family, who bear respectively the names of Abiathar Benaiah, and Jonah Jonathan.

The sentimental are apt to be guided by the last novel they have read, and to borrow the name of a favorite hero or heroine for the beloved son or daughter of their house. "Our second child, a girl," says the Vicar of Wakefield, "I intended to call after her aunt Grissel; but my wife, who during her pregnancy had been reading romances, insisted upon her being called Olivia."

The patriotic choose national names; and thus the Patricks abound in Ireland, the Georges in England, the Andrews in Scotland, the Hermanns in Germany, the Louises in France, and the Washingtons and Franklins in the United States. In selecting the names of distinguished people for their children, it would be wise for parents to await the full verdict of posterity before committing themselves to any one's reputation for greatness. It is not safe to assume the excellence of any contemporary name, and affix to a child a supposed honorable appellation which time may turn into a stigma of disgrace.

It is better perhaps to avoid altogether the names of mark, for the children who bear them will necessarily suffer by the continually suggested comparison with those who first bore them. If their careers should be humble, their humility will be increased; if aspiring, their utmost reach will be deemed a shortcoming. Ridicule or disappointment must be the inevitable result. No William Shakespeare Smith, Francis Bacon Jones, Isaac Newton Brown, Julius Caesar Jenkins, or Marcus Tullius Cicero Higgins can ever by any possibility, however gifted by nature and improved by art, reach a degree of poetry, philosophy, science, military heroism, and eloquence to justify his name, and, if but a simple mortal without extraordinary endowment, survive the ridicule of bearing it. Dickens has committed this error in regard to his children, among whom there are a Sydney Smith, a Francis Jeffrey, and an Alfred Tennyson. Dickens, however, thought no doubt that the splendor of his own name was such as to condemn already to comparative obscurity his offspring, and that they thus might not be harmed by any additional contrast of brilliancy reflected from his distinguished contemporaries.

If parents are, for want of family names, in search of others for their children, we would commend them to the familiar and unobjectionable ones of William, John, Francis, Charles, Henry, Mary, Margaret, Louisa, Sarah, Helen, etc. The early English names are getting greatly into vogue; and you may hear in almost every nursery the pretty appellations of Arthur, Edith, Ethel, Edgar, Alfred, and Edwin. These are mellifluous, and come from ancestors common to Americans and English, by both of whom their memory deserves to be perpetuated.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.Of Behavior in Public Places.

MY DEAR ASPASIA,—When it was known that you were coming to Newport there was a great excitement among all the young persons of both sexes. I am of years beyond ruffling of that kind, but I confess that I was interested to see you, and awaited your arrival with pleased expectation. And what could be more natural, since you were heralded not as the most beautiful woman of the year—of which kind, indeed, I see a great many during the twelvemonth—but as a person of the most charming and perfect manners? My friend Mr. Pry is of the opinion that there is a fascination in manners beyond beauty. For he contends that while beauty is a natural endowment which may consort with a foolish mind and a vulgar nature, manners are the revelation of the soul, and nobody who has not a good heart can have fine manners. It is a bewitching theory which I am far from rejecting. Indeed, when I recall Aurelia, and trace her influence upon all who knew her intimately, I am disposed to take sides with Mr. Pry. Certainly intellectual refinement and a delicate mental apprehension usually accompany truly fine manners.

The evening that you came I repaired to the drawing-room to observe your entrance. You were very tastefully dressed; with the fashion rather than in it. For I have remarked that it is with fashion as with dancing. To take the steps carefully is ridiculous, but to move as if with the steps and in proper time is the height of easy motion. So to follow the fashion scrupulously in every fold and form is sure to give the impression of a strict worship of the fashion-plates, or of being a dress-maker's advertisement. But to dress generally and not rigorously in conformity with the mode is to be well-dressed. The test of true taste is the knowledge where and how to avoid the letter of the fashion while the spirit is retained. And in this sense I was pleased to remark that you were a person of true taste, and not a dandy, for the word seems to me no less applicable to your sex than to ours. I was not very near to you, so that I could not engage you in conversation, but I was near enough to hear your little remarks as the compliments of welcome were paid to you. I was particularly glad to see your demeanor toward the spoiled youth who figure most conspicuously in the dancing-room, and whose manner toward ladies is insolently familiar. This offensive familiarity the young gentlemen strangely mistake for ease. But the lady who suffers it permits herself to be insulted.

Presently, however, came the trial, and I fear that you failed, or, more justly, that you did not fully succeed. When Mrs. Stilton accosted you before the entire company as an old friend, your reception of her said plainly, "You vulgar woman, know your place!" Now Mrs. Stilton is vulgar, but she is well-meaning, and she has no sinister intention, when she speaks to you or to any one, of "presuming," as the expression is. It is an exuberant tone, a grating manner, which is really harmless, however loud and warm. But it seemed to me that while your manner said what I have described, it also said: "It will never do for me on this first evening to have it appear that this dreadful dowdy is one of my friends." Consequently it seemed to me that your manner was haughty, and a little contemptuous; and when I afterward heard Mrs. Stilton say to Mrs. Shrimp that you were "very high and mighty," and "dreadfully stuck-up all of a sudden," I knew precisely what she meant, and I fell then and subsequently into a meditation upon behavior in public places. That little incident was merely a text, however, and you are not to be considered guilty of any thing more than has been mentioned.

In church, for instance, the Furbelow family always enter just as the service begins, and come pattering and rustling up the aisle, and settle themselves ostentatiously in their pew, while their neighbors are bending their minds to the hymn or the reading or the prayer. The best disposed can not avoid a little distraction. Their eyes are caught by a bonnet or a bow, and their minds are diverted from the solemn theme. Besides, those who seriously wish to attend are annoyed, and fall into a temper of mind which is not favorable to religious reflection. This is not an accident upon the part of the Furbelows, it is a habit, an intention. They come late to church that they may excite observation. It is the lowest form of vulgarity, the cheapest ostentation. You may have observed upon Broadway people who wear queer hats, or very long hair, or some odd costume. They are people who can not attract public regard by any good deed or word, and so gratify an itch for observation by becoming at once ridiculous and notorious. I never see the Furbelows flourishing untimely into church but I think of some of the queer objects in Broadway, who attain the same distinction in the same manner.

At concerts or other secular entertainments, as they are called, we may remark this same conduct. During the winter I was at a concert with a friend who is very fond of music—to whom, indeed, it is a kind of religion; and who is as much shocked by inattention during a symphony of Beethoven as by levity in church while the litany is read. Near us sat the gay young bride Adalgisa, and with her was a mob of gentlemen. The bride was very pretty and very proud of her retinue. She giggled, and whispered, and tapped with her fan, and engaged half a dozen gentlemen at once in conversation. My friend Serena, whose attention was incessantly diverted from the noble music, grew very red, and I saw an expression of indignation gathering upon her face. But she is much too wise a woman ever to speak when her face is red, so she sat quietly and listened as well as she could, while the chattering bride became noisier than ever. At length Serena was wholly calm again, and when the movement was ended, and there was a pause, she turned to Adalgisa and said: "My dear, you ought not to be allowed to go to concerts until you know how to behave. Remember that sensible people come to hear music, and those who wish to laugh and talk should stay at home." Adalgisa and her company stared, and then looking at each other, burst into loud laughter. But they could make no other reply; and I suspect they saw in the faces of those of the audience who heard what Serena had said, decided sympathy and approval of her words. I know that the bride did not giggle again, and that we had silence during the rest of the concert.

In the cars, also, I have often observed, and I have not omitted to record, various instances of unhandsome behavior. The most obnoxious is the occupation of seats by shawls and bags and bundles, and the air of injury with which they are removed upon request. Sylvius and Chloe come into the car and turn over the seat in front of them, upon which Chloe throws her traveling-bag and Sylvius disposes his boots. Have you observed the guilty air with which they regard the gentleman and lady who are passing through the car looking in vain for a seat? The very tone in which Chloe remarks, "There's plenty of room in the next car," convicts her. She ventures upon an untruth to relieve her uneasiness. What does she know of the seats in the next car? The blushing hussy! Why does she not yield to her consciousness of blame? Yes, Chloe, take up that bag; say courteously, "Here is a place," and content yourself with the seat for which you have paid, and with the space that satisfies every body else. It is not Chloe only, however, who is to blame. There are other offenses against good manners in cars than those of occupying seats that do not fairly belong to us. When Vinegra opens the door and glances over the passengers as if they were in conspiracy against her happiness, and then rapidly advancing, says loudly to her companion, "These seats seem to be all taken up by one person in each," she puts them all in conspiracy against her. The most courteous gentleman in the car, who instantly rises to offer the seat which he alone occupies, feels that he is offering it to a termagant. But he is loyal to the sex, and does not suffer himself to murmur. Chloe and Vinegra must, I think, have graduated at the same school of deportment.

There is also a habit, which is very much cherished, of staring at the strangers whom you meet at a friend's house; while it is a still higher stroke of fine behavior to annihilate them by your manner. Adalgisa, for instance, and Chloe meet in the drawing-room of Vinegra, and await her descent to receive their calls. Not knowing each other, which is to say not having been introduced, they obliterate each other. Adalgisa looks at a photograph album; Chloe gazes out of the window. Yet each, careful not to catch the other's eye, furtively studies the other's dress, and can report exactly what novelty it disclosed. They do not exist to each other until Vinegra enters. She breathes a word of introduction, and each begins to be to the other, but very vaguely and remotely. Each is upon guard, and behaves as if the other were probably a washer-woman in disguise. In some countries it might be assumed that we could not meet in a friend's drawing-room any one who was not worthy to be our friend, or at least acquaintance. And as for the washer-woman, all is not gold that glitters, every body is not a lady whom you meet in a drawing-room.

There is a reverend and pleasant habit in the country of gravely bowing to every body whom you pass upon the road. The patriarch and his wife, who jog by in a wagon, salute, without curiosity or impertinence, the utter stranger. Among the lonely hills those who pass, although they never met before, nor shall ever meet again, recognize each other's humanity, and do not pass a fellow-man as they pass a cow in the field. So in foreign cities, when a funeral goes by every body upon the sidewalk stops and raises his hat in mute salutation. It is a very simple act, but it is very humanizing. It is a gentle and becoming tribute of respect. For coldness and hardness are not noble qualities, nor is the appearance of them beautiful. Superciliousness of manner is not loftiness, nor an affected superiority dignity. But our manners in public places seem to show that we think otherwise.

Read this on a rainy day, dear Aspasia, and write me privately if I am wrong.

Your ancient friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SILKS.

THERE is an advance of ten per cent. on all silks imported for the fall and winter. The supply will be very small. Importers say it has been difficult for American merchants to get their orders filled at the Lyons factories, owing to an unusually large demand for silk goods in Europe.

The glossy taffeta silk, a plain surface without cords, will be again worn. This is less expensive than gros grain and poult de soie. Changeable silks are promiscuously called glacé, shot silks, or chameleons. For the sake of perspicuity we will call them changeable silks. All the hues of the rainbow are reflected in the ever-changing surface of these beautiful goods. Instead of the plain black silk so generally worn, for street dresses we have this season a variety of dark shades blended with black, such as invisible green, blue, or purple. Bismarck is only seen in unison with blue or green; garnet and green combine, and a strange blending of colors forms the antique "frog" shades of last winter. There are heavy gros grains, seven-eighths of a yard wide, marked $8 a yard. Light silks for evening at $2 50 a yard are the "sunset" purple and gold; moonlight-gray, over which the colors flit like shadows on the water; and the beautiful opal, reflecting pink, white, and blue, like the gem after which it is named.

Striped silks are conspicuous among the importations. These are to be used as the foundation skirts of the elaborate costumes to be worn this winter. A changeable stripe alternates with one of solid color. Striped satins of gorgeous colors are shown for petticoats. Good taste suggests a black over-dress for these gay skirts. A bias border, twelve inches wide, of striped satin sewn on a black silk skirt makes a rich dress. The satin bought for this purpose is the linen back, worth $3 a yard.

SERGE.

The silk-faced serge that proved so perishable during the summer is not seen this season. A plain all-wool serge takes its place, and promises to be the standard woolen material. It is shown in solid colors of every shade, in changeable hues, and newer still in stripes. The buyer of the largest dry-goods house in the country said, "I was told at home not to buy stripes, but when I got to Paris there was nothing else to buy."

The gay plaids always seen in profusion in the early winter months are in smaller blocks, often merely checks, and of fewer colors. The Rob-Roy plaids, crimson and black blocks, and light blue and white, or scarlet in irregular checks, are suitable for children.

FRENCH CHINTZ.

French chintzes are in the usual small figures of bright colors on dark grounds at fifty cents a yard. Gay cashmere patterns in broad stripes are shown at seventy-five cents.

COSTUMES.

The first invoice of costumes indicates but little change from those lately worn. The wide Marie Antoinette flounce still remains. Sleeves are the straight coat shape, with very little trimming, and over-skirts are puffed and looped in a variety of ways. The regular panier over-skirt, a large puff behind made by a draw-string extending from the side seams across the back, is not so popular as the reversed tunic, long in front and tied loosely at the waist behind, or the Camargo skirt, which is looped at the back and sides by a bow or rosette. It is all-important that the skirt be flat in front, only slightly full at the sides, and very full at the back.

Striped costumes will be worn in all materials, woolen, silk, satin, and velvet. The petticoat is in wider stripes than the over-dress. The upper skirt and mantle are of the same material, in narrow stripes, or a changeable goods in which the colors of the petticoat are blended.

A Camargo costume of Parisian make has a serge petticoat of Humboldt purple striped with black. Plainly gored skirt, with bias flounce twelve inches wide sewed on in gathers. The corsage also striped is a mere chemise Russe, or blouse with drawstring instead of belt. Coat-sleeves trimmed with a fold of the same at top and bottom. Over-skirt of solid purple serge, laid in six deep pleats at every seam. Bias folds of striped serge on the seams. The back is long and caught up to the belt, forming a kind of scroll on the tournure. Black fringe surrounds the skirt, headed by a fold of bias stripes. Scarf mantilla of solid purple. The ends are round in front and crossed under the belt. No seam on the shoulder. A bias seam behind gives the proper shape. Two rosettes loop the back seam.

The trimming is like that on the upper skirt. Price $80.

A costume of cachou poplin has a plain gored skirt. Graduated folds of the same piped with satin are on the front width. The polonaise, though almost tight, is worn with a belt. It is cut rounding in front to display the trimming of the skirt. The back also rounded is open and caught up in pleats, beneath a broad box-pleated sash, pendent from a bow on the belt. Folds and fringe are the trimming. Bretelles form a berth at the back. Coat-sleeves with pointed cuff simply piped, and ornamented with three long buttons.

A fall costume for a Miss of fifteen is of gray winsey dashed with blue. The gored skirt is bordered with an eight-inch band of striped serge, blue and black. Short loose paletot trimmed with a blue and black fold. No waist. This is a French suit, valued at $25.

MANTLES.

Fall wrappings are mantles of various scarf shapes, round at the back and looped with rosettes. The ends are square, or if crossed under a belt, long and pointed. One of black faille at $35 is simply trimmed with a two-inch ruffle of the same, notched at the edge, and set on in small double pleats. Another of white French cloth is similarly shaped, with a narrow pointed hood at the back. Small scallops of the material piped with green satin is the trimming. The ends cross in front.

CLOAKS.

The polonaise with a round cape, a Watteau fold, or pelerine ends, is the standard shape for cloth and velvet cloaks. The narrow coat-sleeve still prevails. We have seen but one velvet cloak with wide, loose sleeves. The material is necessarily so thick that the garment must be cut almost tight-fitting to prevent a dumpy appearance at the waist. If the body of the garment is full it should be separate from the skirt, and pleated into a belt. Skirts are long, and puffed out as in costumes. The cloak of the season has evidently been designed by the modistes to form a complete costume, with merely the addition of a striped petticoat.

TRIMMINGS.

The trimming most used is fringe with rich headings, so elaborately made that the expense is equal to that of valuable lace. One piece on a velvet cloak has a netted heading four inches wide. The price in Paris was $12 a yard. Plain tassel fringes are very handsome, especially those of camel's-hair. Loops of ribbon, squares of velvet, feathers, quill shavings, chenille, and buttons, are in the headings.

A great deal of guipure lace will be worn on velvet with a passementerie heading of leaves and vines formed of tiny buttons. Passementerie rosettes, with long pendent tassels, are newer than sashes. Buttons are very large, sometimes three inches in diameter. Bows of faille, bunches, knots, and shells of ribbon are seen among the trimming and folds in great profusion. Cross-cut bands of velvet are edged with narrow satin. Faille and satin folds are placed alternately, or velvet and faille. Jet, which still remains on bonnets, has disappeared entirely from cloaks and dresses.

MODEL CLOAKS.

The fall cloaks are of purple, dark brown, and black cloth. A brown cloth polonaise is almost tight-fitting, but is worn with a belt. A large cape conceals the waist and arms. It is looped in the back with a rosette of passementerie, and bordered with fringe. A purple cloth of similar shape is trimmed with a two-inch band of velvet cut bias from the piece. Three narrow satin bands are stitched on above this. A fluted frill of satin edges the garment. Belt with long sash. Price $80.

A black velvet polonaise, intended for a slender figure, has a full pleated waist like a Garibaldi. The skirt is open at the sides, and connected with bands of lace. The trimming is pointed guipure, headed with passementerie of buttons, forming roses and leaves. Open sleeves, but not wide. Rosette and long tassels behind. A graceful garment of velvet fits the figure. The back is long and square, as if a lappet were added. Bands of faille piped with satin, headed with elaborate passementerie, border the skirt. A fall of wide guipure lace finishes the back. The open sides are ornamented with netted fringe. A round cape falls to the waist, trimmed with passementerie and fringe. Coat-sleeves, with deep lace cuffs. Large sash ornament and tassels. Price $250.

The costume cloaks are very long, reaching nearly to the edge of a short dress. A plain one for an elderly lady is marked $350. The velvet is the finest quality, the fringe $12 a yard. It is a Louis XV. polonaise, with large cape, looped in the back by an immense bow of faille, with ends. Another at $300, to be worn over a striped satin skirt, is of Lyons velvet. The waist is tight-fitting, like the corsage of a dress. The skirt is long and full, forming four large puffs, very bouffante. Bands of faille are laid on the seams between the puffs, with bow and ends halfway down the skirt. Guipure lace around the edge. A false cape, like a berth with pelerine ends, may be taken off at pleasure. Coat-sleeves, with guipure cuff.

Most elegant of all is a long Polish casaque, trimmed with knots and bows of faille. The belt is set in, as so much velvet belted in enlarges the waist. A berth square in front falls into pelerine lappets behind, with a bow of faille and velvet edged with fringe. The back of the skirt is open, with an inserted sash that widens gradually, and is finished at the pointed ends with wide guipure. The outline of the sash is marked on the skirt by knots of faille, strapped with velvet. The front of the garment has bows of faille from the throat to the hem. Coat-sleeves trimmed with guipure lace. Price $300.

BONNETS AND HATS.

There are no new developments in bonnets since our last issue. Strings of Syrian net, beaded with crystal, are placed over satin, in square set shapes. The advantage claimed is that they do not become limp and stringy as plain lace falls are apt to do. Garnet is prettily used in conjunction with gray and brown. A royal velvet, a French gray shade, is trimmed with leaves of shaded garnet. A handsome bonnet for an elderly lady is made of alternate folds of brown and garnet uncut velvet. Double rolling diadem with a Brazilian oriole head in the centre. Garnet ostrich plume at the side. Price $35.

In round hats we have the Deauville in black and white felt, and a startling novelty that we think rather prononcé—garnet and green felt. The Ophelia, with crown and rim in one, like an inverted basin, fits the head closely. A new variety of the Sultan cap has the upper crown of bright green or blue velvet, with a band of black Astrachan. A coquettish cap of black velvet, called the Robert, has a soft crown of two careless puffs. Quilted silk linings are among the desirable things in French hats. The yelva is similar to the Deauville but smaller, and round at the centre. This hat is the favorite with the leading milliners. A yelva of black velvet has a gold and green feather aigrette high in the front, with satin rosette on the forehead. Satin bow with lace ends behind.

The jauntiest hat shown us, and one which we predict will be in favor with skaters, is the Polonaise—a cap with stiff sloping sides, and sunken tip or crown. It is brought out in black Astrachan trimmed with jet aigrettes and chains. This Polish cap should be worn far back on the head, tipped slightly to the right; but it is the custom nowadays to carry every thing into extremes, following one fashion blindly without regard to the character of each garment. So we anticipate that the Polonaise will find its way down over foreheads and eyebrows, and the real design of the hat be thus lost.

The Figaro resembles a gentleman's smoking-cap. It is a turban of Astrachan with a network crown of chenille falling into a pouch at the side with tasseled ends. Colored silk may be placed beneath the open netting of chenille.

PERSONAL.

EVIDENTLY MR. MARK TWAIN is a personal favorite with his friends, some of whom recently presented him with a silver brick worth fifty dollars, with an inscription referring to Matthew v. 4: "And whoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him, Twain."

—DRS. ELIZABETH and EMILY BLACKWELL are about to found a Woman's Medical College of the New York Infirmary, designed to take a higher rank than any similar institution in the United States. A three years' course of study is required of the graduates, who will be thoroughly instructed in medicine and hygiene, the latter being made a very prominent feature under the special charge of Dr. ELIZABETH BLACKWELL. The professors and examiners rank among the leading physicians of New York, and the students are promised free access to all the City hospitals and dispensaries. The Drs. BLACKWELL desire to enlist the most intelligent young ladies of the country as students, and are ready to offer every facility to those whose limited means prove a barrier. The establishment of a first-class medical college for women has been the object of their life-long ambition, and we are glad to know that it will become a promising reality on the first of next November.

—MRS. DE CAUX's husband, the Marquis, has been dismissed from his place in NAPOLEON's household. His successor is Count D'AULAN, a man of high lineage, and personally a favorite of the Emperor. Besides, he has a pretty wife, and the Emperor and Empress like to be surrounded by pretty women. PATTI, by-the-way, has by her marriage become cousin to M. DE FALLLOUX, the famous ultramontane champion, and to Monsgr. DE FALLLOUX, the rector of the Apostolic Chancery, and who is named as one of the future cardinals soon to be created.

—The last "personal" relative to that much-wedded person, BRIGHAM YOUNG, is copied from a late number of the principal journal of his capital: "Married, in Salt Lake City, 16th inst., in the presence of the Saints, BRIGHAM YOUNG to Mrs. J. R. MARTIN, Miss EMILY P. MARTIN, Miss L. M. PENDERGAST, Mrs. R. M. JENICKSON, and Miss SUSIE P. CLEVELAND, all of the county of Berks, England. No cards."

—A citizen of Nevada having determined to enjoy a little of the pleasures of the fashionable world at Virginia City, went to the theatre where Mrs. D. P. BOWERS was performing Lucretia Borgia. He watched the lady with deepest interest. At the end of the act he gazed at the green curtain, and asked of a neighbor: "Does Mrs. BOWERS enjoy good health?" "I believe so; why?" "Well, I don't know, but it somehow struck me that a woman who is obliged to have so many darned bad spells, and has 'em so natural, couldn't be exactly right, you know, between whiles!"

—ABD EL KADER was recently visited by the Rev. Dr. BELLows. A few years ago he was released on parole by LOUIS NAPOLEON, with a pension of £4000, and established himself in Damascus. In the massacre of the Christians at Damascus in 1860, his conduct was so noble that France, in honor of his humanity, increased the pension to £6000. He lives in a fine house, and is represented, by a competent authority in Damascus, as a man versed in all Arabian sciences and studies, a man of marked intelligence and great personal worth. He is, moreover, very pious, after the Moslem fashion, and the Vice-Consul said, spends the month of Ramadan in the great mosque engaged exclusively in his devotions, going home neither day nor night—an extraordinary act of reverence for his religion. He is reported to be of the blood of the Prophet, and his mild, regular face is far more that of a scholar or saint than of a warlike prince, or even astute politician. He does not meddle with politics, it is said.

—Gallantry hath ever been a marked characteristic of the Massachusetts youth. At Newport, recently, some visitors to the Massachusetts school-ship were examining the boys. To the question, "For what is Philadelphia famous?" several of the naughty nautical boys eagerly responded: "For being the birth-place of ANNA DICKINSON!" which oratress had been on board the ship and was a great favorite with the young salts.

—LOUIS NAPOLEON is having an edition of all the literary remains of his uncle, the great NAPOLEON, printed at the imperial office. Every thing is chronologically arranged. In the collection will be twenty-three quarto volumes, devoted entirely to the letters written by Bonaparte, 20,000 in number.

—The Rev. Dr. PUSEY, now and for thirty years past one of the most prominent theologians of the Church of England, lives a quiet, retired life in apartments in one of the corners of the great quadrangle at Oxford, and is looked upon with awe by the students. He is seldom seen outside his rooms, but, nevertheless, keeps up a constant communication with the outer world by means of the stream of visitors who call upon him, and are ushered into the great man's presence by a cadaverous individual, who looks as if he never enjoyed a good meal, and whose whisper through the crack of the half-opened door is the first sniff the visitor gets of the mysterious doctrines supposed to prevail within. Dr. PUSEY's corner is a sort of "Ghost's Walk" at Christ Church College, Oxford.

—BRILLAT SAVARIN was a personage whose thoughtfulness for the comfort of ladies entitles him to respectful remembrance of readers of the Bazar. In a letter to his cook he wrote: "Remember, my dear Professor, remember I am to have ladies to dinner to-day. You have not forgotten, I hope, my former instructions to you on the subject of dishes for ladies. . . . Always have a variety of little side dishes, chops, small birds, wings of fowls, things with bones in them; things they can take in their fingers. In short, pickings; for I observe that ladies apply themselves with delight to things they can pick. And I observe, too, that they never look so charming as when extracting the delicate juices of bones which yield themselves only to the caressing of lips; except, perhaps, when they are wiping their lips and fingers on their napkins, which they will do frequently and daintily."

—The last volume of GUIZOT's Memoirs is rich in reminiscences of distinguished personages of France. The following of LOUIS PHILIPPE is good: Queen VICTORIA told GUIZOT, one day, that she knew of no old man whom she liked better than the Orleans King. "You see, Monsieur GUIZOT," she said to the Minister, "your royal master is so unaffected, so polite, and yet so simple-hearted." And then she told him that when she visited the Court of LOUIS PHILIPPE the King promenaded one day with her along the magnificent peach-trellises in the palace garden of Versailles. These trellises were covered with peaches so large and fine that the Queen burst into an exclamation of delight, and said to the King she would like to eat one. The old King climbed up the trellis, plucked the finest peach he could find, and presented it to her Britannic Majesty. The Queen took it, but seemed not to know how to get it peeled. The King, however, immediately drew a knife from his pocket and presented it to VICTORIA, saying, laughingly, "A man like me, your Majesty, who often had to live on forty sous a day, carries all such little practical instruments about him."

—MR. JENNINGS, of the London Times, in one of his letters to the daily Times of this city, writes that Mr. THURLOW WEED is still in London, and, to the great delight of his friends, is making manifest progress toward recovery. He is almost as well known in London as in New York, and there are many here who heard of his illness with great personal regret. Later letters, we are glad to say, confirm the intelligence of Mr. WEED's convalescence.

—MR. JEFFERSON DAVIS, who has recently arrived in Liverpool, has received, it is reported, an offer of a very liberal character, to become a partner in a great English commercial house, whose business operations are not only large with this country, but extend to the principal business marts of the world. He holds the proposition under consideration.

—POPE PIUS NINTH's most intimate personal friend is said to be Cardinal HOHENLOHE. Curiously enough all the sisters and other relatives of that Cardinal are Protestants.

—MR. SOL SMITH, the veteran actor and manager of many theatres in the West and South, closes up his public career by an Autobiography, now in press by HARPER & BROTHERS. It is full of humorous incident and anecdote, admirably told, and can not fail to meet with an immense demand.

—ELLIOTT, the great portrait-painter of America, has had ample justice done to his genius as an artist and his merit as a man by the best pens of the metropolis. His remains were brought to this city on the 27th inst.; and on the 28th, from 9 A.M. until 2 P.M., were laid in the main room of the National Academy of Design, where they were looked upon for the last time by gentlemen and ladies most distinguished for position and attainments in the learned professions, in art, in literature, and in commerce. It was a silent but eloquent testimony to his great talent as an artist, and to his large and kindly heart.

—MISS MENKEN, as she was called, who recently died abroad, had prepared a volume of poems for publication, with the following letter, handsomely printed in fac-simile, as a preface:

"GADSHILL PLACE, HIGHAM-BY-ROCHESTER, KENT.
Monday, October 21, 1867.

"DEAR MISS MENKEN.—I shall have great pleasure in accepting your dedication. I thank you for your portrait as a highly remarkable specimen of photography. I also thank you for the verses enclosed in your note. Many such inclosures come to me, but few so pathetically written, and fewer still so modestly sent. Faithfully yours, CHARLES DICKENS."

The poems are said to be very much of the WHITMAN sort. She was an impressionable woman, as plastic as wax, on whom the last influence had the strongest effect. The animalism of the prize-fighter affected her one moment, the philosophy of the poet at another. She leaves several widowers to divide the grief between them.

Cravat Ends with Medallions in Tatting and Lace Stitch.

The cravat ends, shown of the full size by Figs. 1-3, are of Swiss muslin trimmed with tatted medallions.

We remark in the beginning that the work must always be turned when a downward ring follows an upward one, and vice versa. Begin the medallion for the cravat, Fig. 1, with the two rows of rings worked in one round which lie next the central lace stitch part. Work with one thread, fine yarn, as follows: * First a ring of the inner row composed of 6 ds. (double stitches), 1 p. (picot), an eighth of an inch long, 6 ds. Turn this ring downward, and work after an eighth of an inch space a ring of the second row composed of five times alternating 2 ds., 1 p., and then 2 ds. Turn the work anew, and, after an eighth of an inch space, work again a ring like the first, but instead of forming the picot, fasten to the picot of the similar ring. Again turning the work, make another ring of the second round as before, in which fasten to the last picot of the previous ring instead of working the first picot. From * repeat nine times. At the end of the rows join in a circle by fastening to the first picot of the first ring of the second row instead of working the last picot of the last ring of this row. At the end of the rings of the second row now work the outer row as follows: Tie together two threads, * work with one thread a ring composed of 6 ds., fasten to the middle picot of a ring of the outer row, then 6 ds., close on this a similar ring, which must be fastened to the middle picot of the next ring of the outer circle. At the end of this ring work over the second thread (foundation thread) 9 ds., fasten to two corresponding picots of two rings at the same time, as shown by the illustration, then again 9 ds. over the foundation thread, and repeat from * nine times; the first of two rings, however, must always be fastened to the next free middle picot. Having completed the last row, fasten the working thread to the foundation thread under the first two rings of the row. Finish the centre of the medallion with lace stitch as shown by the illustration; in working this fasten also the picots of the inner round. Sew the finished medallion to the cravat by means of button-hole stitches, as shown in the pattern, and cut away the material underneath.

In making the medallion of the cravat, Fig. 2, begin with the inner circle with two threads. Fasten together the two threads, * work next, with only one thread, a ring composed of 8 ds., 1 p., 8 ds., then close to this, over a foundation thread, a scallop composed of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds. Repeat from * eleven times. Having completed the last scallop, join the row in a circle by fastening the working thread to the first ring and then cutting it off. For the outer row of the medallion work next, with only one thread, a ring by working 3 ds., fasten to a picot of a scallop of the finished round, and work again 5 ds., * a scallop (over the foundation thread) composed of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., close on this a ring of 5 ds., fasten to the former ring 5 ds., then again a ring as before, which must be fastened to the picot of the next scallop of the former round. Make again a scallop and a ring as before, this last being fastened to the same picot to which the former ring was fastened. From * repeat ten times. Then work another ring, and close on this a ring which must be fastened to the former ring, then again a ring which must be fastened to the same picot to which the former ring was fastened, and finally another scallop. Fasten the working thread to the first ring. The inner part of the medallion consists of fine tulle, which is closely worked in button-hole stitch with fine cord on the outer edge, on which the finished tatted edge is fastened as shown by the illustration. Work the tulle foundation in point d'esprit (see illustration). This is done in the same manner as a netted foundation. (See Harper's Bazar, No. 42, p. 661, Fig. 19.) The finished medallion is button-hole stitched to the end of the cravat.

For making the medallion of the cravat, Fig. 3, two threads are required: fasten these together; * then work, first, with one thread one of the three-leaved figures of the inner circle, which must be fastened to the middle part of the lace stitch. For every leaflet work 3 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., but in working the 2d and 3d of the three leaflets fasten to the last picot of the former leaflet instead of working the first picot. (See illustration.) Having completed the third leaflet fasten the working thread to the middle leaflet where the row is fastened, and work over the foundation thread a scallop composed of 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds., fasten the working thread to the picot on the point of the third leaf, work a scallop as before, and continue repeating from * yet six times, but the three-leaved figures must be fastened to each other by reference to the illustration. At the end of the round fasten the working threads to the first leaflet of the first three-leaved figure and cut them off. For the next round tie together again the two working threads, work next a ring with only one thread, in doing which work 7 ds., fasten to a picot of a scallop of the former round, and work again 7 ds.; * then, over the foundation thread, work a scallop composed of 6 ds., 1 p., 6 ds., then a ring as before, which must be fastened to the same picot of the former round to which the former ring was fastened, then a ring as before, which must be fastened to the picot of the next scallop of the former round. Repeat from * twelve times more, work again a scallop, then a ring, which last must be fastened to the same picot to which the former ring was fastened, then fasten the working threads to the first ring of this round in a firm manner. The figure in the middle of the medallion is worked with fine thread in button-hole stitch and point de reprise as follows: fasten the working thread to the picot of the middle leaflet of a three-leaved figure, run it through the like picots of the remaining three-leaved figures back again to the picot where it was fastened, and then wind the threads between the picots several times in the manner shown by the illustration. In a similar manner run a thread through both double knots beneath the mentioned picot of each middle leaflet, and wind these also. Then work the inner part in point de reprise and button-hole stitch by reference to the illustration. The completed medallion is worked on the end of the cravat with button-hole stitch.

Medallions of Netted Guipure and Lace Stitch on Tulle.

THESE medallions, if worked in fine material, may serve as the centres for the rosettes given for cravat ends, and also as trimming for blouses, collars, etc. The foundation of the medallions, Figs. 1 and 2, is fine netting, worked over a very fine knitting-needle, and then worked in the patterns shown in the illustrations with very fine thread.

The medallions, Figs. 3 and 4, are worked on tulle, the first with double and the latter with single thread.

Catch-All of Java Canvas.

MATERIALS: White Java canvas, muslin, violet zephyr wool, violet woolen braid an inch wide, chalk beads. This catch-all is made of a piece of Java canvas thirty inches square, worked with violet zephyr in the striped pattern, a section of which is shown of the full size in the illustration, Fig. 2. The squares formed by the stripes are repeated at regular distances, and become smaller as they approach the middle. When this is prepared, line it with muslin; then turn over the corners, as shown by Fig. 1, and sew three of them together along their edges, so as to form a bag. The fourth corner forms the cover, and is trimmed on the outer edge with a pleating of violet worsted braid, which is sewed on with single chalk beads in the manner shown by the illustration; a similar pleating covers the seams of the remaining corners. The catch-all is fastened by means of a button and button-hole stitch loop.

Cushion Cover.

See illustration on page 740.

This cover is of black cloth embroidered with colored silk twist. The stems of each twig of the design are worked in bias half-polka stitch with fawn-colored silk twist of different shades. Fig. 2 shows a branch of the design of the full size. For those parts which are worked in satin stitch, and must be raised, use red and blue silk. The fine feather-like parts are worked with green silk of different shades in herring-bone stitch and in a kind of chain stitch, the manner of working which is shown by Fig. 3. The middle of each twig is dark, and is shaded lighter on the sides. The trimming consists of a frill of green ribbon on the outer edge, the seam where it is set on being covered with black lace, and of a ruche of the green ribbon which covers the seam with which the lace was sewed on.

Two Vignettes for Pocket-Handkerchiefs.

THESE vignettes are designed for pocket-handkerchiefs; they may also be used for table-cloths, napkins, etc. They are embroidered with white or red cotton, or black silk, in satin and half-polka stitch and application.

Knitted Negligé Handkerchief.

THIS handkerchief is knitted of fine worsted, and is bordered with a fringe which is knotted in. Figs. 2 and 3 give the designs in coarser wool in order to render them more distinct. Begin the handkerchief, which is square, on one side with a foundation according to the size desired (the original is 250 stitches). The needles selected must not be too fine, as the work must present a light and flexible appearance. Knit, first, two plain rounds, then three rows of the design, Fig. 3.

1st round.—(Design for Fig. 3.) Slip the first stitch, * narrow one crossed, then slip one again, narrow one, throw the thread around twice. From * repeat. 2d round.—In every thread which was thrown around knit one and purl one. The remainder must be purl. In the next round repeat this alternating. Also, after the first slip stitch, knit one, then throw the thread around, and take up two stitches in succession. Having completed three such rows of holes, knit one round plain, then a narrow stripe of the pattern, Fig. 2, which forms the foundation, and is knitted as follows:

1st round.—Slip the 1st stitch, alternately throw the thread around, narrow one (for this slip the first of the next two stitches), knit the following, and draw the slip stitch over the knitted one. 2d round.—This is entirely purl. Having knitted six rounds in this design, nine rows of holes follow; but in knitting this, two stripes, 6 inches wide, the first 4, and the second 20 stitches distant from the outer edge, must be knitted on each side in the design of the foundation. After the nine rows of holes follow again six rounds in the design of the foundation, and on this again eight rows of holes, then the foundation begins, but care must now be taken to knit on both sides of the work the narrow stripes of the foundation, as also the narrow outer and the two broader inner stripes of the border with the requisite number of stitches. When a square has been knitted in the design, Fig. 2, complete the border, as in the beginning, by two wider and one narrow stripe of holes, which must be divided by stripes of the foundation design. Finish the edge with a knotted fringe about four inches in width in the manner shown by the illustration. The kerchief is doubled, and thrown around the neck, making a convenient protection against the chill of early autumn.

SECTION OF CROCHET COVER.—FULL SIZE.

Crochet Cover.

THIS cover is worked in the round. Begin in the centre with a foundation of 8 ch. (chain stitches), join this in a round by means of a sl. (slip stitch), and work on this the 1st round.—16 sc. (single crochet), that is 2 sc. in each foundation stitch. 2d round.—Eight times alternating 7 ch., 1 sc. in the second following stitch of the former round, after which work slip stitches to the middle of the next chain stitch scallop. In order to preserve the regularity of the design, crochet a few slip stitches before the beginning of each round. 3d round.—Eight times alternating 8 ch., 1 sl. in the middle of every chain stitch round of the former round. 4th round.—1 sc. in each stitch of the last round. 5th round.—Alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 2 ch.

passing over one stitch; 3 ch. form the first dc. 6th round.—Like the 4th round. 7th round.—* 7 ch., 1 sc. in the fourth following stitch of the former round. Repeat from . 8th round.—Alternately 5 ch., 1 sc. in the middle stitch of each chain stitch scallop of the former round. 9th round.—Single crochet. 10th round.— 1 dc. in the next stitch of the former round, 2 ch., 1 dc. in the third following stitch, 2 ch., 1 dc. in the third following stitch, 2 ch. passing over one stitch. Repeat from *. 11th round.—Single crochet, widening one stitch at regular distances six times in the round. 12th round.—Like the 7th round. 13th round.—Alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. in the middle stitch of every chain stitch scallop of the former round. 14th round.—Single crochet. 15th round.—Now begins the pattern figure: 3 ch. which serve as 1 dc., 5 dc. in the next five stitches of the former round, * 13 ch. passing over four stitches: 6 dc. in the following six stitches. Repeat from , after which 13 ch. 16th round.— 1 sc. in the 3d of the next dc. of the former round, 5 ch., 1 sc. in the fourth dc.—by which is formed a picot—7 ch., 1 sc. in the fourth of the 13 ch. of the former round, 1 sc. in the tenth of the 13 ch. (the 5 ch. passed over form a picot directed inward), 7 ch. Repeat from *. 17th round.—1 sc. in the fourth of the next 7 ch. of the former round, 2 ch. passing over one stitch, 6 dc. in the next six stitches, 2 ch., 1 sc. in the second following stitch of the former round, 15 ch. Repeat from *. Repeat now the 16th and 17th rounds, widening by two stitches in the chain stitch scallops of every fourth following round of this stripe. The illustration shows the number of pattern figures for the width of the stripe. The last round consists of single crochet.

The leaves and flowers of the wreath which follows this stripe are crocheted singly, mostly in Tunisian crochet stitch, but take the stitches on the upper horizontal veins of the stitches instead of in the perpendicular.

For each of the five-leaved flowers (narcissus) make a foundation of 12 ch., join this in a ring by means of 1 sl. and crochet: 1st round.—* 5 ch., 1 sc. in the second following foundation stitch. From * repeat five times; 2 sl. in the first two chain stitches of this round. 2d round.—1 sc. in the next ch., * 4 ch., 1 sc. in the middle stitch of the next chain stitch scallop of the last round. From * repeat four times, after which 4 ch., 1 sl. in the first sc. of this round. 3d and 4th rounds. All single crochet stitches, but widen by five stitches in both rounds, so that the fourth round counts 35 stitches. This completes the centre of the flower.

Now crochet in the next two sc. of the last round two Tunisian stitches; that is, take a loop out of each stitch and crochet these loops singly on the needle in the manner familiar to our readers. This completes one pattern row (one backward and forward round). On this pattern row work now three pattern rows, of which work the first stitch in the first horizontal vein, and the last stitch in the last perpendicular vein of the former pattern row. The first stitch at the beginning of the following (5th) pattern row must be worked in the first horizontal vein in the stitches of the former pattern row; leave, without working, the last perpendicular vein of this round; work the 1st stitch of the sixth pattern row also in the first horizontal vein of the stitches of the former pattern row; the last perpendicular and the last horizontal vein of this pattern row remain without working. Work the seventh pattern row on the stitches of the former pattern row (passing over the first) and in the four edge stitches of the next four pattern rows before worked (the veins of the stitches lying between every two edge stitches of two rounds remain without working); work the eighth pattern row in the stitches of the former pattern row (passing over the first stitch), on the remaining edge stitches and on the next sc. of the middle part of the flower. Now follows one pattern row, of which work the first stitch in the second stitch of the former pattern row, and the last stitch in the sc. of the middle which was taken up by the last stitch of the former row. In the following pattern row crochet 1 sc. in the second, third, and fourth stitches of the former pattern row, then again Tunisian on the remaining stitches, in doing which do not overlook the last perpendicular vein in the stitches of the former pattern row. Now crochet two pattern rows, bringing the first stitch on the first stitch of the first horizontal vein, and the last stitch on the last perpendicular vein of the former round. Work the following pattern-row on the stitches of the last pattern row (passing over the first), on the edge stitches of the pattern row worked before and on the next sc. of the middle part; leave the last perpendicular vein of the former pattern row without knitting. Having completed this pattern row, crochet four sc. in the second to the fifth stitch of the former pattern row, then Tunisian stitches on the remaining stitches of the pattern row (including the last perpendicular vein of the stitches), and on the sc. of the middle part which was taken up by the last stitch of the former pattern row. Finally work single crochet on the Tunisian stitches of the former pattern row, in doing which pass over the first stitch, three sc. on the next three sc. of the middle part. This finishes a leaf of the narcissus. Work the remaining four leaves in the same manner, fastening them together as shown in the illustration, during the process of the work. Between two leaves crochet always 3 sc. on three stitches of the middle part.

For the roses, make a foundation of eight stitches, join this in a ring, and crochet on that one round single crochet, in doing which widen by five stitches; at the end of this round crochet 1 ch., turn the work, and crochet in ribbed crochet stitch back on the row of stitches, widening five times at regular distances, one stitch each time; at the end of the round work 1 sl. in the first stitch of the same round. Now follow two rounds worked in the same manner. In these, also, widen by five stitches, including the ch. worked before the work was turned; close the rounds in the same manner as the last. The last (4th) of these rounds counts thirty stitches. Now turn the work, and crochet nineteen stitches in the next fifteen stitches of the round; again turn the work, and crochet twenty-one stitches on the nineteen of the former round; turn the work again, and crochet one round in the round, in doing which always crochet a stitch on the edge stitch of the last half round. In this round widen by six stitches; and at the end of the round crochet 1 sl. in the first stitch of the same round. Now turn the work again, crochet eighteen stitches on the next eighteen stitches of the former round, also in ribbed crochet stitch, and continue in Tunisian stitch. In the first pattern row, which joins itself to this point of the rose, take up the stitches out of the back veins of the stitches of the former round. Crochet next one pattern row on the next two sc., then one pattern row, the first stitch of which take out of the first horizontal vein, and the last stitch out of the last perpendicular vein, and at the same time from the next sc. of the middle part of the rose. Now follows a pattern row, the first stitch of which is again taken out of the first horizontal vein, and last stitch out of the last perpendicular vein of the former round. In all the following pattern rows, where no especial mention is made of it, pass over the first horizontal and last perpendicular vein of the stitches. Then follows a pattern row, in which take the first and last stitches out of the first and last horizontal veins of the stitches, and two pattern rows, in which also take the last stitch out of the last horizontal vein of the stitches. Now a pattern row of six stitches in the two parallel stitches of the former pattern row, the edge stitches of the four former pattern rows, and from the next sc. of the middle part. After this work three pattern rows, in which again pass over the first horizontal and the last perpendicular stitches. The next following pattern row is worked on the last pattern row, on the edge stitches of the three previously worked pattern rows, and on the first single crochet of the middle. Now follow four pattern rows over the entire row of stitches; at the end of each of these four pattern rows work the last stitch always in the first single crochet of the middle. After this work three pattern rows, in which pass over again the first horizontal and last perpendicular vein of the stitches, then one pattern row, which is worked in the stitches of the former pattern row, in the edge stitches of the previous pattern rows, and in the first stitch of the middle of the rose; then again three pattern rows passing over the first horizontal and last perpendicular veins of the stitches. Now crochet one pattern row on the stitches of the former pattern row, on the edge stitches of the former pattern row, and on the second following single crochet of the middle. Finally work still other three pattern rows, at the beginning of which crochet one single crochet stitch in the second following horizontal vein of the stitch of the former pattern row, and at the end always one stitch in a single crochet of the middle part, this is taken in the first of the three pattern rows in the second following single crochet; in the second pattern row in the first single crochet, and in the third pattern row in the second following single crochet. Having completed this last row, crochet slip stitches on it and on the next single crochet of the middle. Now turn the work and crochet on the edge stitches of the part worked in Tunisian stitch one row of single crochet, always putting the needle in the back vein of the stitches, at the end of this row one slip stitch in the first single crochet of the middle of the rose. Then turn the work again, and returning in the same manner on the last row, at the end of the row one slip stitch in the next single crochet of the middle part. Now work around the so far completed rose three rounds in ribbed crochet stitch, in doing which work at the end of every round one slip stitch and in the first stitch of the round one chain stitch, after which turn the work. The larger flower-like leaves on the outer edge of the rose are worked, as shown by the pattern, in the same manner as the leaves of the narcissus, in Tunisian crochet stitch; the five smaller consist, as the pattern shows, in short double, double, and short treble crochet stitches. The leaves between the flowers are worked also, as shown by the illustration, in Tunisian crochet stitch, and the edges bordered with little picots. The stems of the leaves and flowers, by means of which the parts of the wreath are joined, consist of a chain stitch foundation of the length shown by the illustration; on this work slip stitches. The wreath is edged on both sides with a row of chain stitch which is joined to the leaves and flowers by means of single crochet, short double, and double crochet. On this round work one round single crochet, after which the chain stitch points by means of which the wreath is fastened with slip stitches to the previously worked centre of the cover.

THE HAZEL-NUT PEARLS.

By Mariet Prescott Spofford.

THERE was to be a Diamond Wedding in Sumach Square. Real diamonds, and not a bit of mistake about it. All the world knew it, had received cards, had ordered dresses. The mantua-makers and milliners to the gentility were nearly beside themselves, and looked with entire envy on the scrubs and hod-carriers, to whom the names of bouillons, and poufs, and gauffres, and jupes, and fichus, were so many cabalistic and diabolic words of mystery; while as for Miss Henrietta Huydekoper's dress-maker, her existence was a mere nightmare, and tulle and lisse became to her a demoniac white wreath overshadowing the whole visible creation.

For Miss Henrietta Huydekoper was destined to be the principal player in the drama of this Diamond Wedding—the star of the company—since as nobody ever dreams of glancing a second time at that poor creature, the bridegroom of any common wedding, who is present merely as an attendant on the filleted and wreathed Chief Victim before the altar, so certainly nobody would give more than one stare of curiosity and another of amazement at the swarthy, shriveled, dark-lipped Spaniard, whose treasures in Trinidad had, it might be suspected, procured this fiancée that half the city grudged him. For Miss Huydekoper's bridegroom was no one else than the Don Gaspar Lazaro Ildefonso de Isla y Pasamonte—noble, of course, as such a name could imply no otherwise, perhaps a little rillet of the Hebrew in his thin veins, showing reason in part for his undoubted wealth, but with just enough blue Castilian blood to make him, as he was, as simple a soul of honor as any old Spanish hidalgo of his ancestors; never believing others cared more for his millions than he did, and not insulting his bride in his own inmost mind with so much as a suspicion that she was wanting in perfect fealty and faith; nor did he ever discover that she was, and would not have married him had he been a beggar at her door. "Had I been a beggar at her door, she would have smiled on me the same that smile of rosy light," he was wont to say in his confessions to his unwilling confidant, his cousin M'Lean. "And I was a beggar at her door! I was a beggar at her door and she made a prince of me! La hermosa, fresca como una mañana de Abril!"

Miss Huydekoper's father had passed away from this scene of action a little more than two years before. According to his last will and testament he had designated his wife and one intimate friend as the executors of his estate, entertaining the disastrous mistake that he had left one; but when their labors were brought to an end they found that speculations, extravagances, bad debts, and worse investments, had left of the original sum a mere pittance. Mr. Huydekoper died, as many men of business do, with the idea that his wife and daughter would always enjoy a large sufficiency of the root of all evil; when all was done, Mrs. Huydekoper discovered that the lease of her house had yet three years to run, and that she was able to realize just enough money to retire into the country, and there in strictest economy drag out the remainder of her days and Henrietta's, or, on the other hand, to remain in the city, making little or no retrenchment, and spending as usual for three years, and trusting to her daughter's making an ambitious marriage before the expiration of that period; for Henrietta was an acknowledged beauty, and could not begin to count her lovers on the combined fingers of both of her little white hands. If they failed—why, there was all her furniture ready for a first-class boarding-house. "But we'll not fail!" thought Mrs. Huydekoper, for, of course, she chose the latter scheme, having duly informed her daughter what was expected of her. And Henrietta acquiesced, perfectly conscious that she would not have to lift her finger in the way of intriguing or manoeuvring, in order to accomplish all that her mother wished. The intimate friend of the late head of the house, who had assisted in the settlement of his affairs, wondered and worried over Mrs. Huydekoper's course, but fancied afterward that he had unlimited reason to compliment her sagacity.

It came near being very unfortunate for the success of Mrs. Huydekoper's plan that, at one of the many tournaments of fashion to which she chaperoned her beautiful daughter, one of the legion in the lists somehow singled himself out from the host of dancing-men and artistically executed a—shall I say a pas seul?—on Henrietta's recollection. He was a handsome fellow, this Gaspar M'Lean, and people said as good, and high-spirited as he was handsome. His mother had been a West Indian heiress, and the union of her dark and lustrous traits of countenance with the Scotch descent of her husband gave their son a beauty that was something dazzling. To her husband, however, there seemed to cling the hereditary taint of misfortune, which it may be he in his own turn transmitted to the next of kin. He had wasted all her fortune, and now they had both gone where it made no matter whether the fortune were wasted or not, and their son was only an insurance-broker, making small commissions, but with talents that promised much more in the future; but people with a tether of three years can not wait for the future. Mrs. Huydekoper, believing her daughter's intentions and her own so thoroughly one, and making no allowance for the possible frailty of youth, never thought of interfering with the young man; he increased Henrietta's train, and that was agreeable and what she wanted—for the rest, she did not even dream of forbidding him the house; and, when he one day introduced there Don Gaspar Lazaro Ildefonso de Isla y Pasamonte, from the Island of Trinidad, a cousin of his deceased mother's, and privately and innocently, and like a fool, informed them that he was traveling through this country solely for his amusement, and had expressed himself so well pleased with it that he fancied he should like to spend all his summers in it; that he was still unmarried; that he was a man of high principle; and that he was worth, pecuniarily, untold gold, a thousand slaves, and endless mountain plantations, then Mrs. Huydekoper could actually have hugged M'Lean.

Henrietta herself was delightfully gracious to the stranger whenever they met, and that was often. She allowed him to lead her in his stately way through more dances than she had ever allotted to any other admirer; she walked with him; she trifled with sherbets which she abominated, while he bent over her and made his flowery speeches. If she recompensed herself therefore by one mad fling in the German afterward with M'Lean her mother never guessed the meaning of it—one brief, mad moment, when the music itself was a passion of love and languor, when his arms were about her, his breath upon her flushing cheek, and they floated, floated—out upon what fathomless sea!

Henrietta knew well enough, too well, indeed, that M'Lean loved her—she knew, too, what power he had upon herself; but she shut the knowledge down in her heart, and held her hand over it, lest the deadly assurance should rise and convict her. In her reflections, without having been accused, she was perpetually exculpating herself. She said she had been born and bred in such luxury, so spoiled for any simplicity, that to descend to small cares and cramping wants would kill her; it would kill her husband, too, she said, if he were a poor man; and it would be an injustice to him for her to consent to marry him, since there could evidently be no happiness in his home, where he looked for the perfection of happiness. She did not know how to economize, she did not know how to work, she could not exist without a French maid to dress her hair, and what would she do without Emeline, her little sewing-girl? She didn't suppose a poor man could afford to keep a butler; then of course she would have to give up her carriage and horses, and she couldn't walk, and she could have no fresh air or fit exercise, and then her health would fail, and she would grow old and faded and ugly, and he would leave off caring about her. And then, too, it would be a treachery to her mother, who had embarked all she had on the venture—oh no, it was better not, far better not; let her teach the young man, the nameless young man, his distance! And if you believe it, and if you don't, Henrietta actually cried. Cried—not very much though; as soon as she found it out, and observed the phenomena of the operation, she fled to rose-water and cosmetics to repair the damage the few drops had done—and M'Lean thought he had never seen her so lovely, so brilliant, so gentle, so altogether and bewilderingly enchanting and overpowering as she was that night. Don Ildefonso de Isla thought so too; and on the next day he laid before her mother a formal offer of his hand and heart for Henrietta.

Mrs. Huydekoper's greedy eyes glittered—she was not the only mother in the city whose greedy eyes would have done the self-same thing. But she told him that Henrietta must choose for herself, and that, except to bid him God-speed and to recommend him to favor, she had no power in the matter. Indeed, she would prefer, she intimated, not even to do so much as that, for her daughter was so faithful and obedient, so in earnest to please her, that she feared lest any word from her might have more influence than even Don Ildefonso would desire. This, after all, was scarcely more than the truth, and it confirmed Don Ildefonso in thinking he had found a priceless jewel, and he could not admire Mrs. Huydekoper too much for her unselfish refusal to grasp such a settlement as he could make upon her child—for be it known that Madame had deemed it only the part of prudence to tell him they were poor, and to add that so soon as the settlement of her lamented husband's affairs, which had been exceedingly delayed, was concluded, they should retire to some distant cottage far from society and the gay world. That this should cause Ildefonso to hasten matters by his indefatigable exertions was not at all surprising. He determined to speak to Henrietta on the first opportunity, opportunity being the one thing which he found it difficult to obtain; and, meanwhile, he exhausted his invention in endeavors to win from her some expression beyond that complaisance which she accorded to all her lovers, which, however, was not so difficult. For Henrietta had something of the coquette in her, and liked to see her power, to play with her line before she drew it in. Having been informed by her mother of all that had passed she felt secure enough, and was determined not to allow Don Ildefonso to speak with her plainly just yet; for if she accepted him too readily he might suspect that there was less love than lucre in the case; neither was she quite sure she should accept him at all, nor yet was she prepared to refuse him. She preferred for the present to leave the question an open one, and at any rate to enjoy her liberty and the sunshine yet a while longer. For if she married this islander, and rolled in his untold gold, it would all the same be a poverty: the glitter of his diamonds would be darkness; his sumptuousness would be a separating and imprisoning wall than which a convent has no thicker, no crueler, no more impenetrable. If she did not acknowledge that to herself it lay like a leaden load somewhere in that inner consciousness at which she had so often laughed when other people asserted its reality. But the very thought of possibly marrying the Don one day made her treat him now with a sudden coldness—coldness better than the best of art, for it only fired his ardor doubly; and then, seeing she had grieved him, her natural kindness rose uppermost, and she smiled on him with a sweetness that was intoxicating, and that only welded his chains like heat. Indeed at this time she was the creature of twenty moods an hour.

One day, at last, the Spaniard burst forth with the whole story; and Henrietta had nothing better to do in return than to burst into tears. If her mother had but beheld her then, the worthy woman would have been willing nearly to annihilate her.

"Ah! I see!" cried the Señor de Isla. "I have alarmed you, I have shocked you, you do not yet love me. But is it impossible that you should? Can I not teach you by my own love? It is true that I am twice your age; yet my heart is so young—it has never felt the sun before; and now love springs up in it like a great flower; for ah, I adore you, sweet eye of my soul!"

And the more he talked the more Henrietta cried; and at last his emotion, his pity, his desire to soothe her, going far beyond the bounds of Spanish propriety—but then he knew he was not among the Spanish proprieties—he took her in his arms to hush her; and that was too much for him, and he covered the beautiful face and hands with his kisses, and that was the end of it.

Henrietta did not go out that night—it was at the beginning of Lent. That was very fortunate, Mrs. Huydekoper said, this opportune happening of the Lenten season; for Henrietta and Don Ildefonso would be able to see so much more of each other than if it were in the height of gayety; and then all the preparations could be going forward during Lent, and the marriage could take place as a continuation of the Easter festivals. Henrietta did not go out that evening, but M'Lean came in—she was alone just then—and as she took his proffered hand, shyly for her, shy in her new position and wretched, for all, in the sudden knowledge that now she must put him away from her and forget that he existed—as she took his proffered hand something on her finger cut that hand sharply—it was the diamond ring, that had blazed there like the ransom of a kingdom since that afternoon. M'Lean gazed at it a solitary second, as he held his wound to the light. "That blood comes from my heart," said he. Henrietta heard him, standing white as the statue behind her, faint and ready to fall. He turned about, came back, bent and robbed her lips of one long, palpitating, breathless kiss, and then was gone. The wicked Henrietta remembered that kiss, and cherished it, and felt its burning warmth again long after memory of it had become a sin.

But now the Spaniard's suit was swift. Never did any one better fulfill the rigors and exactions of the court of love. At first, too, Henrietta was so dull, so really miserable, that she submitted with what he took for tenderness to all his adulation. He liked this quiet, serious side far better even than her gay and sparkling one; it fitted more his ideas of Spanish state. Every day he brought fresh gifts; the house overran with the rarest exotics—not bouquets, but whole shrubs—enamels, carvings, bronzes, cashmeres, laces; and such jewels—Mrs. Huydekoper's eyes blinked and watered at their splendor; other people's mouths watered. Henrietta looked at them listlessly; she had a sensation that she should like them by-and-by, but just now nothing mattered. "She does not care for such baubles," said the Spaniard to her mother; "she is an ardent nature—ah, she loves, she loves! But by-and-by, one day, she will know them at their value."

Poor Henrietta! Though she would not confess it to herself, she knew them at their value now—dust and ashes, dust and ashes!

Henrietta was only fairer and lovelier as the days went on. The excitement kept her rich color at its richest flame, and the wear and tear of her emotion did not serve to make her thin, since the careful Mrs. Huydekoper fed her like a mother-bird herself, perpetually bringing her some delicious dainty, some rare liqueur, and urging her to take it in such a way that it was no better than force; and Henrietta, to please her, invariably complied, and received nearly as much benefit from the treatment as if she had brought the best of appetites to the best of banquets. The rich young blood that bounded up her cheek, the Don Ildefonso asserted, was like the wine in the veins of the roses.

Meanwhile the milliners and mantua-makers, and slaves of the needle and lamp generally, were breaking their hearts and their backs, and wearing their brains threadbare, over Mrs. Huydekoper's orders, wishes, and suggestions; and as Easter approached, the city talked of little else than the wedding. Mrs. Huydekoper could afford all this and much more now; for if out of the gifts of her future son-in-law she ate only one precious stone a day, she had still enough for a feast every day of her life remaining.

Every body sent the bride their Easter gifts. Don Ildefonso brought her a golden egg; when it was opened by its secret spring there lay inside a tiny bird made all of resplendent diamonds, and fluttering its rainbowed wings in the light; that was to fasten her bridal-veil—a thing that flashed and sparkled in its miniature splendor as the swan does sailing down the great, bright stream of the heavens. Some anonymous person also sent her an odd trifle. It was a chain of tiny eggs, rifled from nests in reeds and rushes, in branch and hedge; blue and silvery, brown, pearl-white, speckled, and green; a lovely little amulet, full of suggestions of summer and the wild-wood music of bird-songs and breezes. But Henrietta saw that every egg was hollow, blown from end to end, and strung on a black thread; she remembered that "there are no eggs in last year's nest"—and she knew from whence it came. As she sat and played with it one night, when Don Ildefonso brought his cousin M'Lean as his witness to some legal papers that were being drawn up preparatory to the marriage—the first time, since that night when her engagement-ring had bruised him, that M'Lean had entered the house—she pinched each egg into fragments between her white fingers, and then burned the thread in the flame of the drop-light, and blew it carelessly and absently away as it burned. She was so ill the next day with a blind fury of headache that both Don Ildefonso and Mrs. Huydekoper were—if one may use so vulgar an expression in connection with such elegant people—nearly out of their heads with alarm. As for M'Lean, if he had known it—so differently are lovers constituted—I suppose, instead of alarming him, that it would have made his heart leap with joy, and he would have broken into the house and carried Henrietta off by force of arms—to repent the rash act, most probably, for all the rest of his natural life. However, he never did know it; he cursed her for a vain and heartless girl, who loved money better than love, better than virtue; who was selling herself as much as if she were a woman of the street; who was no longer any ideal of his; and then he agonized over her picture that long ago he had stolen, and confessed that he loved this abandoned wretch to distraction!

One day, about a fortnight before the day that was to make them one, Don Ildefonso came into Henrietta's presence with a parcel in his hands. It was a tarnished old shagreen case, as old as time immemorial apparently.

"I have reserved my most precious gift for my last," said he. "Every bride in the succession of the De Islas for three hundred years has worn this chain. We call it Las avellanas de las perlas, the hazel-nuts of pearls, for they are large and white as the blanched kernels of the nuts on the hazel-hedges. But it was a necklace of the Empresses of the Incas. My ancestor brought it back from America to Spain, and hung it on his daughter's throat upon the day of her espousals; another ancestress than she carried it to Trinidad. With the exception of three pearls that have mysteriously and at intervals disappeared, it is the same now as when it was snatched from the treasure-chests of Peru. It never has been worn by any bride so fair as mine will be, most fortunate of my race, by any bride so best beloved of all the world! It is but a trifle to you, lady of my heart—a dead leaf, a fallen petal, in your hand. Yet wear it for its old tradition's sake." And he laid it in his grand fashion across her palm—so grand a fashion that she would have smiled at it if she had not almost lost the trick of smiling.

It was a row of pearls, ancient, yellow pearls, each pearl, as he had said, the size of a hazelnut's kernel, the color of a low summer moon, iridescent too, almost as an opal, full of phosphorescent and silvery flakes of light—polished, flawless, perfect pearls, each one a little fortune in itself.

Henrietta, indifferent or not, could not help admiring these; in all her life she had seen nothing half so beautiful. "It is only a sample," said Mrs. Huydekoper, when the Don was gone, "of the hidden, unremembered riches that he will be all the time discovering to you, without thinking that he is doing any thing extraordinary. I can see you now as you will look next summer at the Springs—you will be encrusted with diamonds; you will be radiant, yes, radiant; you will shed lustre as you walk. And what spiteful things Mrs. De Laine and her girls will have to say, and never dare to, and the venom stinging their tongues! You are a fortunate girl. And he is so noble, so trustful, so good—one grows easily attached to him. I am fond of him already; and I have reason to be. I could never have hoped for such a son-in-law; he is all sweetness and kindness to me; I am completely suited. Do you know, my love—I may as well confess it now—I once had quite an anxiety lest you were not so sensible and discerning as I hoped, and would let yourself be led away by a fancy for that young M'Lean without a penny to his purse? And it has turned out so well as it is now, for we have scarcely enough left to pay the wedding-bills. But that will be easily arranged," said the beaming Mrs. Huydekoper.

But before this confidential harangue of her mother's, before Don Ildefonso had taken his departure—which, as was intimated, he of course had done ere Mrs. Huydekoper ventured to open her lips in that manner, and before Henrietta, tired of gazing, had sent the pearls up stairs, and while she still was thanking him for them and praising them, she ran her fingers idly, though rather lingeringly, over their round cold softness. "There are thirty-seven of them," said she, without having known that she had counted them.

"Yes," said Don Ildefonso, taking again the beautiful moony things and counting them himself. "There are thirty-seven. Once they were forty; but, as I told you, three have disappeared—stolen, it must have been, by some cunning thief who knew how to penetrate into the coffers of the De Islas better than rust and decay ever knew." And unwilling to weary her with his potentiality of magnificence, to be continually, as it were, setting a price and reward before her, he swung it as if it had been a chain of daisy-balls plucked to-day to fade to-morrow, into the hands of Emeline, the young waiting-woman and sewing-girl, who had been summoned, and who was told to take it and lay it on the table in Miss Huydekoper's dressing-room, where the young woman sat at her work. Don Ildefonso, in the unsuspectingness of his heart, never thought of being happier when Henrietta, after proper thanks, dismissed his gifts from sight and apparently from mind; but Mrs. Huydekoper did not know how to express the satisfaction which she felt in her child, for whether it were native beauty of character or mathematical manoeuvring, in her eyes it was equally admirable.

That night, before Henrietta descended to answer the ring upon which Don Ildefonso had been admitted—that ring which all the house knew by this time, with its sharp, imperious tinkle and sudden stop, as if he were aware that it was too loud and had tried to muffle it—she opened the tarnished, shagreen case to admire the hazel-nut pearls once more. They answered her gaze in the shimmer of their pure beauty; and yet there was a certain curious appearance about them, they looked more like opals than pearls after all—there was a spark of fire apparently twinkling under each separate surface; one who was fanciful would have said that strange sprites residing in their spheres had been caught in the midst of some conspiracy ere they had time to relapse into their white invisibility. But Henrietta was not fanciful; all that she saw was that the pearls seemed just now to wear a different look from that they had when Emeline shut them into the shagreen case. Henrietta looked again more narrowly, and saw that there were three gaps on the golden wire that threaded their coil. In a swift panic she bent and counted them—thirty-four. There were but thirty-four, and there had been thirty-seven! Three of them were gone, and in their place was only the round impression of some lint-like dust that might have dropped from the fingers that had stolen them. All in an instant, with a cold shudder, as if a dead person had arisen and tapped her with an icy touch upon her shoulder, she felt as if those buried brides of the De Islas, the ladies, of whom she was soon to be one, and who, in their line of three hundred years, had separately owned these pearls, had essayed to interfere and prevent their possession by an intruder like herself; or else had they all, those Spanish ladies, been purchased loveless brides, and did they reach forth ghostly fingers and ominously destroy these things to warn her that she might flee their fearful fate in time? That was only a momentary folly; in another instant she had seized the case, calling her mother, and had run down with it to the drawing-room and to Don Ildefonso.

"What shall I do?" she cried, still in her superstitious horror, and half afraid that she was beginning on some insanity, and glancing over her shoulder, in spite of herself, to see if any white women were following her. "What shall I do? What will become of me? Oh!" she exclaimed, resuming her common-sense. "This chain that all your ancestresses have worn—some one has stolen from it—since I sent it up stairs three of the purest, the clearest pearls have disappeared!"

"Ay desdichada!" uttered Don Ildefonso. "There is then a thief in the house!"

"It can be no one but Emeline!" cried Mrs. Huydekoper. "There has been no one else in the dressing-room, and she has not left it since she went up with them!"

"They must be found, if it may be possible!" said Don Ildefonso, angrily. "I will not have my bride despoiled of so much as a pin's head. She is to be a De Isla; she shall wear all that any De Isla ever wore before her; she shall not be stripped of her possessions, and I alive!"

And while the Spaniard ejaculated his indignation, Mrs. Huydekoper speedily had a policeman in, and Emeline was ordered down to receive his arrest and to answer the charges against her as she might.

"Indeed; oh, indeed, ma'am," cried Emeline, clasping her hands, and paler than a trance, "I can not be guilty of any such thing! I have never touched the case since I took it up stairs. I might have stolen before if I had been a thief. Oh, I will not say the word! I am innocent. Why, you know me! Do not rob me of my character—it is worth more to me than all the pearls that ever were—it is all I have in all the world!" She was frantic in her tone and manner, and broken down with sobs. The whole of her life's happiness was at stake; she had a lover who would never believe the disgraceful charge; yet what could a poor mechanic do against the law and evidence of Fortunatus?

"Emeline," said Mrs. Huydekoper, severely. "You took the case with the necklace in it into the room where you were at work. No other individual has entered that room except yourself. Here are the marks of your fingers with the very lint of the linen on which you sewed. It is idle for you to speak. You knew the worth of the pearls; you knew the three would establish you and Mr.—Mr.—the young man—for life. Perhaps you would have been less vicious if I had ever told you that Miss Huydekoper had asked of the Señor De Isla to establish you suitably in a little house of your own on her wedding-day. You ought to know it and to be tormented by your ingratitude; for I am overcome with your faithlessness—after all I have done for you—after all Miss Huydekoper's kindness to you—when I trusted you so! Take her in charge, Mr. Policeman, if you please." And Mrs. Huydekoper's eyes were saved the harrowing sight—for such the poor girl's cries and exclamations rendered it—by the application of her laced handkerchief, which seemed to have a healing power in it, like the mantle of some famous saint, as she presently emerged therefrom dry-eyed and smiling. Mrs. Huydekoper had a horror of thieves—it had never crossed her mind that she was one herself; that she obtained goods on false pretenses; that she was selling now to the Señor De Isla an article with the very thing which he wished in it abstracted from it.

It was useless indeed for Emeline to speak, to shriek, to wring her hands—quite useless for her to appeal to Miss Huydekoper, though in reality that young woman had still some genuine sparks of feeling left, together with a sort of affection for her little sewing-girl; Henrietta had become unable to bear the scene, had cried out against her own culpability in ever receiving these gifts at all; and then had sank and quietly fainted away in the recesses of an arm-chair; and the Spaniard was far too much occupied with her restoration to remember that a pearl or a policeman or a screaming sewing-girl was in existence.

Thus it happened that, as the proper tribunal chanced to be in session at that season, Emeline was brought that very week to trial, and though Don Ildefonso failed to recover his three pearls, he had the satisfaction, he declared, of inflicting the merited punishment of a severe imprisonment upon their thief. He begged Henrietta not to distress herself, and to free her mind from any solicitude or interest in so treacherous a servant.

"It would have been enough to dismiss her!" cried Henrietta, in a sudden passion then. "It was wicked, it was terrible, it is not to be forgiven, that you ruin her, yes, irretrievably ruin her, for the price of three miserable pearls. I shall never put the others on! I should feel that they ought to throttle me! Oh, I detest them! the sight, the thought of them! I detest them!"

"Ay de mí! Do I offend you?" cried her lover, gazing at her, forgetful at the moment even of his offense, as she stood commanding and blooming in her beauty, and burning in her indignation—loving her none the less for her compassion on the girl, and too much accustomed to the tempestuous outbreaks of Spanish women to think strange of the tempers of this one who could do no wrong. "Do I offend you?" he cried again, in a moment. "Alas, it seemed to me but justice. I would release her, if I could, since you desire it—but the law is inexorable. I will endeavor, I will mitigate, I will provide for her future, I will testify that I have found the pearls—ah, but that is impossible to me—not even for thee! Thou shalt do as thou wilt for her thyself, only smile again and not consume me with anger. To-morrow is our wedding-day. Let no cloud cross our sky. I have been wrong, I see. Que lástima! It is so difficult to remember that our menials can suffer from an accusation on their honor, as we others do. Ah, I pity her, la pobre muchachita! she said she was alone in the world. Doubtless she was tempted. I will do what I can—I will send my cousin M'Lean to soothe her—that will please her, it will occupy him too, for I suspect the poor beggar has some love-affair of his own on hand, he mopes so the day long; I have told him if it were money in the way, I would give his bride a portion worth a prince's, and I will indeed! We will repair together the fortunes of the little sewing-girl, only smile again, reddened thy sweet face with a smile, thou sunrise of my heavens!"

It was only a fleeting fury of Henrietta's. She could not care enough about any thing just then to be indignant long, or pleased: she felt as if she had sat down by the road-side, and the world was sweeping past her like the procession of a pageant—she had no lot or part in it. If Don Ildefonso did not have a care, indeed, she would soon verily have no lot or part in it. Already she could see herself, as her mother had pictured her, sweeping past the gaping crowds at the Springs or on the sea-side, ensphered in splendor, but cold and dead and listless, with her withered heart as if she already were a corpse. She might meet another woman there, as stiff with gems as she—some simple woman who had dared to love a man even though he were fortuneless, and who in return had been dowered by his Spanish cousin with the marriage portion of a princess. When she passed through the room, that night, where her wedding-gown lay in its thick folds, stretched out in state and covered with a sheet like a grave-cloth, she wished to Heaven that she were lying dead beneath it. She took out a little note from some hidden place, and read it, and kissed it, and dropped great blistering tears upon it, and held it to her warm breast, and then suddenly she twisted it and burned it in the gas-jet, and shut out the light, and sprang into bed with the kind darkness to cover her sobs. But after that morning dawned, they say that Henrietta never shed another tear.

The wedding-day broke as if the heavens were in the secret of it, a golden April morning, the sky softly strewn with clouds that soared with all their pearly flakes till lost in the absorbing blue above.

The church was crowded with the guests of Mrs. Huydekoper upon the appointed hour; for there were numbers against whom that lady felt herself to have cause of complaint and enmity, and she knew of no more powerful avenging angel than cards to her daughter's wedding with Don Gaspar Lazaro Ildefonso de Isla y Pasamonte, with his unreckoned wealth, his thousand slaves, his miles on miles of mountain plantations, where every grain of dust was gold, where every falling rain-drop was a diamond, when it was caught. Wisely enough, Mrs. Huydekoper did not attempt the monograms. There were kindly people, friends, there too, for Henrietta's sweet, if spirited, ways and words had always caused her to be warmly cared for; and there was the train of the disappointed lovers, who, since they could not stand in the bridegroom's place themselves, went, perhaps, in order that they might curse Don Ildefonso with all their hearts. The dust of the streets surrounded the coaches and blew after them and before them in such golden clouds as encircled the heathen gods and goddesses when they moved; the bridal train at last swept up the aisle to the clash of heavenly music, a line of light and glory.

The White Lady of Avenel was not whiter than the bride that day, white as the great pearls upon her throat; the stars of the sky seemed in her dark and steady eyes. She was moving like one in a dream; neither ceremony nor sacrament had any meaning to her; her soul entered into nothing of it—in the next life she would no more remember it than an awakened sleeper remembers a somnambulist's freak of the night.

Not so with the stately figure by her side—stately for all his shriveled stature—it was real, vivid life with him; he surveyed his wife with a dazzled glance; he was jealous of all this staring throng that beheld her, yet proud to wear her on his arm before them; he wore also, but in her honor, every star and ribbon that his race had ever received; a blur of diamonds on his coat; he would have omitted one of them that day as soon as have dropped a title, a name, a rent-roll from his list; but this new decoration was something worth them all—he had laid them and his devotion at her feet.

Again the rich resounding music pealed; the beautiful bride turned and paused one instant like a splendid angel ready for flight before them all—then the train swept out, and all the world prepared to follow to Mrs. Huydekoper's drawing-rooms in Sumach Square, wonderful as the rooms were with flowers and sunlight.

As the bride of the De Isla took her place beside her husband under the arch of the long drawing-room and its canopy of woven orange-blossoms, a little incident marred the scene with a sort of ill omen—an incident quickly forgotten in another, and both, for the time, forgotten together as the tide of guests flowed in with their rustling trains and delicate voices. It was just as the mother of the bride and the intimate family friends were saluting her, and young M'Lean, whose cousin had, as it were, compelled his presence, moved forward in his turn to address her. He bent low over her hand for one long breathing-space; but as he raised his head the white face of his had become empurpled, and then a little red stream gushed from between his lips, and the Señora De Isla y Pasamonte caught and kept the wild, cruel look of his eyes, with death in them, before he was borne from the place. The Señor De Isla was looking at his wife at that moment in a rapture, and all at once he cried: "Oh fatal estrella mía! the pearls! the pearls!"

The pearls? There were no pearls. Instead, their golden wire alone encircled the swan's throat of his wife, and there lay upon it and fell away from it in asbestos-like flakes and lints ash down the sheen of her satin and cloud of her lace (if any one had counted them) thirty-four pinches of gray dust. The pearls had perished. They had perished as ancient pearls, long hidden away, will do at last beneath the quick corrosion on their fibres of the unwonted heat and light and air. And Henrietta, longing, longing to escape, where in the rooms above she might take the last breath of dying lips, the last look of dying eyes, looked vacantly into the opposing mirrors. And seeing there a ghost, she saw, too, Don Ildefonso lightly flitting away those perished pearls with her handkerchief. And she knew that she had sold herself, and that her price was dust and ashes!

RAILROAD SALOON—TWENTY MINUTES FOR REFRESHMENTS.

IMPROMPTU FURNITURE.

WE propose to give a few simple directions for furnishing a country residence, or, if need be, a spare chamber, so as to look neat and pretty, at a small expense when compared with the high cost of cabinet furniture. With a few rough but strong packing-boxes, half a dozen barrels, some boards, tacks, etc., and a good supply of bright furniture chintz, a wonderful amount of useful and really pretty articles may be produced.

To begin with a sofa or divan for the parlor: Take a long packing-box of the desired dimensions—say about six feet long, and at least three feet wide; height, about a foot and a half. If one box of this size is not to be had, two shorter ones can be fastened together. If casters are to be had, let them be put on the corners, so as to have it roll easily when required to be moved. Now tack on coarse muslin or bagging over the top, letting it be loose, so as to allow for stuffing. Or, as will be easier, perhaps, to most persons, spread evenly over the top of the box a good layer of straw; then over that a thick covering of cotton, or any other material suitable for the purpose, and over all the muslin or bagging, tacking it down tightly on all sides. Care must be taken that there are no hills and hollows, but that it is stuffed evenly all over. Next cover it with chintz, tacking it down smoothly and firmly in the same way on to the sides and ends.

When that is done the sides may be covered either with a founce of the chintz, or it may be put on plainly, using gimp tacks to nail it along the top, and having the bottom either hemmed or bound with binding.

Square pillows, stuffed with bran or straw, and covered with the same chintz, will form the back. For a sofa six feet long three or four pillows will be required.

Sometimes it is desirable to use the box for holding bed-clothes or linen, especially if the lounge is to be used as a bed, as the sheets, pillow-cases, etc., which are spread upon it during the night, can thus be put out of sight in the daytime. This is easily done by putting hinges to the lid. It will be best to nail a strip about ten inches wide along the side (a part of the lid itself may be sawed off for the purpose), and let the hinges be put on the edge of it, fitting the lid thereto. This will enable you to raise the lid at any time without the necessity of removing the pillows first. When covering it care must be used to let the chintz and muslin both fold over on to the under side, so as to allow it to be raised. The inside of the box may be covered with newspapers pasted on smoothly.

Persons having old suites of damask curtains, or who may choose to go to the expense of buying more elegant materials and trimmings, can have much handsomer looking furniture; but for a summer home or temporary arrangement the chintz will be very suitable.

With the barrels are to be made the most comfortable chairs imaginable. The aid of a carpenter's saw will be required to cut them into proper shape, and with a pencil first mark the outline on the barrel; then secure the hoops, nailing them near the mark on each side before they are cut. The engraving will show the shape required, but the back can be varied according to the taste of the workman. (See Fig. 1.)

Castors can now be put on the bottom, or turned balls for feet, although it will answer very well without either. Next form the seat by fastening webbing tightly across the seat, two or three strips each way, and then tack on coarse bagging or muslin all around the top and sides of the barrel, and also around the edges of the seat. The barrels used may be of various sizes, the smaller ones being cut with very low arms, for reception-chairs, while the larger ones will form luxurious arm-chairs.

For a toilette-table (Fig. 2) use a barrel with a few heavy stones in the bottom to make it stand steadily; then place upon the top a board wide enough to extend slightly over the edge, and rather longer than wide; all that is needed to complete it is to put a founce of the chintz around the board, letting it extend to the floor, finishing the top with a scalloped border of the same, or with anything else convenient and appropriate. (See Fig. 3.) A white fringed cover for the top will look pretty and be very suitable and serviceable, as it can be washed when soiled. If something rather more elegant and grand is desired it can be had by adding drapery to the above. A narrow strip of board, about four feet long and six inches wide, should be nailed to the back of the top, so that it will stand perpendicularly against the wall. On the top of this nail a semicircular piece of wood; a hook may now be driven into the upright piece for a looking-glass, and it will look better if the latter is large enough to conceal the back entirely and extend down to the table. (See Fig. 4.)

Now take two breadths of white wash blonde or nice mosquito netting, and cut them long enough to extend from this semicircular top to the floor; gather it along one end of each breadth, and hem the other; then draw it up so as to reach exactly around the top, and tack it on, letting the opening come precisely in the middle. A little strip of gilt cornice, or one formed of leather-work, will make a pretty finish; and when this light drapery is looped up on each side a very ornamental table will be the result.

A wash-stand may be made of another box without a lid, set up on its end against the wall, having the opening outward. Choose one of about the height and dimensions of an ordinary wash-stand, and it will add to the convenience of the article if a shelf be placed across the inside. Then cover it with a founce of the chintz, letting it be open down the middle, so as to be able to set a pitcher or slop-jar inside. Next take a planed board large enough to extend about three inches beyond the sides of the box; have a smooth strip six or eight inches wide nailed on for a back, and either paint the whole white or marble it. With this laid on for a top the wash-stand will be complete. (See Fig. 5.)

A work-table will be a useful article in the sitting-room, and this may be made very conveniently. Procure a nice cheese-box from a grocery store, with a lid belonging to a larger sized one, that will extend one or two inches beyond the box all around; get a piece of board either round or eight-sided, several inches smaller than the box itself, and connect them together by a stout stick, so that it will be perfectly firm, making the whole of the proper height for a table. (See Fig. 6.) Place casters or turned balls on the bottom circular piece. Now line the box and lid by pasting on smoothly either paper or chintz. Then cover the outside with chintz, having the edges scalloped or pointed, and extending below the lower edge of the box. The top, or lid, can be covered in the same way with a pointed strip, to match the lower edge, put on so as to fall around the sides.

FIGURE 6.

Next tack a piece of chintz to the board at the bottom of the table, and then plait up the other end, and tack it around the top of the centre stem, close up under the box. A piece of bordering of some kind put around the bottom will finish it off neatly, and the scalloped edge of the box will conceal the fastening at the top. (See Fig. 7.)

FIGURE 7.

Another variety of these is the hour-glass table, formed by joining together two round boards with a stout stick between, as seen in the cut. (See Fig. 8.) Then cover the top with chintz, and tack another piece to the edge of it, letting the other end be tacked in like manner to the bottom, the material being long enough to hang loosely between. A cord and tassel tied about the middle gives it the shape of an hour-glass, and a little fringe around the top, or a ruffle of the same, will finish it off. (See Fig. 9.) By adding pockets on the inside of the lower half it may be improved, and some are made quite ornamental with little circular pockets drawn up like the hood of a cloak hanging down around the top.

Ottomans, foot-stools, etc., can easily be made from boxes of various sizes, and then, with the addition of muslin curtains to the windows, the house may be pretty comfortably furnished without calling in either cabinet-maker or upholsterer.

A set of corner hanging-shelves for books may be made by sawing three boards in a triangular shape, the largest measuring eighteen inches on the side, the next fifteen, and the smallest twelve inches. Have them made perfectly smooth, and then stain them with thin black varnish or vandyke brown mixed in turpentine, using extract of logwood if a reddish tinge is wanted. Then rub them smooth with sand-paper, and ornament the edge with leather-work, cone-work, or with the burs of the sweet gum tree, which, when sawed in half, may be nailed or glued on to cover the edges.

Round auger-holes in all three corners of each shelf should then be made, and with three strong cords or sash-ropes they may be strung together. Knots tied under each shelf will keep them in place, and they must be hung so as to be entirely level, and with greater space between the two lower than the upper shelves. A strong iron staple driven into the corner of the wall near the ceiling will be best to hang them on, and they will hold a large number of books or other articles usually placed on an etagère.

Single brackets for a corner also look well, to hold a clock, lamps, vases, etc.

Side-wall brackets are easily made in this way: if there is a turner within reach you can have a round, solid block of wood turned according to any pattern drawn on paper. An acorn shape, spreading out into a fluted, broad top, looks well. It will, of course, be entirely circular, and may then be sawn into two equal halves, which, when stained, varnished, and hung up, will make a pair of very pretty brackets. They will be much improved by the addition of leather-work grapes, leaves, and flowers around the upper edges to look like carved wood.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

TO be alone in a crowd is, they say, the most utter solitude; but to be alone where a crowd was wont to be—in the familiar haunts where friends were used to greet one at every turn—is more lonely still. Not so many years ago Punch parodied that well-known poem of Campbell's, "The Last Man," and therein described the desolation of a denizen of the Clubs left alone in London at the beginning of September. The tale was so pitifully told that one's heart ached for him. Quite a fortnight earlier than usual London is even more deserted now than it generally is at the end of the season. A week ago in Rotten Row, just at the fashionable hour for riding, there were literally not half a dozen equestrians there; and in the afternoon, when I paid a visit to Marshal & Snelgrove's, one of our most fashionable linen-draperies, where usually at that hour the carriages stand four or six deep, and the shop is so full of the beau-monde that you can hardly make your way to the different departments, having an opportunity the while of studying the latest modes as worn by the women of the highest rank and fashion, I could have counted the people there. I do not, however, wish to excite your pity by allowing you to suppose that I am one of the unlucky mortals who have still to endure the almost unbearable heat of the metropolis with none of the usual brilliancy which characterizes it to reconcile one to the infliction. I have now winged my flight to the ancient town of Norwich, awaiting the meeting of the British Association, which is to take place here on the 19th instant, and will last a whole week. In my next letter I shall hope to give you a full, true, and particular account thereof; but before I take you quite away from the modern Babylon, I must gather up my "orts"—an expression, by-the-by, peculiar to the good County of Norfolk, where I now am—which means that I must collect the odds and ends, the stray webs of my story, and tell you a little more of our London doings.

The Queen, you know, is traveling on the Continent as Countess of Kent, and is for a few weeks quietly domiciled at Lucerne. The very weak state of her health is the main cause of her undertaking this journey; and as people all the world over are given to make mountains of mole-hills, the general gossip is, that she is worse than is given out, more especially as the papers announce, in a somewhat peculiar phraseology, that Her Majesty is traveling "under the care" of Sir James Clark, one of the Queen's favorite physicians, who has a pretty home at Bagshot, in Surrey. He was himself very ill in the spring. Once or twice on her way to Aldershot Her Majesty stopped to inquire after his health. The public press does not admit that there is any serious cause for alarm, but the gossips, which abound every where, do.

Ten days ago I was at a charming ball, given by the officers of the Royal Engineers, at the Brompton Barracks, Chatham. Prince Arthur, the youngest of the Queen's sons except Prince Leopold, is an officer of that body, and danced away to his heart's content the whole evening long, and to the great delight of the many young ladies among the company whom he honored with his hand. He wore the engineer uniform, like the rest of the officers present; and, indeed, appeared in every way one of them, receiving no special mark of deference. He is just eighteen, tall, fair, and gentlemanly-looking, bearing a most striking resemblance to his eldest brother. He not only, it seems, takes part in the gayeties and pleasures of his comrades, but in the duties of his calling, too; and when, a few days after, a sad accident occurred at Chatham, by the breaking down of a temporary bridge, whereby one man was killed and many wounded, no one was more active or prompt in rendering assistance than the young Prince. But we will not dwell on the doleful side of the royal visit here. The mess-room at the balls is turned into the ball-room. It is a large square room, with nothing particular about it, except portraits of the Queen and Prince Consort, and a few distinguished soldiers, and the admirable way in which it is lighted, by sun-lights, from the roof. The band of the Royal Engineers played from a gallery running across the lower end of the room; the side-board and the window-sills were crammed with flowers, and dancing throughout the evening was well kept up.

Military balls are far more effective than any others, because officers are supposed to wear their uniforms, the only opportunity their fair friends have of seeing them in them, save perhaps at a levee, or drawing-room, or at a review, or something of that kind, as they do not appear in them except on duty, when with their regiments. The suppers and the refreshments generally are always of a first-rate order, and they could not have been better than on this occasion. They were served in the library, and the corridor leading to it, and a kind of impromptu tent made on some adjacent leads by means of flags and tarpaulin, were crowded throughout the evening. Supper is always partaken of standing. "Sit-down" suppers, as they are called, are quite old-fashioned. Programmes of the dances, which used to be presented to each guest on entering the ball-room, are not by any means as general as they were in England at balls; but they were used at this one. Waltzes, Lancers, and quadrilles follow each other in pretty regular succession. One gallop in an evening is the usual thing now, and that the last dance. We used to have as many waltzes as gallops, but "Nous avons changé tout cela," and a very bad change it is, owing, they say, to the Prince of Wales's strong passion for waltzing. He never stops dancing all the evening long.

The present House of Commons is virtually defunct. It is prorogued now until the 8th of October; it will then be further prorogued until the 9th of November, when the writs will be issued for the General Elections, and the strife of war will have really begun.

I wended my way to the House of Lords to see the ceremony of the prorogation, but it was so tame and dreary an affair that I was scarcely repaid for my trouble. The Lords Commissioners—the Lord Chancellor, the Earl of Malmesbury, the Duke of Buckingham, the Duke of Beaufort, and the Earl of Devon—appeared in the full glory of their scarlet and ermine-bedizened robes, and listened to the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns), as he read as commonplace a royal speech as could well be. One of the most famous of diplomatists tells us that the power of speech was given us to conceal our thoughts; surely this must be peculiarly applicable to royal speeches. Besides the Lords Commissioners there were present some half dozen peers—scarcely more—a few ladies seated on the Opposition benches of the Peers' Chamber, a reporter or two, and the Speaker, and perhaps twenty M.P.'s, and that was about all save and except the three Clerks of the House, very important personages, especially on this occasion, who appear in silk gowns and white wigs, like barristers. In letters of this kind one is allowed to skip from subject to subject, like bees from flower to flower in pursuit of honey, and if one only manages to furnish amusement to her readers she may be forgiven a little want of sequence in the narrative, so I must tell you that during the late fearful heat from which we have been suffering, in one or two of the law-courts the bar have been permitted to doff their wigs for a while. A sad trifling this with the majesty of the law which is not likely to become a precedent; for people here would lose a great deal of their faith in its inscrutable dictates if it were shorn of any of its outward adornments.

But revenons à nos moutons. The Clerks of the House of Lords took a prominent part in the day's performance when Parliament was prorogued, because previous to the prorogation the royal assent was given to several bills—over a hundred, in fact. A pile of these said bills are placed before one Clerk, who hands them to another, who bows first to the Lords Commissioners, and then turning toward the bar of the House, where the representatives of the House of Commons are stationed, declares the royal assent in one of the three following forms, according to the nature of the bill: "La Reine le veut;" "Soit fait comme il est désiré;" or "La Reine accepte la bienveillance et remercie ses bons sujets." The formal reading of the royal speech concluded the proceedings, and after a few words of farewell the Palace of Westminster—at least that part of it usually occupied by the third and fourth estates of the realm—was left in the possession of servants, and under the protection of brown Holland.

I have been a very frequent visitor to the Ladies' Gallery of the House of Commons this season, and the heat I have had to endure in consequence is better imagined than described. This Ladies' Gallery goes often enough by the name of the "Black Hole of Calcutta." It has always been the fashion to grumble at and abuse the accommodation provided for the fair sex here, but, considering all things, it really is not so bad, especially when coupled with the fact that the M.P.'s themselves can not possibly all find places on a full night, even when they betake themselves to the galleries on either side of the building. The evil of this has been so apparent of late, and so keenly felt, that it has been seriously canvassed to rebuild the Commons Chamber altogether. Rather extravagant this, considering how recently it has been completed, and at what an enormous cost. I do not know whether this Commons Chamber generally is familiar to my readers, but, for the benefit of those who may be ignorant on the subject, I will describe it. The floor of the House is occupied—first and foremost—by the table, which plays a prominent part in the proceedings. On this are books, papers, etc. Various papers and petitions have technically to be "laid on the table of the House." To fulfill the form they are not, however, literally "laid on," but dropped into a receptacle on purpose for them underneath. At the further end of this table rests the Mace, that is, when the Speaker is in the Chair; when the House goes into Committee it is removed and placed beneath the table. On Lord Charles Russell, brother of Earl Russell, who is Serjeant-at-Arms, the duty devolves of removing it. He always appears in a black Court dress, bag-wig, sword, breeches, and silk stockings complete. His lordship is elderly, tall, and very thin, and his long, lean figure traversing the length of the House, from his own particular seat not far from the door, to the table, a proceeding which often occurs many times in an evening, is a familiar sight to the M.P.'s. In a chair of state, at the top of the table, in his black gown and white wig, sits the Speaker; in front of him are the clerks of the House. The rest of the House is filled with leather-covered benches, some running lengthwise down the chamber, others (the lower ones) cross-way. Those on the right of the Speaker are occupied by the Ministry and their supporters; those on the left by the Opposition and its partisans. The cross-way benches are supposed to be appropriated by the Independent members. Up against the wall, by the door, are other cross-way seats for peers and illustrious visitors. In the end gallery, over the doorway, are the Speaker's and Strangers' Galleries. Those on each side belong to the members, while the reporters occupy the front row of the gallery before the Speaker's chair, and behind them comes the brass lattice-work through which the ladies—unseen themselves—are supposed to be silent spectators of the proceedings. There are three rooms for the use of the fair sex filled with chairs, each supposed to hold about twenty, until quite recently the chairs were replaced by large unwieldy benches, which took up more room and supplied less seats. An attendant is there specially to see to the wants and requirements of the occupants, and ices, fruits, etc., can be had if wanted. Altogether, womankind is not so badly treated here as it might be. The whole character of the building is richly decorated Gothic, and the ornamentation is exquisitely carried out. The painted windows on either side contain the arms of various cities and boroughs, the ventilation and the lighting is on the most approved principles, but it is in no way so gorgeous in its details as the House of Lords, this being more adapted to business.

My budget of news of people and things is small. In parts of England they are getting the harvest in by moonlight—the nights are so bright, the days so hot. The wheat harvest has been, and is, particularly rich; barley and turnips bad—the latter very bad.

Mr. John Douglas Cook, editor of the Saturday Review, died at the Albany this week. "Le roi est mort—vive le roi!" Every body is asking who is to reign in his stead. Adah Menken, the actress, who made her fame here in Mazepa, has lately died in Paris of rapid consumption. Her life reads like a romance—a romance of which some pages had best be omitted. According to her own request two words alone are to appear on her tombstone, "Thou knowest." Mrs. Lincoln is coming to visit the Queen here, which is rather your news than ours. Fashion books now are only filled with traveling costumes. The newest things of this kind are the water-proof suits, consisting of a short skirt and jacket, trimmed with braid, and sold for thirty shillings. They are made, of course, of the water-proof tweed, like the cloaks for which, with us, the good town of Shrewsbury is so famous.

ARDERN HOLM

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

AN abundance of good water is a luxury in hot weather, and the inhabitants of New York city enjoy this luxury. The city consumes, on the average, 60,000,000 gallons a day, and seldom does any one stop to consider what distress would follow should the supply fail. We fancy the Croton River, with its tributaries, an exhaustless source, and that the Croton Lake, and our other three Reservoirs, contain an unlimited amount of water. It is very true that the capacity of the Lake is about 500,000,000 gallons, and that the Reservoir on Murray Hill, and those in the Central Park, are together capable of holding something like 1,199,888,145 gallons, which seems a good deal in figures. But in some dry seasons in years past only about half as much water has flowed into these reservoirs each day as has been consumed by the city in the same time. A serious calamity might result from any long continued drought. Consequently, about two years ago, a new Croton reservoir was commenced in Kent Township, Putnam County. The work seems to have progressed slowly, and as yet the dam of masonry-work necessary to secure an extra supply of water is not finished. This dam is to be 53 feet in height above the bed of the stream, and 650 feet long. The reservoir will be irregular in shape, its extreme length being 11,000 feet; its extreme width, 2300 feet; its average depth, 25 feet; its area, 300 acres; and its capacity, 2,400,000,000 gallons. This new reservoir, being filled by the early spring rains, can be made useful in any dry season by supplying the Croton Lake with water.

Of the 1200 graduates of Oberlin College, 250 have graduated from the Theological Department, 460 gentlemen and 90 ladies from the Classical Course, and 434 from the Ladies' Course. A large number, both of ladies and gentlemen, have assumed positions of special responsibility and honorable distinction.

A lady has been appointed Professor of English Literature in Rutgers College in this city. She is from Brooklyn, and daughter of the Rev. Dr. T. J. Conant, the well-known Biblical scholar and translator. She is said to have excellent qualifications for the position.

Chicago has three prominent public parks—Union Park, Dearborn Park, and Lincoln Park. The latter, about forty or fifty acres in extent, extends along the lake-shore in the northern part of the city, and is laid out in a very artistic manner. It is a sort of Central Park in miniature, and on Saturday afternoons a band discourses popular music.

A mammoth hotel is to be built on a spot in the White Mountains known as the Giant's Grave, from which a fine view of the whole mountain-range can be obtained.—A young lady—name not known—at the White Mountains, has fallen—in love with a guide.—The he-gira has commenced, and rooms at Saratoga can soon be obtained at a more moderate price. The perfumed gloves "for bets" which have been offered for sale in that village will be at a discount.—Guests at the Catskill Mountain

House are still enjoying themselves immensely. They have not been altogether idle during the season either, as the rocks, embellished with hundreds of names, in various fanciful styles of handwriting, will testify.—October is a delightful month in which to visit Lake George; and the Fort William Henry Hotel enjoys the reputation of setting one of the "best tables" of the season.—Some of the Newport trunks are ready to return home. Being too large for the doors, they stand on the lawn in front of the Ocean House.

Three or four years ago a young lady in Richmond, Virginia, declined proposals of marriage from a young gentleman who has recently died. She has received notice from the young man's administrator that all his property, amounting in value to about $20,000, is bequeathed to her.

According to statements made by his son Francis, Victor Hugo is now finishing a romance in four volumes, the scene of which is laid in England, near the commencement of the eighteenth century. The title is not yet determined on, two having suggested themselves to the author's mind. The first is L'Homme qui Rit (the man who laughs). The second is Par Ordre du Roi (by order of the King). The result of Victor Hugo's deliberations on this point will soon be known. The few who have seen something of this promised work predict for it a success similar to that of Les Misérables.

Alphonse Gouffé, head pastry-cook to Queen Victoria, has translated and adapted for English use a new cookery book, written by Jules Gouffé, chef de cuisine of the Paris Jockey Club. It is scarcely adapted for common use, however, since the London price is two guineas for each copy. It has over one hundred and sixty woodcuts, and some of its illustrations are large chromo-lithographs. Extracts from this work, which is acknowledged a first-class authority in culinary matters, have appeared in the Bazar.

"The Moonstone," which was published as a serial in Harper's Weekly, and has now been issued in regular book-form, is a story of absorbing interest, as, indeed, are all of Wilkie Collins's works. "The Moonstone" has also been published in London; but the price of the English edition is a guinea and a half, while the American edition costs only a dollar and a half. The latter also has many original engravings of very high merit.

A singular accident recently occurred at Fontainebleau, which might have proved a very serious one. The "Chinese saloon" was a favorite resort of the imperial pair, and here one morning they had been closeted, writing letters with ink out of the marvelous Chinese inkstand, on the table beneath the great chandelier. They had only reached the threshold, in retiring from the room, when the monster chandelier fell with a tremendous crash, smashed the table, pulverized the inkstand, and half buried itself in the floor. The Empress did not faint, but it is said she has been more serious ever since, and more fully bent on making pilgrimage to the Holy City.

A sarcastic writer says that "the British made a mistake in abolishing the law that compelled the widow to burn herself with the remains of her husband. If such a rule were applied here, the ladies would take better care of their husbands' health."

A wonderful story is told of a native of Switzerland, who, at the age of sixty-six, had arrived at an astonishing degree of perfection in reckoning time by an internal movement. He was, in fact, a living clock. In his youth he was accustomed to pay great attention to the ringing of bells and vibrations of pendulums, and by degrees he acquired the power of counting a succession of intervals exactly equal to those which the vibrations of the sound produced. His accuracy in indicating the lapse of time has been proved by many experiments. His own account of his power is as follows: "I have acquired, by imitation, labor, and patience, a movement which neither thought, nor labor, nor any thing can stop. It is similar to that of a pendulum, which, at each moment of going and returning, gives me the space of three seconds, so that twenty of them make a minute; and these I add to others continually."

MISS BURDETT-COUTTS.

WE give on page 749 the portrait of one of the wealthiest women and most earnest philanthropists of the time, the well-known Miss Angela Georgiana Burdett-Coutts.

Miss Burdett-Coutts was born April 25, 1814. She was the youngest daughter of Sir Francis Burdett, a distinguished politician and member of parliament. Her mother, Lady Burdett, was the daughter of the famous banker, Coutts, who was world-renowned for his immense wealth. The Burdetts are a very old family—Miss Burdett-Coutts's brother, Sir Robert Burdett, being the sixth baronet. She has two sisters living; Susannah, married in 1830 to John Bettesworth Trevelyan, Esq., and Clara Maria, married in 1830 to the Rev. James Drummond Money. Her grandfather, Coutts the banker, had married Miss Mellon, the celebrated actress. On the death of Mr. Coutts, his widow had married the Duke of St. Alban's. Her first husband had left her the whole of his fortune, and there seemed but little chance of any of his grandchildren ever participating in his wealth. However, the Duchess was too kind-hearted to be capable of any thing like injustice, and as she had no children of her own, she resolved that the granddaughter, who, we believe, had passed much of her time with her, should enjoy the whole of her grandfather's fortune, on condition that she should assume the name and arms of Coutts. Accordingly, in 1837, on the death of the Duchess of St. Alban's, Miss Burdett became known as Miss Burdett-Coutts.

Miss Burdett-Coutts's vast wealth has been employed for the good of her fellow-creatures; and in no direction has her sympathies been so fully and practically expressed as in favor of the poor and unfortunate of her own sex. By her exertions the teaching of sewing and other household occupations was introduced into the girls' public school, from which they had before been excluded. For the fallen she provided a shelter and means of reform at a small establishment near Shepherd's Bush, which existed for seven years, and one half of whose inmates became happy and prosperous residents of the British colonies. Again, in Spitalfields, a mass of destitution, Miss Coutts founded a sewing-school where adult women are not only taught, but fed and provided with work, and from which nurses are sent to the sick, and outfits are distributed to servants and warm clothing to destitute women. One of the plague-spots of London was purchased by her, and on the large area of squalor and wretchedness she founded a large pile of magnificent model dwellings, consisting of separate tenements let at rents ranging from 50 cents to $1 25 per week, to upward of three hundred families; close by which she reared a market, church, and mission-school. Her last work in the way of model dwellings has been the erection of a village for her work-people, near her residence, Holly Lodge, Highgate. The beautiful drinking-fountain, erected by her at a cost of £5000, in Victoria Park, is one of the ornaments of London.

Miss Coutts's purse is constantly open to every good work. She has endowed, at an outlay of £50,000, the three colonial bishoprics of Adelaide, Cape Town, and British Columbia; built and endowed numerous churches and schools, and aided large numbers of the poor to seek their fortunes in other lands. The amount of her private charities it is impossible to estimate. She is a liberal patroness of the arts, and is herself an accomplished artist. To her own order, to the titled and the wealthy, Miss Coutts sets a noble example, and we rejoice to think that her example has not been in vain. Her friends are the purest and truest of her sex; Florence Nightingale is one of them, the widowed Queen another. Need we say more?

THE RELIC VENDOR.

[From a Painter's Note-Book.]

ONE summer I was seated on the diligence on my way to Quimper, one of the most important towns of Brittany. It had rained overnight, and the roads were very muddy. It helped us little that the morning broke in dazzling splendor over the forests, the green hills, and the swampy lowlands; we made our way forward but slowly in spite of the cracking of the whip and the fantastic oaths of the driver. At last the diligence stood still, having gracefully courtesied itself into a ditch near a desolate hillock. The lash and oaths were alike in vain. The horses refused to move from the spot, and when at last, urged by repeated blows, they made a sudden jerk, two of the wheels broke. The breaking down of a diligence in France is in itself too unimportant an affair to be worthy of notice, were I not indebted to this detention for a beautiful sketch for my port-folio, as well as for the relation of a sad history in real life.

I preferred seeking out the next village to following the example of the remainder of the passengers, and staying to make useless efforts and proffer unskilled assistance. I took my cane and sketch-book out of the coach, and walked briskly toward the next little place, over the wretched cottages of which arose the high towers and battlements of an old gray castle. The cottages were poorer than I had previously noticed in Brittany; the castle appeared uninhabited and dilapidated. The highway passed through the court-yard.

I passed through the half-ruined porch-door. The upper portion of the castle was almost entirely in ruins. Through the broken window-panes I could see the heavy tapestry hanging in shreds from the cracked walls. The lower rooms between the stable and the hall alone showed any signs of human life, and those who had sought a shelter here were plainly very poor. The space was divided into rooms by means of board partitions. Threadbare clothes were hanging to dry over the proud coat of arms at the entrance; a dilapidated hat crowned the single half-broken statue which yet remained, and children were playing in the court-yard among swine and cackling hens. Only on one side of the castle, where a small door led to what had once been a garden, did there seem to be an attempt at neatness, for some plants stood by the little window, and carefully-trained ivy was creeping up the walls.

I went through the Gothic doorway upon a dilapidated gallery, from the parapet of which the eye took in the neglected garden and a desolate landscape of barren hillocks, relieved only by a stretch of wood-land in the distance.

At the end of the gallery, a few steps lower down, was a small, airy wooden shed, used as a tavern, as the table and chairs before the door, as well as the sign, sufficiently indicated. I resolved to remain here while waiting for the diligence. I sat down at the table, and was soon sipping a glass of miserable wine which the good-natured host had brought me. While I was contemplating the contrast between the present desolation and the former magnificence of the castle, a new picture presented itself. Two young girls, the noble features of one of whom I especially remarked, had stepped out of the door on the gallery, and were leaning over the parapet talking gayly. They were dressed in the picturesque costume of the country, with caps trimmed with lace, and neatly fitting bodices and dresses of different colors; while the paleness of their countenances was set off by their glossy black hair and their coral lips. They appeared to be waiting for some one.

I soon discovered a pilgrim who was toilsome-ly making his way over the stony hills toward the castle. A few moments later he was standing before the two girls. I perceived that the pilgrim, a member of some spiritual brotherhood, was blind. The poor sightless friar was led by a faithful dog, round whose neck a string was passed, with the other end fastened to the pilgrim's crucifix. His countenance and his finely-cut features betrayed the nobility of his origin; but he was pale and sickly, and seemed to be suffering. Around his neck was suspended a relic-box, containing a wax image of the Virgin and Child. There may also have been a relic of some saint, a shred of clothing, or a handful of holy earth, for the two girls, who bowed their heads in pious simplicity, seemingly overawed by the sacred relics before them. I was so delighted with the scene, the effect of which was heightened by the peculiar light reflected in the galleries, that I immediately seized my brush to make the sketch, which I afterward finished. As I was thus employed the host stepped up, and watched me curiously.

"Do you know whom you are sketching there?" he asked. "That is our honored lord, the possessor of the old castle which you see before you?"

I looked at him in astonishment.

"Yes, it is a sad history. It is now twenty years ago. Our young lord used to spend a few weeks here every year on account of the curiosities, for the castle was already almost uninhabitable. It was said that he was interested in a young girl here. He was a good, kind master, and we were always glad when he came. What was our terror when he was found one evening at the edge of the forest yonder unconscious, and with his eyes torn out. He soon regained his senses, but refused to tell any particulars of the outrage. When partially recovered he went away from here, blind. No one discovered who had perpetrated the horrible deed. A year after he returned as you see him to-day. He gave his property to the poor, and wandered around the country as relic vendor for a cloister. He comes here every year at this time, and remains a few days. Every day he prays at his mother's grave; on Sunday he preaches in the old chapel. His sermons work wonders, and the people honor him as a saint. He sleeps in a lonely corner of the castle."

I had no more time to inquire into the particulars of the peculiar circumstances connected with the pilgrim. The diligence was ready to start, and it was important that I should reach Quimper that day. But as I was climbing to my seat, I cried to the host who had followed me that I should visit him on my return.

Having completed my business in Quimper, I sent my baggage ahead and walked across to the old castle which had so interested me on my journey hither. As I caught sight of the old battlements of Quinbras—as the castle is called—I caught the clear tones of a bell that rang out distinctly through the morning air. The distant forest was hidden with fog, the dew shimmered on the highway, and the stones and grass at either side; but the walls and battlements, lighted by the morning sun, stood out in relief against the sky. The bell ceased as I reached the spot. The old host came forward and said, with a friendly greeting:

"It is well that you sketched our lord when you did; to-day it would have been too late. He has gone to his everlasting rest."

"How was it that death overtook him so suddenly?" I interrupted.

"On the very first day that he came here, the day you saw him, he complained of feeling ill. We thought it was only a slight indisposition, but in the same night Claudine knocked at my door and begged me to go over, as he continued to grow worse. Claudine is the youngest of the two girls you saw here, and the pilgrim was at her house. We both prayed for him devoutly. When morning came we stood by his couch ignorant what to do; when suddenly a suggestion came to me from above. 'Claudine,' I said, 'what if you should go for your father? he is acquainted with healing herbs.' 'My father,' answered the girl, 'avoids men, and has lived for years alone in the forest, but I will go to him.' When she returned he was with her; but what a sight I witnessed! Scarcely had he caught sight of the sick man, who lay as if in a deep sleep, when he sank on his knees as if struck by lightning, and burst into tears, muttering unintelligible words. As the sick man heard them, he raised himself up on the couch like a ghost—I shall never forget the sight—spasmodically stretched his arm in the direction whence came the voice, and then sunk back upon the bed. What occurred afterward I did not witness; but Claudine told me, under a promise of secrecy, that it was her father who, moved by jealousy, had, with two other men since dead, attacked the Count, and put out his eyes. Claudine's father threw himself, moaning, on the pilgrim's couch, and prayed for forgiveness. The blind man raised himself up for an instant, laid his hands in blessing on the head of Claudine and her father, while his countenance shone with a holy light, and passed to the dwelling of the angels."

I followed the host into the old, crumbling chapel. The fresh morning light and air played over the desolate place, while the trees stretched their branches in greeting through the ruined windows. A fresh grave had been made among the broken grave-stones; and a tablet pointed out the resting-place of the noble Count Gaëtan de P—. Under this earth lay the last branch of this noble house; perhaps the noblest of all, for he had overcome grief, and, dying, had blessed the enemy who had robbed him of the light and the joy of his life.

I gladly took the relic-box, and, often when overcome with sadness, I open the little door and think of him whose consolation it had been through a joyless life.

THE QUEEN AND "VICKY" AT THE HIGHLAND COTTAGE.

THE accompanying graphic illustration portrays the visit paid by Queen Victoria and the Princess Royal, now Victoria of Prussia, to the aged Highland widow, past fourscore, which all will remember who have read that touching idyl of royal domestic life, "Our Life in the Highlands." The young Princess had just pledged her hand to the Crown-Prince of Prussia, and the Queen herself announced the approaching event to Widow Symons. The old woman straightened herself up, bent almost double as she was, and stretching out her hand toward Vicky, in an attitude of benediction, exclaimed, "May the Lord be a guide to ye in your future, and may every happiness attend ye!" For some time after the marriage, as it will be remembered, grave doubts were entertained as to the fulfillment of this blessing; the air was full of rumors about the unhappiness of the bride and the harshness of the bridegroom; and it was generally believed that this was one of the matches not made in heaven. The origin and relative truth of this gossip, with many other interesting facts, will be learned from the accompanying article on Victoria of Prussia, which gives a succinct narrative of the later history of the young Princess, perhaps the most talented of the royal family of England.

VICTORIA OF PRUSSIA.

THOSE who, during the summer months, visit Babelsberg, the delightful country seat of the royal family of Prussia, and the only truly beautiful spot in the sandy plains of Brandenburg, will be especially charmed with the noble avenues extending from the two wings of the palatial villa toward the park. If they saunter up and down the western avenue, between five and six in the afternoon, they will be likely to notice there a lady, apparently twenty-eight or thirty years of age, below the medium height, neither very slender nor inclined to embonpoint, and dressed in a tasteful, though simple and unassuming, manner. This lady, who leads a little girl by the hand, and is, besides, accompanied by two little boys, the elder of whom bears a striking resemblance to her, is by no means beautiful, nor even pretty; her features lack regularity, her head is not very shapely, her mouth seems somewhat too large, and her complexion looks slightly faded; but her face is lit up with so marked an expression of kind-heartedness, there is so much genial sunshine in her bright eyes, and, withal, such an air of distinction about her, that strangers who meet her there for the first time will be much struck with her appearance, and, even without knowing her, think she must be a good and remarkable woman.

This favorable impression is certain to be confirmed and enhanced when they see a gentleman, in the prime of life, and evidently enjoying the best of health, tall, strong, and active, with a pleasant, bearded face, and dressed in the uniform of a superior officer of the Prussian army, entering the avenue from the side of the Potsdam highway, and advancing with a quick step toward the lady, who has evidently been awaiting him, and who, as soon as she catches sight of him, accelerates her gait, while the boys run to meet the officer. When they meet, the sunshine in the lady's face has become still sunnier, and she looks with an expression of great tenderness into the good-natured face of the handsome officer, who shakes hands with her, or, still oftener, gives her a kiss, draws her arm into his own, and takes the little girl by the hand; and then the happy couple, smiling, chatting, and laughing, walk back to the villa.

The stranger who has witnessed this meeting, as it may be witnessed at the aforesaid place and hour nearly every afternoon in June, July, and August, will, in all probability, turn to some passer-by and inquire who the lady and gentleman may be. The reply will be, "Why, that is our little Crown-Princess Victoria and her husband!" While the stranger may still be somewhat surprised, as he is very apt to be, that this pleasant little woman with the sunny face should be no other than the second lady in the kingdom, and destined to occupy before long the royal throne of Prussia, and, perhaps, to wear the still prouder imperial diadem of Germany, he will find his interlocutor, no matter to what class of society he may belong, rather talkative about the merits of the "little Crown-Princess." The Germans generally, when conversing about their princes, do not speak of them in very flattering terms; and those who are acquainted with most of these distinguished persons can not blame their subjects for alluding to them in such a disparaging manner. But, whether noblemen or peasants, the Prussians of to-day will with one accord bestow the most enthusiastic praise on their Crown-Princess; and it is now already predicted by every body that, next to the good and beautiful Louisa, she will be the most popular queen that ever sat on the throne of Prussia. Hundreds of anecdotes are told about her great popularity. She herself is fond of relating what an old peasant-woman said to her several years ago in a village near Culm, where she and the Crown-Prince were waiting for relay-horses, and whiled away their time by chatting with the villagers. An old woman asked the Crown-Prince who they were. "I am the son of your King," he replied, "and this is my wife." "Oh," exclaimed the old woman, her eyes brightening up, "this, then, is the young lady of whom every body speaks so well!" In the most radical circles of democratic Berlin, where the King is sneered at as a prejudiced old fool, and the Queen derided as a blue-stocking, praise is lavished on the Crown-Princess; and Count Bismarck has been insisting for eighteen months past that the best way of putting an end to the disaffection still prevailing in Hanover would be to send Victoria to the ex-capital of George the Fifth, and have her reside in the deserted palace on the banks of the Leine, which, as a near relative of the dethroned King, she has thus far steadily refused to do, although the great Premier has time and again assured her that she could and would win over the disaffected Hanoverians.

If her popularity nearly equals that of the lamented Louisa, she is certainly not a prey to sufferings, such as hurried the beautiful mother of the present King to a premature grave. On the contrary, Victoria herself said, not many months ago, that she was the happiest woman in Prussia. It was on the last but one birthday of her husband. The royal family, including the young Grand-duchess of Baden and her children, was assembled in the King's parlor at Sans-Souci, and playing at "Questions and Answers." Somebody had written on a piece of paper, "Who is the happiest woman in Prussia?" And it was Victoria's turn to answer. "You may think me very egotistical, or very silly," she said, smilingly; "but, if I am to tell the truth, I must say that I believe I am the happiest woman in Prussia!" The warm-hearted, impetuous old King hastened to her, and kissed her tenderly, exclaiming, "Brav, mein Töchterchen, brav!"

Now, will it be believed that this little princess, who calls herself the happiest woman in Prussia, who will soon wear a dazzling diadem, who is idolized by her husband and nearly her whole family, and whose name is mentioned with respect and affection by every member of a people until very recently not noted for great attachment to its dynasty, during the first ten or twelve months of her wedded life deemed herself a very unhappy creature, and bewailed the day when she had consented to become the wife of Prince Frederick William? And yet it is but too true, and to those who saw and observed her in the first time after her arrival in Prussia, the change which she has undergone since then must seem well-nigh miraculous.

She first set foot on Prussian soil at a time when both the court and the people were in a gloomy and depressed state of mind. The King, a prey to incurable mental and bodily disease, was stretched on a bed of suffering, from which he was never to rise again, so that the royal family led a very retired life, and no festivities took place at court. The ambitious Queen Elizabeth, who saw the sceptre slipping from her hands, and the star of her hated sister-in-law Augusta in the ascendant, received young Victoria coldly, and, as soon as she had withdrawn, exclaimed, "I think I shall not like her"—a prediction which has since been verified to the fullest extent; for of the few adversaries whom the Princess has, the Queen-Dowager is the most prominent. The Princess (now Queen) Augusta, Victoria's mother-in-law, a kind-hearted lady, but generally in feeble health, disliked Berlin, whose air did not agree with her, and where she had always been slighted and neglected, and returned at once to her quiet retreat at Coblenz. She had, moreover, entertained from the very first the belief that she and her little daughter-in-law would not harmonize very well—an apprehension which time has proved to be entirely groundless. The other princesses, who had hitherto always sided with Queen Elizabeth, and who were naturally cold-hearted and indifferent, manifested very little kindness toward their new relative. Besides, little discrimination had been displayed in the selection of Victoria's ladies of honor. A stiff old mistress of ceremonies tormented her at nearly every step she made, and her younger companions were remarkable for nothing but their haughtiness and aristocratic descent. Thus every thing was calculated to chill her warm little heart. The keen-eyed Princess had also noticed very well that the royal family was any thing but popular. The faults which her father-in-law had committed in 1848 and 1849 were not yet forgotten, and the people generally treated him with reserve and distrust. The Berliners, who never are very enthusiastic, received her quite well under the circumstances; but she felt that there was a marked contrast between her reception and that with which the royal family used to meet at the hands of the people of England. In the midst of a country which at bottom is nothing but an endless sandy plain, she longed for the hills of Balmoral, the white cliffs and blue waves of Wight, and the gardens and halls of Windsor Castle. The home-sickness which seized her was still aggravated by the morbid belief which constantly haunted her, that her husband was cold-hearted and cared nothing about her. Her beau idéal of a husband was her father, Prince Albert; and Prince Frederick William, in whom Queen Victoria had erroneously believed to recognize the best qualities of her own consort, was so unlike her father! He treated her with a sort of chivalrous reserve, which she took for coldness, when it was nothing but his respectful admiration for her intellectual superiority. Yes, it was the young husband who looked up to his English wife, and although he was certainly well educated, the accomplishments of the brilliant young creature dazzled him and filled him with something like timidity. Shyness, moreover, was at that time one of his prominent traits; it was engendered chiefly by the persistency with which he had thus far been kept in the back-ground, and has since then, owing, above all, to the happy influence exercised over him by his wife, entirely worn off. But at that time her home-sick eyes did not see what was the matter, and she arrived at the conclusion that her husband did not love her, and that of all unhappy little princesses she was the unhappiest. Tears, sighs, complaints—all of which the young Prince vainly tried to stop—were the consequence. The scandal-mongers at court hailed this state of affairs as a very sweet morsel for their tongues, and, as usual, distorted every thing in the most shameful manner. Some said the Princess had in England already fallen in love with a young British officer, for whom she was weeping now; and others asserted in the most positive manner that the Prince was treating his young wife with shocking brutality, and had struck her repeatedly.

These rumors spread very rapidly, and even reached the ears of Victoria's parents. One day, after she had been married for eight or nine months, Prince Albert arrived quite unexpectedly at the palace of his son-in-law, who happened to be in Magdeburg; and the anxious father had a long interview with his daughter. He was not long in ascertaining that those rumors were utterly unfounded, and exhorted her to be good and sensible.

Matters, however, did not mend much until the arrival of a very important personage—the Baby Peace-Maker!

The Crown-Princess gave birth to a prince, and it is said that the rapturous joy which her husband manifested on seeing his son and heir, and the tearful tenderness with which he knelt down by her bedside, melted the crust of ice with which her morbid apprehensions had surrounded her heart, and made the two a truly happy and loving couple. To the dismay of the Mistress of Ceremonies the Prince established his headquarters in his wife's room, drove the nurses out of it, took their task upon himself, slept on the sofa, carried the young mother, as soon as she was well enough, in his arms into the adjoining room—in short, behaved as well as Queen Victoria says in her book Prince Albert did on a similar occasion. The Crown-Princess, on her part, was supremely happy. She never tired of saying pleasant, pretty things to her overjoyed and devoted husband, so that the courtiers said, wonderingly, "Their Royal Highnesses have after all fallen in love with one another!"

So they had indeed. Henceforth they were almost inseparable. The Princess now commenced studying her husband's character, and found that he was worthy of her affection and respect. Her influence over him soon became very marked, and the people say that but for her he would have become a very different man from what he is now. Above all things, she urged him to take a more active and decided part than heretofore in the political affairs of the country. Happier than her mother-in-law, the Queen, who does not share the political views of her royal husband, she warmly sympathized with the liberal tendencies with which she found the Crown-Prince imbued. She herself became quite a politician, and repeatedly created quite a sensation among her relatives by engaging at the royal table in a regular political discussion with his Majesty the King, who good-naturedly allows his "Töchterchen," as he is fond of calling her, to tell him a great many things which he would frown down if uttered by any body else.

When Bismarck was placed at the head of the Prussian cabinet, the Crown-Princess became the most determined opponent of his policy. She thought that the British system, by which the dynasty was kept aloof from the strife of contending parties, was decidedly preferable to that in which the person of the King himself was constantly involved in political quarrels; and she, moreover, considered Bismarck an unsafe and even dangerous adviser. Bismarck, on his part, rather liked his fair little adversary. "She has got a head of her own," he would say, and he tried very hard to win her over to his side; but all to no purpose. The two have since then made peace, and are now on very good terms; but that was long afterward, and certainly not at the time when Bismarck issued his famous press-decree of 1863. Victoria and her husband were at that time traveling in East Prussia. When the news of the promulgation of the obnoxious decree reached them, she urged the Prince to express his earnest disapprobation of what Bismarck had done, at the first public reception that would be given to them. The Crown-Prince did so in a speech which he delivered at Königsberg, while his wife was leaning on his arm, and evidently heartily indorsing every word he uttered. When the King heard of his son's speech he exclaimed, half angrily, half laughingly, "This is of course Victoria's doing; the next thing we shall hear will be that she has made a speech herself." On another occasion he called her his "little rebel" on account of her undisguised sympathies for the Liberal cause. It was owing to her courageous advice that the Crown-Prince constantly manifested his sympathies for that cause in the most unmistakable manner, and frequently invited the leading men of the opposition, who were frowned upon by the other members of the royal family, to his house and table. At first the Court and aristocracy were highly indignant at the course pursued by their royal highnesses; remonstrances and rebukes were showered upon them, but as they turned a deaf ear to all of them, they were finally allowed to do as they pleased. The Crown-Prince was then ridiculed by his adversaries as being a hen-pecked husband, a "booby led by his restless and ambitious wife," and especially was he derided for frankly acknowledging in some of his political speeches that he had consulted his wife before delivering them. Now, this acknowledgment was by no means so silly as his enemies pretended, for not only was it well received by the people, but it confirmed the impressions which had previously already prevailed among them as to the liberal tendencies of their future queen. At the dinner which the king gave to the members of the first North German Parliament, the Crown-Princess and her husband created no little sensation by walking down to the seats of the Democratic members, and the Princess conversed there principally with representatives whose Republican proclivities were well known to her. To Mr. Schultze-Delitzsch, the celebrated Democratic leader, whose works on Co-operation have obtained a world-wide reputation, she said that she had studied his books with the greatest pleasure and interest, and that she herself had built upon his teachings certain theories concerning the employment of women, which she was very desirous to carry into effect.

This subject, the profitable employment of women, is Victoria's special hobby; and the extraordinary energy which she displayed in trying to open new and profitable careers to the poor of her own sex has done much to endear her to the people of Prussia. She it was who brought about the organization of the Female Labor Exchange in Berlin—an institution which confers untold blessings upon the working-women of the capital, who consider the Princess their special protectress, and never mention her name but in terms of fervent gratitude. The Princess deserves their attachment, too; for she is indefatigable in her efforts to alleviate their sufferings. A thousand little anecdotes are told about her in this respect. One day she was at the large dry-goods store of Mr. G—. After making her purchases she said to the proprietor of the store, "Mr. G—, how many clerks do you employ here?" The merchant named the number. "Why do you not employ saleswomen?" she added. The merchant shrugged his shoulders. "I like best to send my orders to dry-goods stores where female clerks are employed," she said. Mr. G— took the hint. On the first of the following month twenty saleswomen were engaged at his store.

Having read in the newspapers accounts of the successes achieved by the sanitary fairs during the American war, the Crown-Princess thought she would try to avail herself of the same means for the benefit of her charitable enterprises. She set about it with her usual energy, and astonished the court and people of Berlin by the tact with which she managed her fairs, and by the handsome sums which she realized thereby. Few of those who visited last year's fair for the benefit of the wounded Prussian soldiers, and saw the little lady officiating as saleswoman, will forget the charming picture which she presented at her "mother's store," as she called the beautiful tent where she sold children's dresses, shoes, and a thousand little articles such as mothers buy for the nursery. She secured plenty of customers by informing all the wealthy gentlemen of her acquaintance that she wished particularly to see them at the fair.

At the recent fair for the suffering East Prussians she set certain aristocratic ladies a very salutary example under the following circumstances. It was on the eve of the day on which the fair was to be opened. When the Crown-Princess arrived in one of the halls she found there some twenty ladies, all in great consternation; for they had just heard that the décorateurs, who were to arrange the flowers, branches, and draperies along the walls of the hall, had so much to do in other rooms that they could hardly fix up this hall in time. The ladies, therefore, looked very uneasily at the piles of flowers, evergreens, etc., which were lying on the tables. "Why, ladies," said the Crown-Princess, "it seems to me we have got hands and, I hope, some taste too, and may arrange this hall perhaps as well as the décorateurs would do. Let us try it." So saying, she took up a number of flowers and commenced festooning the wall. Her example was, of course, imitated by the rest of the ladies, among whom were to be found the Duchess of Ujest, the Countess Bismarck, etc. When M. von Hülsen and M. von Olfers, Inspector of the Royal Art Galleries, entered the room after a while, they were almost dumfounded at the unexpected scene that met their eyes. But the Crown-Princess and her companions did not allow themselves to be disturbed, and the work went bravely on until the hall was beautifully decorated.

Feeble as the Princess looks, she has shown on more than one occasion that hers is a very brave little heart. During the war of 1866 she repeatedly displayed the most remarkable fortitude. She had tried to prevent the outbreak of that war to the best of her ability, and she knew that her husband took the field not without many misgivings. But, although she was in very feeble health at the time, and although the life of her infant son was already in danger, she restrained her tears in order not to make her husband's heart heavy, and constantly took pains to cheer him up. The Crown-Prince was in Breslau with his troops when he received the sad news of the death of his little son. Next day he received a letter from his wife, who did not ask in it any consolation of her husband, but entreated him not to grieve. The Prince was not ashamed of the tears which this letter brought to his eyes.

A month or two afterward she was at one of the military hospitals in Berlin, when Baron von der Heydt, the Minister, stepped to her, and told her he had just received a list of killed and wounded officers from the seat of war. The Princess seized the list with trembling hands and glanced over it. Suddenly she uttered a low cry and said, "Poor Madame von K.!" A young captain who had married an English lady, with whom the Crown-Princess was well acquainted, had fallen, sword in hand. "Shall I inform the lady of her sad bereavement?" asked the Minister. The Princess was silent for a moment. Then she said, "No, I will do it myself." And she went on her mournful errand. She did break the news to the poor young widow, and as she knew that Madame von K. was without means, and, with her two children, would have to live on a very small pension, the Crown-Princess told her the King would pay her the same amount which her brave husband had hitherto received. The King, of course, redeemed the promise which his daughter-in-law had made in his name.

Such is Victoria of Prussia. A good wife, a good mother, indefatigable in charitable works, humane, enlightened, and brave-hearted; she is an honor to her sex, and will be an ornament to the brilliant throne which she is destined to occupy.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MINNIE.—A stylish costume for a girl of sixteen is made of striped serge, blue, garnet, or green, with black. The dress proper is plainly gored in the skirt, with a Marie Antoinette ruffle, cut bias, about ten inches wide, and gathered so as to form a narrow ruffle at the top. The waist may be tight fitting, but the loose chemise Russe will be much worn. An overskirt of serge of a solid color, the same shade as the stripe in the dress, is trimmed with a bias fold of stripes. A short jaunty sacque similarly trimmed is worn without a belt. We shall shortly give illustrations of new chignons.

SUBSCRIBER.—You are right in regard to the quotation from Pascal's Pensées in No. 44 of the Bazar. It is not verbally correct. In the original the words are: "La nez de Cleopatre; s'il eut été plus court toute la face de la terre aurait changé."—"If the nose of Cleopatra had been shorter the whole face of the world might have changed."

H.—The name of bridegroom was formerly given to the newly married man because it was customary for him to wait at table on his bride and friends on the wedding-day. The original meaning of groom is serving-man.

HUMBLE SERVANT.—The use of "Your humble servant" began first in England on the marriage to the English monarch of Mary the daughter of Henry IV. of France. It is a literal translation of the French: "Votre très humble serviteur." Before its introduction the usual English salutations were: "God keep you," "God be with you," and among the vulgar, "How dost do?" accompanied always by a thump on the shoulder.

MRS. PRACOCK.—Four yards of single width material are necessary for a dressing-gown. Merino or solid colored cashmere is preferred to figured materials. The trimming is wide flat braid, or thick cord sewed on plainly or in waves. The lining should be of soft pliant stuff slightly wadded. The front is neatly quilted. The back is only tacked. There are a number of establishments in this city for the sale of patterns, but we can recommend none in particular.

NELLIE MAY.—Girls of fourteen do not wear long trained dresses. Prairie Dell, Maryland, Prairie View, Valley Home, are names appropriate to your country house. Ticknor & Fields are Longfellow's publishers. Folds are from one to three inches wide. Striped materials cut bias are fashionable as folds on plain goods. Cardboard cottages can be made of any size desired. The satin stitch is done by a succession of stitches, always across the work, and lying close to but not over each other. French embroidery includes all the delicate and most expensive kinds worked in satin stitch, with overcast and the various open and fancy stitches.

E. J. K.—The exact size of the pillow is determined by the size of the bed. The two pillows should extend across the head of the bed, with a space of two or three inches between them. The pillow is simply two square pieces of ticking sewed together, without a connecting band. In making the slip let the material be an inch and a half larger in every direction than the pillow. Seam these together at the edges, turn, and with a row of machine stitching an inch from the edge form the tuck. Rolled gathers are the neatest for the ruffle. It is then overseamed to the edge of the tuck. If you prefer to sew the ruffle in without rolling it must be placed in the first seam and all sewed together, but this makes a bulk at the edge of the tuck that can not be neatly ironed.

MRS. E. M.—Make your moiré into a scarf mantilla such as is described in the New York Fashions of this and the previous Number of the Bazar. The narrow guipure you speak of is suitable trimming.

MISS S. W., BELFAST.—Dry stamping, as we have already explained, consists in rubbing blue powder with a pounce over a perforated paper pattern laid on the stuff to be stamped. Your copying wheel has been sent.

ALICE F.—The Apollo Belvidere is so called from being placed in the pavilion Belvidere of the Vatican at Rome. The Venus de Medicis derives its name from the Medici family, under whose auspices it was brought to Florence.

HERMAN D.—You can have your surname changed by application to the legislature of your State, but there are many worse sounding appellatives than yours. Devil is not an uncommon name. In an old book mention is made of one Rogertus Diabolus, which does not sound so ill in Latin.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FACETIÆ.

QUESTIONS FOR SHAKESPEARIAN STUDENTS.—Whether the "weak invention of the enemy" was patented, and required seven days to complete it?

Did grim-visaged war smooth "his wrinkled front" with a flat-iron? Would the "bondman's key" that Shylock proposed to use open the "gory locks" that Banquo shook at Macbeth?

Was Hamlet thinking of his mother-in-law when he spoke of "an eye like Mars to threaten and command?"

Did Richard apostrophize the "Winter of his discontent" because he thought of going on a slaying excursion among his relations?

After the Ghost had told Hamlet he was his father's spirit, and requested him to "mark" him, would he have been justified in putting "S.T. 1860 X" upon his back?

When the witches wished Macbeth "all hail" was it because they thought he would have a stormy reign?

Was it not something of a waste when Puck put a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes?

When King Richard exclaimed "So much for Buckingham!" was there any extra demand for seamstresses?

Why "What Ho, Apothecary," in the play of Romeo and Juliet, as represented on the stage, does not have his name over the door of his shop?

What was the amount of the "dreadful note of preparation?"

Were the mob "corned" when Marc Antony wished them to lend him their ears?

Why Cassius did not scratch his "itching palm?"

A correspondent asked if the brow of a hill ever becomes wrinkled? The editor replied: "The only information we can give on that point is that we have often seen it furrowed."

SHAVINGS.

"SHORT AND SWEET"—A baby.

A farmer, who was sympathizing with his neighbor Jones on the death of his son, said, "You should remember, Mr. Jones, there is no loss without some gain. John, you remember, was always a monstrous eater." "I know he was," responded the bereaved parent, "but to think he was laid up with rheumatism all the winter, and died just in hayingtime, is pretty tough, neighbor Jenkins, pretty tough!"

A little girl, attending a party, was asked by her mother how she enjoyed herself. "Oh," said she, "I am full of happiness. I couldn't be any happier unless I could grow."

A boy eight years old, in one of our public schools, having been told that a reptile "is an animal that creeps," on being asked to name one, on examination day, promptly and triumphantly replied, "A baby."

That was a triumphant appeal of an Irishman, who was a lover of antiquity, who, in arguing the superiority of old architecture over the new, said, "Where will you find any modern building that has lasted so long as the ancient?"

"Really, my dear," said poor Mr. Jones to his "better half," "you have sadly disappointed me. I once considered you a jewel of a woman; but you've turned out only a bit of matrimonial paste." "Then, my love," was the reply, "console yourself with the idea that paste is very adhesive, and will stick to you as long as you live."

DOMESTIC RECIPES BY A HOMEOPATHIC DOCTOR.—A good, wholesome Breakfast.—Take the billionth part of a roll, crumble it in the fiftieth part of a pint of milk; boil the two together, and serve up with 18-50ths of a hard egg.

A Refreshing Luncheon.—Half a dram of cheese and two ounces of stale bread, with 4 pint of table-beer in a quart of water.

A Healthy Dinner.—1 ounce, 6 drams, 2 scruples of lean rump-steak, 4 potato, and 15 grains of greens. For pudding.—10 penny-weights of boiled rice, with 10-17ths of a spoon of moist sugar. If fruit is in season a handsome dessert may be sent up of 2 gooseberries, 6 currants, and the 48-100th part of an apple.

A Stiff Glass of Grog.—16 drops of gooseberry wine in a tumbler of water.

A Light Supper.—Two scruples of gruel, with the thousandth part of a grain of nutmeg, and half as much of sugar.

An Infallible Cure for a Cold.—Drink 20-735ths of a Seidlitz powder dissolved in a jug of water, put your feet in a pint of warm water, and apply to your nose some tallow, but be careful it is not more than the tenth part of a pin's head, or else it will do no good.

Somebody says the best way to get rid of weeds is to always put your cigarette and its contents at the service of your friends. Jones says that the most effective means he ever tried was by squeezing the hand of a plump young widow lady in deep black. The next day she was in half-mourning, and a second kindly pressure resulted in a pink gown, with a white bonnet.

ADVICE TO YOUNG LADIES.—If you have taper fingers mind that you don't burn them.

AGRICULTURAL MAXIMS.

Large horses are generally most admired by farmers; but farmers are most admired who pony up.

Prosperity is generally based upon knowledge and industry; the swine will always get most that nose most.

Farmers are like fowls; neither will get full crops without industry.

Because a man who attends a flock of sheep is a shepherd, makes it no reason that a man who keeps cows should be a coward.

We like to see a farmer increase the growth of useful plants and shrubs around his home, but do not like to see him use rails, poles, and boards to prop-a-gate with.

A young man of great gallantry recently rescued a beautiful woman who was in danger of drowning. She stood in high-tide shoes, surrounded by forty springs under a watered silk, with a cataract in her eye, a waterfall on the back of her head, and a notion in her brain.

At Dieppe, in France, a famous bathing-place, there is a police established whose duty it is to rescue persons from danger. The following notice was recently issued to them: "The bathing police are requested, when a lady is in danger of drowning, to seize her by the dress and not by the hair, which oftentimes remains in their grasp. Newfoundland dogs will govern themselves accordingly!"

"I wonder where those clouds are going?" said Flora, pensively, as she pointed with delicate finger to the heavy masses that floated in the sky. "I think they are going to thunder," said her brother.

SAFETY MATCHES.—Early marriages.

BEYOND CONTROVERSY.—"Ignoramus" ought to know that Milton's Minor Poems are those which he wrote before he was One-and-Twenty.

TONED PAPER.—Sheets of Music.

A lady asked her little girl, on returning from church, if she remembered the text. "Oh yes," said she, "it was 'The ladies' sewing society will meet at Mrs. M. Cracken's house on Monday evening next.'"

A Western editor, when in durance for libeling a justice of the peace, was requested by the jailer to give the prison a favorable notice.

A COLLECTION OF GOOD CONS.

Why is a clock the most modest piece of furniture? Because it covers its face with its hands, and runs down its own works.

Why are corn and potatoes like Indian idols? Because they have ears that can not hear, and eyes that can not see.

What comes after cheese? Mice.

How many wives does the Prayer-Book allow? Sixteen—four (for) richer, four (for) poorer, four (for) better, four (for) worse.

If I were in the sun, and you were out of it, what would the sun be? Sin.

Why are your eyes like friends in different climes? Because they correspond, but never meet.

Why is a pig in a drawing-room like a house on fire? Because the sooner it is put out the better.

When does a cow become real-estate? When she is turned into a field.

Why are fowls the most economical things a farmer can keep? Because for every grain they take they give a peck.

Thread Cup.

THIS cup is designed for holding small balls of thread or spools of cotton, though it may be made larger and be used for worsted balls. Cut of pasteboard and violet-colored cloth from Fig. 85 five pieces of equal size; each piece, however, must reach only to the dotted line of the pattern, and a fifth of an inch must be allowed on the upper edge of the cloth pieces. Then cut five pieces of gray cloth the full size of the pattern. Embroider these as shown in the illustration in satin stitch and point russe of violet silk twist and gold cord, and border the edge as well as the under scalloped edge with button-hole stitch of violet silk. Glue the violet lining and gray outside to the pasteboard pieces in such a manner as to leave the scallops free, and join the pieces by means of a cross seam of violet silk. The scallops are furnished with a loop of crystal beads, and are fastened in the manner shown by the pattern. Between each scallop set a gretot of crystal beads. Lastly, sew the under edges of the cup part to a stand composed of a pasteboard foundation covered with violet cloth four inches in diameter, and edged with gold cord. The upper part is trimmed with beads as shown by the illustration.

Ormolu Stand for Toilette-Table.

NOTHING spoils ornaments more rapidly than leaving them exposed to the air when not absolutely in wear. This small contrivance of a bag at the top of an ormolu stand will be found very useful for depositing jewelry rather than laying it on the dressing-table. It is made of green silk, and fastened to a cardboard foundation, a ruche being added round the stand. The bag is drawn with a green cord.

ORMOU STAND FOR TOILETTE-TABLE.

Newspaper Port-folio (Application).

A STAND for this port-folio must first be procured. Our model is wicker-work of a deep straw color, and varnished. The feet and handles are wicker-work. The sides of the port-folio are cut in cardboard, and lined with blue rep; they are then decorated with appliques of palm leaves. The applique is white cloth, and commencing at the wider end of the palm there is a figure outlined or traced in gold cord, the four leaves being worked in satin stitch with scarlet silk. The three-cornered figures are satin stitches in blue silk; the remaining figures are black silk. The small white figures are chain stitches of green silk with gold beads in the centre. The handles of this basket portfolio are further decorated with blue tassels and bows of blue ribbon.

Reception, Visiting, and Bridal Dresses.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—Reception dress of lilac silk. The skirt is arranged in three puffs at the back in the manner shown in the illustration, and trimmed on the bottom with a deep flounce, surmounted with a bias fold of silk and five rows of white blonde, with the scallops pointing upward. Lappets at the side, trimmed with a bias fold of silk, white blonde, and rosette. High corsage and close sleeves, trimmed with bias folds of silk.

Fig. 2.—Visiting dress of lilac mozambique. Black lace scarf fichu, trimmed on the upper edge with a ruche à la vieille of black silk. The ends of the fichu are crossed in front and confined in the back by a black silk bow. Black lace bonnet with yellow roses.

Fig. 3.—Visiting dress of brown silk, with two puffs of the same at some distance from the bottom of the skirt, and a bow of brown satin ribbon set on the right side. Baschlik mantilla of black lace, with the ends confined at the back by a small bow. Black tulle bonnet, trimmed with black lace and brown leaves.

Fig. 4.—Bridal dress. Under-skirt of white muslin, with a deep flounce. Over-skirt of white persane, open at the left side, and trimmed with a wide puffing of the same and white blonde. Lace veil with orange blossoms.

KEEPING A CARRIAGE.

THE influence of a carriage upon the civilized mortal is something astounding. It may be doubted whether of all the social forces there is a single one which equals this in power. It elevates its possessor at once so high in the esteem of society that none are disposed to question her right to the loftiest place. "She keeps her carriage" settles doubt, removes suspicion, and stifles all inquiry into character and conduct.

Women who are ordinarily so fastidious in regard to the reputation of their associates, so nice in their investigations of social claims, and so minute in their distinctions of class, lose all discrimination before the fortunate mortal who keeps her carriage. There is many a delicate dame who will strain at obscure virtue afoot, but swallow a whole coachful of flaunting vice.

Many persons in our large cities have driven triumphantly and at once into the "best society" who could never have walked there in a lifetime. We can not cease to wonder at this extraordinary social influence of the carriage; for what is it, after all, but a painted box drawn by a pair of brute animals? The influence, however, is undoubted and irresistible.

The private vehicle, in some form or other, seems to be the standard of respectability, which is graduated according to the shape of the thing drawn or the nature and number of the beasts which draw it. A witness in a celebrated trial in England was asked what he meant by a respectable man. He answered: "One who keeps his gig." There are still lower standards than this. Each class, in fact, has its own vehicular mark of distinction. The cart and donkey, the won horse shay, and the single wagon, are enough to make their lucky possessors objects of admiration and envy, and place them in a social position relatively high to the compulsory pedestrians of their own order. The "real carriage people," as they complacently term themselves, have also their degrees of vehicular distinction. While they all look down with contempt upon a "one-horse person," they graduate their mutual consideration according to the kind and style of their respective equipages. Those worthy folks who are restricted to a sort of compromise between a close carriage and a Jersey wagon may be deemed respectable, since they drive a pair of horses, but they are by no means to be confounded with those higher-placed individuals who can indulge in a genuine specimen of each. Again, the char-a-banc, the barouche, the coupé, the landau, the dog-cart, provided they be only accessories and not principals of the establishment, are all progressive steps of advancement, bringing us to that pinnacle of social respectability, the coach and four. Here, by the curious law of compensation, extremes meet. The private carriage becomes the stage-coach, the gentleman who drives the swaggering Jehu, and the dame the outside passenger, exposed to the vulgar eye and undistinguishing dust. There are, besides the form of the vehicle and the number of horses, other distinctive marks of graduated respectability. The addition of a footman, of course, gives a superior social claim. Livery is an undoubted title to reverence, and a pair of yellow-tops in the coach-box, four well-stuffed calves in the rumble, and a display of over-coats and plated buttons from the back, are idols before which all true believers prostrate themselves in worship.

The carriage is such a power in society that every sacrifice is made to obtain it. It may be questioned whether in the large cities, where it mostly flourishes, it is ever a convenience. The hackney-coach and that democratic vehicle, the omnibus or street-railway-car, are far more available for all purposes of use. The private carriage is, in fact, striven for, obtained, and kept merely for show or the social éclat it gives to its possessor.

The physician complains of the hard necessity of driving about in a carriage in search of patients, when he can hardly afford to keep himself in shoe-leather. He is obliged, however, to submit to the expense, for if he went afoot he would be refused at every "respectable" door. It is thus that the scientific physician, who is too high-minded and conscientious to resort to ostentation and incur a cost he can not afford, often starves, while the impudent quack, with his coach and pair, makes his way into the "best society," and flourishes with an undeserved wealth and honor.

WOMEN'S HOMES.

WE hear a good many sermons nowadays from the text that the chief duty of woman is to render home attractive to her husband. No doubt any good wife will make this her crowning pleasure; but where duty is in question, there is another phase of the matter which is sadly overlooked—the duty of the husband to make home pleasant for the wife. As a very small portion of his waking hours is spent in the house, where his wife's whole life is passed, it would seem quite as important that her convenience and tastes should be consulted as his. But there is a strong disposition to regard home simply as a resting-place for the husband, and so long as he is refreshed therein very little is thought about the rest and happiness that she finds there during the remainder of the time.

In their capacity of head of the family men think that the ordering of the house naturally belongs to them. They build it to suit their own tastes and convenience, lay out the grounds according to their fancy, and manage things generally with some deference to their wife's wishes, it is true, but a great deal more to their own. And sometimes their caprices conflict woefully with the comfort of the household. We have all heard the story of the wife who was suddenly torn from her pleasant and convenient house and set down in a most desolate abode, and could assign no reason for the change except that it was the man's notion. Patient Griselda submitted to the notion of her lord and master, as it is the fashion for Griseldas to do, and was duly patted on the back and applauded for her docility; but it strikes us that there was something wrong at the root of the matter.

The home should belong to the wife; she should plan the house, arrange the furniture, lay out the garden, and order all the details. She knows from experience better than her husband can possibly do what arrangement best conduces to her housekeeping convenience. It would be just as absurd for her to undertake to be the architect of his warehouse, and to place the desks, drawers, and pigeon-holes of his counting-room, as for him to divine from his omniscience the most convenient spot for her cupboards. In the same manner, if trees are to be cut down or left standing, or flower-beds to be laid out around the house, her tastes should be first consulted, for the sight of these things must delight or chafe her all day long, while they are of very little practical consequence to the husband in the evenings, which are his chief time at home. Again, the homestead should belong to the wife in fee-simple; she has a right to the nest in which she rears her young, and ought to be assured that it can never be torn from her by those reverses of fortune to which in this country all are so liable. Women all feel this, though they are apt to lack the courage to say it; and if their comfort and convenience were once made paramount at home, and they were quite certain that the spot to which they are so often advised to confine their aspirations really belonged to them, and was wholly within their control, they would gladly assume the responsibility, and strive with much greater alacrity than they do now to force their husbands to acknowledge the ability of their generalship, and to appreciate the delights of home.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Alma-giving.

MY DEAR MR. BARNWELL,—I take great pleasure and a little pardonable pride in writing to you, for every body likes to be on familiar terms with distinguished people. Mr. Fungus, of whom you may never have heard, was very fond of saying, "My friend Daniel Webster used to remark that he preferred his beef rare;" or, "I remember that my friend Washington Irving once declared that he thought string-beans very good, but he was inclined to believe that Lima-beans were better;" or, "A man once called upon Mr. Clay, and when he left said that Henry Clay was a perfect gentleman; for when he put out the whisky-bottle for a friend, he turned his back, so as not to see how much he poured into his glass. I know the story to be true, for I had it from my friend Mr. Clay's own lips, who was greatly amused by it." When Fungus came home from Europe he had so much to say of his friend Gladstone, and his friend Laboulaye, and his friend Garibaldi, that he was known altogether by the nick-name of "My friend." We all laughed at him good-humoredly in private, and none more heartily than those who did the same thing more delicately.

Indeed, what is this but snobbishness? And does not the great historian of snobs himself confess that he will not disguise how satisfied he should be to be seen walking down Pall Mall with a duke on each arm? The other day I was talking with Don Pompo, who prides himself upon his Spanish descent, and who steps so very high in consequence that, although he is merely John Pump, we have insensibly come to calling him, and not without great gratification to himself, Don Pompo—I was talking with him, I say, upon the subject of custard, whether it should be baked or not, when Don Pompo said to his daughter, "My dear, go and bring me my file of letters from Mr. Cooper." When they were brought he said, "My friend Cooper and I had a similar difference upon the custard question, and he wrote me a very pleasant letter, which I should like to have you read." He handed me the letter, which began, "My dear Pump," and proceeded in a familiar strain of badinage, giving, I ought to say, the weight of his judgment to the baked rather than the boiled custard. "You see," said the Don, "my friend Cooper was of your mind." Yes, I saw that, and Pompo had also dextrously shown me upon what intimate relations he stood with the famous novelist. The sly fellow knew that I should esteem him the more highly for that association.

I suppose it is from the inspiration of this same feeling that I take pride in writing to you; and I wonder whether I could possibly reproduce Don Pompo's air in mentioning his friend Cooper if some one should ask me if I knew George Barnwell, and I should say, "Oh yes, we correspond!" There are a great many persons, and very respectable and worthy they are, who, if they should know that I was the correspondent of the great merchant, George Barnwell, would at once feel that they had been mistaken in their estimate of me. "Why," they would say, "we had always thought old Mr. Bachelor a mild, moony, impracticable but harmless old gentleman; but, good gracious, there must be something in him, for he is a correspondent of George Barnwell's!" It is so difficult to resist a general judgment. When I was a young man in Italy I was one day at the studio of our most famous native painter of the day, then resident in Rome. He had been telling me of the people who came to see him, and among the rest mentioned a Mr. Bryant, whom he described as "a pleasant enough young man, rather silent." But the name struck me, and I exclaimed so ardently that it might be Bryant the poet, the one man whom I had hoped to encounter somewhere in Europe, as I knew he was then traveling, that the painter, who had considered him merely Mr. Bryant, an American traveler, was very much excited, and calling his wife, said: "My dear, I am going to invite my friend Mr. Bryant to dinner to-morrow, and we'll put the best foot foremost, if you please." Upon my warm statement that Bryant was a famous poet the good painter felt abashed that he had not known it, accepted my ardor as the assurance of a settled renown, and instinctively associated himself with it by talking about "my friend."

This, however, my dear Sir, is a long introduction to the subject of my letter, which is this. Some of your customers, conscious that they have not paid you the real worth of the goods which they have bought of you, propose to call upon you next Tuesday evening, and some will bring you a cane; and others a ham to boil; and others a feather-bed; and others a pound of sugar; and others a door-mat; and others a ton of coal; and others a box of prunes; and others a kettle of yeast; and others—well, really, I do not know what they will not bring—so vast is their generosity, and all as gifts! They are to be your own and Mrs. Barnwell's. Think of that! You can eat the sugar and the ham, and warm yourselves with the coal, and raise your bread with the yeast, and sleep on the feather-bed. And the next day you will have the satisfaction of reading in the paper a full account of the whole proceeding, detailing the various gifts, and mentioning their money value. Now, my dear Barnwell will of course be humbly grateful, because in the case of ordinary paupers this is not done. We give them a pound of tea or of sugar, or a few dollars, and say nothing about it. But we publish you. Yes, and we expect a neat little speech of gratitude from you, which shall also be printed, and which will inform the reader what very generous and noble friends you have.

I hope that you are not bewildered by what I tell you. But if you understand it, and declare that if any body comes to insult you in this way you will kick them out of the house, I beg you to remember what Nathan said unto David. For I think I am not mistaken in thinking that I saw your name signed to a call for a donation party to the good clergyman of the country parish in which you pass a few summer weeks. What has he done that you should exhibit him as a public pauper? If any body wants to give a faithful man, a neighbor, and friend, and good citizen, a barrel of flour or a dozen of Scotch mutton-bone. Amen!

It is a praiseworthy generosity, and if it were practiced upon me I should be humbly grateful. Indeed, I hereby give public notice that if any friend thinks fit to send privately to Mr. Bachelor a good book, or picture, or fish, or basket of fruit, grapes or other, now in season, Mr. Bachelor will very highly approve the proceeding, will gratefully consume the bounty, and will solemnly promise to say nothing about it. Send a sound horse to your doctor, send a superb sirloin to your minister; do it often, and you will do a good deed.

But when your customers say to you, my dear Mr. Barnwell, that, conscious of not having paid you your honest dues, they will make them up by what they call gifts, which they will cause to redound to their own glory, then I confess that I should feel very much disposed to come and help you show them the door in that emphatic manner of which I have spoken. When you go into the pleasant country where you pass the summer, and where your good-nature leads you to sign such a paper as that proposing a donation party, say to your neighbors, "My friends, the laborer is worthy of his hire. I employ many clerks, and I pay them honest and sufficient wages; and if at Thanksgiving I beg them to accept a turkey and on the 4th of July a heaping basket of strawberries, it is from friendly feeling, and not because of any consciousness that I keep them upon starvation wages. I don't do it to eke out their salaries. But when I come here and see the hardest working man among you with a salary of seven hundred dollars a year, and observe that every year or two you descend upon him in a body with the necessities of life, or still oftener with a purse of money, I know that it is because your consciences prick you. You know that you are keeping him upon starvation wages. The rule is simple. Give your minister enough to live upon as he ought to live, and leave the rest as it is left in the case of every body else, to individual generosity."

There is nobody for whom my pity is more excited than the shy scholar, as he so often is, the country clergyman. In the loveliest village of the Irish plain, a hundred years ago, he may have been "passing rich with forty pounds a year." But this is not a hundred years ago, and I never knew but one clergyman who was passing rich. When some rural brother walked with him around his beautiful estate, lost in delight and apprehension, he exclaimed, "Oh, brother Samuel, all this and heaven too!" The clergyman is regarded from that point of view. He is sure of heaven, so he must not enjoy the earth. He may leave that to us sinners, who are not quite sure of what is in store for us. And he must be the servant of every body, not only in the ordinary parochial round of duties, but in the general public work of the town. Who so fit for chairman of the school committee? Who so proper a speaker for the anniversary meeting of the Mothers'-Small-Clothes? Indeed, who so just the person for every thing that is to be done, if it involves intellectual work and no payment, as the clergyman? He must live in the public eye, and satisfy the public expectation in conduct and costume. Every silly old woman of both sexes sits in judgment upon him with an impertinent familiarity that would be very summarily repulsed in the case of any one else. What confidences he is forced to receive! What weak pious deliriums and fantastic fancies he must postpone his studies to hear! I wonder how many of the youth who look out from Princeton or Andover or Cambridge or Newton and dream of the green meadows and still waters by which they are presently to lead their gentle flocks reflect upon the extraordinary whims of sheep. The most wonderful of all is the ostentatious assurance with which they present the shepherd a leg of mutton, and publish it to their own praise.

I say, Mr. Barnwell, until you are willing to have part of the just price of your goods offered to you as alms, you ought not to connive at a self-glorifying donation party to increase the income of your minister. If it is really needed you have no right to make it a charity. If it be not needed, then be as generous as you will, but not in so suspicious and ignoble a manner.

Your obedient servant,

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

DRESS GOODS.

WITH the breaking up of warm weather the shop windows are draped with bright-hued goods for autumn, a few of which we have described in advance, from preliminary glimpses obtained at the wholesale houses. In examining the complete stock at our leisure we have been especially pleased with a superior black silk called cashmere de soie. This is a corded silk, rich and heavy, yet as soft and pliant as cashmere. It has a fine lustre and an intense blackness, obtained by a peculiar dye, the secret of which is known only to a few persons. It is in two widths; that at $5 50 a yard is twenty-seven inches wide; another at $7 50 measures thirty-two inches.

The Parisian taffeta of beautiful lustre, and all pure silk, is largely imported. The revival of this goods, so long out of use, will be a cause of congratulation to all who have worn it. It will outwear the best gros grain, and always looks fresh and new, as there are no cords to fray or catch the dust. A superfine quality costs from $3 to $3 75 a yard. An excellent article is sold at $2 50. Black poult de soie is heavily brocaded. This is suitable for elderly ladies. The styles do not differ from last season, except that the brocaded figures are smaller. The average price is $5 a yard. A thick black satin is brocaded with shaded autumn leaves, with the leaf-shadow reflected beside it. Price $185 for the dress pattern. Striped satins of the gay Roman colors, like the scarfs worn by gentlemen, scarlet, yellow, and black, or blue, green, and gold together, are imported for petticoats at $5 a yard. Stripes of two colors, something bright with black or white, are sold at $3 a yard.

The changeable and striped silks are shown in profusion. Soft rich ponsons in single shades are in the whole range of dark colors at $6 a yard.

EVENING DRESSES.

A line of ponsons in delicate tints, turquoise-blue, pearl-color, and Florence green, that require gas-light to develop their beauty, are displayed for evening dresses. The variations of color in the light, changeable silks are marvelous. Maize and scarlet enter into almost every combination. Black and a purple shade called Marguerite combine with gay hues. An elegant reception dress is of pearl-colored gros grain, with brocaded crescent leaves of maize and white. The dress pattern is marked $175. A blue of purest azure has clusters of elder flowers embroidered in silver and gilt.

White will continue in favor for evening. White tarlatan robes are the newest thin dresses. These are in good taste and inexpensive, varying from $12 to $25 in price. There are floral designs on the front widths of embroidery in one color—green, blue, or purple—with rouleaux of grape on the side seams and bordering the skirt. Garniture of embroidery and crape for the waist and sleeves. Another pattern has wheat-ears of crape, while on a third are folds of maize-colored silk worked with a feathered edge in black, and finished with black lace.

POPLINS, ETC.

Pyne's Irish poplin, always considered the best, is shown in changeable effects at $3 a yard. While the chameleon hues are most novel, single shades in the new bright garnet and green are stylish and desirable. These are $2 75 a yard. Pongee poplin, a light fall material of silk and wool, heavier than that worn in the summer, is sold at $1 75 a yard, double fold. It may be had in grave colors or in gay combinations. Glacé poplin at the same price is suitable for mid-winter. Striped poplin, with both sides alike, is chosen for petticoats. Price $1 12½ a yard. Heavy Russian skirting in broad stripes of black with gold or purple is five quarters wide at $1 a yard, a stylish and serviceable material. Epingle and crape Eugenie, rough-surfaced goods no longer new, are imported in stripes and changing colors at $2. The velours are ribbed diagonally, and instead of one solid color, four are combined, producing a beautiful glacé effect. On a green and gold ground are broad bias reps of green and scarlet. Gold and black is especially handsome in this elegant fabric. The price is from $2 25 to $2 75 a yard. A cheap article of serge, in striped and changeable patterns, is mixed linen and wool at $1 a yard. At a little distance it would be mistaken for silk. A new silk-finished winsey, resembling poplin, but not so perishable, is $2 25 a yard. The all-wool plaids are very reasonable this season, the best article costing $1 50 a yard. An inferior plaid slightly mixed with cotton is $1 25.

MORNING ROBES.

Cashmere robes de chambre are in bright, warm grounds, poppy-red, garnet, green, or black, with gay cashmere borders in which yellow predominates. The border extends around the skirt and up the front widths. The robe is worn flowing loosely from the shoulders, unconfined by a belt. Flowing sleeves are represented on the diagrams that accompany each pattern, with narrow borders for trimming. The price ranges from $15 to $24. Cashmeres sold by the yard at $1 75 have white or scarlet grounds with wide-spreading figures and palm leaves.

CLOAKINGS.

Silk plush will be worn again for fancy sacques. It is imported in every shade of color. The fancy plushes are a yard and a half wide at $20. Purple, gray, and white are blended together; the cloth purple, the pile gray and black, giving a changeable effect. Worsteds plush is $13 a yard. White Astrakhan cloth, an excellent imitation of the real lamb-skin, is $20 a yard. It is almost two yards wide. A soft white plush, worsted back with silk pile, is sold at $15. Ermine cloth, white plush spotted with black, is handsome for evening wraps, and will be much used for trimming children's cloaks. Among the darker goods is a cut Astrakhan, smooth instead of curled pile, of the new bear's-ear garnet, $16. A frosted beaver of rare thickness is a golden brown shade. Price $9 a yard. The curled cloths and beavers, white spotted with blue or scarlet, are admired for children. Plaid cloakings for fall wraps are $3 75 a yard. The winter stock of ready-made cloaks is not completed. From imported models and patterns shown us we discover that the prevailing styles are longer than those of last season. Designers say from four to six inches is the added length. They are nearly tight-fitting. Sashes are abandoned abroad, but will probably be worn here during another season. Wide-spreading fan-shaped bows and knots are arranged in an ingenious manner.

DRESSES.

Many of the leading New York modistes are still in Paris, and we defer speaking at length on the making-up of dresses till their return. We hear from abroad that long pointed waists are to be revived. These are already worn in Paris, and serve with paniers to make the waist look exceedingly small. This is the finishing stroke which completes the resemblance of the dress of our day to that of the French marquises of the old régime. Short skirts barely escape the ground. Sleeves are no longer plain, but very much puffed and frilled. Lace as a trimming will be greatly worn. Valenciennes is especially suited to the Pompadour silks—light grounds brocaded with gay medallions. Bright red dresses of the flaming Sultan color are in special favor with Parisian blondes. A Mexican material called Laintown, half wool and half silk, of a glowing poppy-red color, is much used for fall costumes at French chateaux. The Empress, it is said, is determined to set the example of simplicity in dress, and thereby inaugurate an era of economy in matters of toilette. She made simple batistes and striped cambrics fashionable during warm weather; and now that fall has come she delights in self-colored cashmeres, a simple and inexpensive material. It is necessary that this goods be artistically made and trimmed to be effective, after the elaborate costumes to which we have become accustomed. An imported costume of ashes of roses cashmere has a straight flounce on the lower skirt. The fullness is arranged in box-pleats at wide intervals, with passementerie ornaments between the pleats. The apron front of the tunic is trimmed with cross-cut satin bands descending from the belt to vandyked points at the edge trimmed with fringe. The back is in panier puffs. Scarf mantilla with square lappets under a belt in front and looped with a passementerie rosette behind.

CALICOES AND MUSLIN.

Calicoes remain at the reasonable prices of the summer. Hoyle's double purple, in small figures and stripes, is three shillings a yard. Pacific Mills and Sprague's prints are fourteen cents; Merrimac D. is the same price; and a better quality, known as Merrimac W., is seventeen cents. A bleached muslin, dubbed night-gown muslin, is appropriately named. It is a strong, heavy goods, but very soft, and entirely without dressing. It is a yard wide, at twenty-five cents. New York Mills shirting, the standard favorite, is retailed at twenty-eight cents. Wamsutta, a popular brand for general use, is twenty-five cents, Kearsarge twenty, and Lonsdale eighteen. The fine Lonsdale cambric for petticoats is twenty-eight cents. A very fair muslin, known as the Branch Mills, is a yard wide, sold at a shilling. Heavy Utica Mills sheeting, two and a half yards wide, is seventy cents.

UNDER-LINEN.

The European custom of ordering outfits of under-linen is fast being adopted here. The plan is a good one in many respects, as competent needle-women who sew by the week are difficult to find, and nicety of fit and artistic trimming are as desirable in under-clothing as in outside garments. Imported lingerie is always expensive, as French seamstresses do not use the sewing-machine, but in New York establishments machine-made garments are sold at very little advance on the price of the material. We have seen ordinary muslin skirts gored for short dresses, with a group of tucks above the hem, sold at $1 50. If Wamsutta or New York Mills is used the price is $3. Diagonal tucks, puffs, ruffles, and embroidery trim the more elaborate garments, and increase the expense. Plain chemises with straight bands strengthened by cords neatly stitched in the centre, the upper part of the body tucked in the shape of a yoke, are $2 50. Drawers to match are $2. If scallops and embroidery in vines are added the price reaches $6, or perhaps a trifle more. In the embroidery stores the same amount is asked for the bands and sleeves alone. Yoked gowns with three widths of muslin slightly gored are the favorite shape, as they conceal the figure, and yet are not full enough to be clumsy. These are embroidered and ruffled around the neck and sleeves, and sold at $6. Short peignoirs have the fronts tucked perpendicularly or in yokes, with cambric ruffles very narrow and fluted, or strong Valenciennes borders. The loose coat-sleeve with deep cuff is appropriate. Standing collar, or the all around turned-down shape.

An elegant pair of pillow-covers recently shown us does not come under the head of plain lingerie, but are too handsome to be omitted. They were perfectly square, formed of smaller squares of blue satin alternating with white guipure lace; a border of guipure around the edge. The price is $50. A bed-spread not yet completed will be of the same design.

PERSONAL.

MISS FANNY FORBES, a daughter of PAUL S. FORBES, Esq., of this city, is announced, in Paris, as being engaged to marry M. ODILON BARROT, nephew of the distinguished Senator of that name.

—The Rev. Mr. SPURGEON is reported, in English journals, as having engaged to deliver a series of lectures in this country during the present year. Mr. S. would be a great success. His reputation as an orator would cause every body to run after him; and as for the Baptists, water certainly would be powerless to extinguish their enthusiasm for him.

—An inquisitive person of New England having, with the characteristic pertinacity of that people, sought to find out all that was find-outable of the two principal Mandarins ranking next to Mr. BURLINGAME in the Chinese Embassy, feels free to communicate that CHIN TAJEN and SUN TAJEN are known in China as gentlemen of the highest culture and accomplishments, and were especially selected by the Emperor for this mission on account of their profound learning and abilities. Mental acquirements are not only more thought of in China than with us, but are imperatively required of all who are intrusted with affairs of the government. "Rings," caucuses, and conventions are not yet in vogue in the "Flowery Nation."

—Mrs. SCOTT SIDONS (a descendant of the SIDONS), who has achieved distinction on the English stage, has made quite a hit at Newport as a reader. One evening last week she read TENNYSON's May Queen with such effect as to bring many little waters from the eyes of the ladies who were present. She will come to New York by-and-by, to see how pathos will do here.

—"Mlle." IRMA, as she is announced on the bills, the prima donna of Mr. BATEMAN's operatic company, is "Mlle." only on the stage; off she is the wife of M. COLON, and mother of two children—little semi-colons, as it were.

—His Royal Highness Prince WILHELM WURTEMBERG, general in the Austrian army, has been spending some days in the city, and been made the recipient of many courtesies from people of position. It was fortunate for him that a gentleman so thoroughly conversant with every thing worth seeing and every body worth knowing, in New York, as the Austrian Consul-General, Mr. DE LOOSE, was at hand to suggest the how, the when, and the where to pass the time pleasantly and profitably. His Royal Highness has gone to the West for a tour of five or six weeks.

—Colonel T. B. THORPE, an intimate friend of the late CHARLES L. ELLIOTT, suggests that an exhibition of the paintings of the great artist be given, the proceeds to be devoted to the erection of a monument. ELLIOTT was, beyond doubt, the best portraitist this country has produced. GILBERT STUART's faces were fine, but not so strong. Some of COPELEY's earlier portraits were perhaps as good, but none better.

—M. ROEST VAN LIMBURG has been appointed Minister for Foreign Affairs at the Hague. M. VAN LIMBURG was formerly Minister of the Hague at Washington, and while in that position became enamored of and married Miss BELLE CASS, daughter of the late LEWIS CASS.

—The Right Hon. ROBERT LOWE, whose great ability as an editorial writer on the London Times, and equally great ability as a debater in Parliament, has just appeared in a new character, viz., as Chairman of the London Board of the new Atlantic Telegraph Company.

—Mr. BAYARD TAYLOR and lady returned last week from Europe, where he has been spending a year or so pleasantly, dining and breakfasting with the second-rate kings and first-rate grand-dukes of the Continent; visiting out-of-the-way places, and writing clever letters to the Tribune.

—Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER has made a little statement on the Coffee (not Cuffee) question, which the readers of the Bazar may ponder: "The best way I know of to make good coffee is to go to the principal hotels, restaurants, railroad eating-houses, etc., and ascertain just how they make coffee—then make it as they don't."

—Princess DAGMAR—known in the court circles of Europe as the Pretty Princess—writes very graceful sonnets, and is not disposed to hang her harp on a willow, even though she is married.

—TENNYSON "realizes" about $35,000 a year, gold, from his writings, likes to make money, and knows how to keep it. So does our poet, LONGFELLOW, though his figures have not yet attained to the comfortable size of the English gentleman's.

—Dr. BARSTOW and wife, of Keene, New Hampshire, celebrated their golden wedding on the 19th of August last. During their half century of married life this couple have never removed from the house where they first began house-keeping, and which was the scene of the touching and thankful festivities of their golden wedding.

—Mr. MARK LEMON, the editor of Punch, has at last yielded to the importunities of friends and managers, and will soon appear as a reader of "Falstaff." The performances are not to take place in any theatre, but will belong to the class of amusements recognized as entertainments, although the action and costume of a stage-play will be in part retained.

—Ex-Secretary of the Navy JOHN P. KENNEDY, with his family, is passing a few weeks at Hombourg-les-Bains. Mrs. ELLEN KEY BLUNT has been giving readings at the same place.

—A daughter of G. P. R. JAMES, the novelist, has adopted the stage as a profession, and on the 30th of May last made her début in a Melbourne theatre in the drama of the "Willow Copse." She was not very successful, and the impression seemed to be that she had entirely mistaken her vocation. Her acting name is Mrs. FLORENCE WILLIAMS, and she has a fine commanding figure.

—Mr. GEORGE PEABODY has temporarily ceased from giving away his millions, and gone to Enniskillen to be entertained by Sir JAMES EMERSON TENNANT and Lady TENNANT, and a very agreeable tenant he will make of himself.

—M. AUER is becoming a wag in his old age. Recently he entertained a party of friends at his house. During the convivialities a white hair fell from the venerable head of the maestro into a glass of Bordeaux which stood before him. "Ah, gentlemen!" exclaimed the renowned composer, taking out the silver hair with his fingers, and holding it up, "you can not say my wine wants age, for here you see is one of its gray hairs."

—Rural readers of the Bazar may form some idea of the magnitude of stock operations in Wall Street, when we inform them that on the 3d instant Mr. WOODWARD sold, and Mr. JOHN M. TOBIN bought, 14,600 shares of stock of the Chicago and Rock Island Company at 103½—the purchase-money amounting to $1,460,474 50. Mr. TOBIN is said to have been a heavy seller at higher prices, while Mr. WOODWARD is supposed to have all the stock on hand. Both gentlemen are large professional operators, and wager their millions as other men do their pennies. There are not, however, nor never will there be, at the Stock Exchange, any quotations for those two best-paying of all stocks—happiness and comfort. Those are not on the regular list.

—Miss AUGUSTA J. EVANS, of Mobile, the distinguished and favorite authoress of the South, was in town a few days since, having come North with her father, whose health was infirm, to consult some of the more prominent members of the medical faculty. They advised an immediate return, and she acted promptly on the advice, Commodore VANDERBILT generously placing at her disposal a car on the Hudson River and New York Central roads, besides commending her to the courtesies of railway officials further west. While in New York Miss EVANS received a portion of the amount due her on the copyright of her novel of "Inez," out of which she paid the premium on her father's life insurance policy of ten thousand dollars, which was wise, as Mr. EVANS only lived to reach Chicago.

—The Rev. CHARLES F. ROBERTSON, of Malone, Franklin County, New York, has been elected Bishop of Missouri, in place of the late Bishop HAWES. Mr. ROBERTSON's name has been mentioned in connection with the new diocese of Central New York, to be formed, in November next, out of the eastern portion of the diocese of Western New York. Mr. ROBERTSON is spoken of as possessing, in a high degree, the peculiar administrative ability required for that position, and is, moreover, an excellent preacher and an excellent man.

—Dr. NELATON has been made a Senator of France, the first time that an operative representative of the medical profession has received such an honor in that country. Count DE SARTIGES, minister at Rome, and formerly the representative of France at Washington, was at the same time made the recipient of senatorial distinction.

—Only one of Queen VICTORIA's daughters is said to be remarkable for personal beauty—the Princess LOUISE. She is fair, tall, and graceful, with well-cut features, a pensive cast of countenance, and blue, German eyes. Her walk is singularly distingué. Her youngest sister is said to be plain, pert, and self-conscious.

—When a queen of Madagascar dies it costs a little something to defray the requisite ceremonies. The last one was buried in a silver coffin worth $30,000, and a box of coin, which it took fifteen men to carry, was buried with her. The mourning requires all her subjects to shave their heads and go barefoot for ninety days. They must also sleep on the ground, and do no work during that time.

—The Rev. Dr. CUYLER, of Brooklyn, is the oldest regular visitor at Saratoga, having done the waters there for over twenty years, and preached to the waters seventy-one sermons.

—ALEXANDRE DUMAS lives an odd and very French life—goes to bed at four in the morning, rises at noon, breakfasts at noon, lunches at five, dines sumptuously at eight, sups at midnight; drinks little wine—generally two or three glasses of Burgundy at dinner. Works about nine hours a day, and generally furnishes to the printer daily ten large sheets, written in a beautiful, flowing hand, and almost entirely free from corrections and alterations.

—"I think there be five LELANDS in the field," the fifth being CHARLES E., for whom the United States Hotel, at Saratoga Springs, is to be rebuilt. It will be the largest hotel in the world, and will accommodate a population of sixteen hundred souls. It is to be a stock-company concern, with a capital of $800,000 to $1,000,000. It has been remarked that each of the male LELANDS was born with a hotel license in each hand.

—To their shame be it said that MICHAEL ANGELO, BOYLE, NEWTON, LOCKE, BAYLE, SHENSTONE, LEIBNITZ, HOBBS, VOLTAIRE, POPE, ADAM SMITH, THOMSON, AKENSIDE, ARBUTHNOT, HUME, GIBSON, COWPER, GOLDSMITH, LAMB, WASHINGTON IRVING, and HALLECK, were bachelors.

—Mr. JOHN D. DEFREES, formerly printer to the House of Representatives, was many years ago proprietor of the Indianapolis State Journal. When the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, then on the eve of his ministerial life, came to Indianapolis, with his new wife, his temporal prospects were not very brilliant. His church had agreed to pay him $1000 a year, but was unable to raise it promptly, so he eked out a little time by writing and editing a farmers' and gardeners' column for the Journal. This column became, directly, so popular, that Defrees started an agricultural paper and made BEECHER the editor of it. It was at Indianapolis that Mrs. STOWE visited her brother, and there, it is said, obtained the name and suggestion of Uncle Tom's Cabin, which she derived from a venerable negro, once enslaved, who had a hut near the city, dubbed, by general consent, "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

—Madame PAREPA ROSA is in such poor health that her friends are quite alarmed about her. The California doctors have ordered her to cease professional work and go to the White Sulphur Springs.

—The personal changes in professional and business life, constantly going on in New York, are made the subject of an interesting communication in a Rochester paper, in which it is mentioned that NATHAN D. MORGAN, who commenced life as a retailer of dry-goods in Brooklyn, is now president of a life insurance company. HENRY C. BOWEN, who was bred amidst silks and satins, and who for so many years was at the head of the firm of BOWEN & M'NAMEE, is now a publisher and issues the Independent. JOHN MASON, who a few years ago was one of our heaviest dry-goods men, was originally a tailor; and the clothiers BROOKS BROTHERS, who own a million dollars' worth of real estate, began with the needle. VANDERBILT himself once sailed a periauger, which now seems a very petty business, and DANIEL DREW kept a drovers' tavern.

We Americans will not stay put, as they say, and men are continually flitting from one trade to another. Sometimes an entire mercantile house will make a somersault, as in the case of COMAN, HOPKINS, & Co., who shifted from the wholesale dry-goods to the wholesale grocery trade, and made a fortune in the latter. In the same manner SHELTON & Co. exchanged the dry-goods for the book trade, and are now among our leading publishers. The same changes appear in our professions. PHILIP REYNOLDS, who was one of our most successful lawyers, began life as a tailor, then became an editor, and subsequently pursued law. Dr. BAYARD, who is one of the first physicians in the city, practiced law up to his fortieth year, and then made a successful exchange for medicine. Even the clerical profession shows similar features. The late Dr. CONE was at first a play-actor. MAGOON was a stone-mason. The eloquent JONES was a sailor. EZEKIEL LORD was a lawyer. On the other hand, E. W. ANDREWS, once pastor of the Broadway Tabernacle, exchanged his sacred calling for the law; and a number of other clergymen have gone into the insurance business.

Button-Holes for Under-Clothing.

THE specimens of button-holes given are pretty, and especially commendable on account of their durability. Each stitch is described in detail. Figs. 1 and 2 show different ways of barring before working. The barring is done before cutting, and may be done either by running around the button-hole, as shown by Fig. 1, or with chain stitch, as shown by Fig. 2. In the detailed descriptions this is not mentioned.

Fig. 1.—BARRING OF BUTTON-HOLE.

Figs. 3 and 4.—Button-hole in button-hole stitch points. This is worked with long button-hole stitches, each of which is fastened by a shorter stitch. Work, first, a long stitch, of which Fig. 4 shows the thread and the needle, then from left to right take a short stitch in the manner indicated by the needle in Fig. 11.

Figs. 5 and 6.—Herring-bone stitch button-hole. The manner of making this stitch is familiar, and is given also by Fig. 6. Make a cross chain stitch, and one stitch putting the needle downward as shown by Fig. 2, the other in the opposite direction or upward, taking in the edge of the material. Having completed the herring bone stitch row, work inside of this a row in common button-hole stitch.

The button-hole with knotted finish, Figs. 7, 8, and 9, is very pretty. Make, first, an ordinary button-hole stitch, then lay the thread outward and bring the thread again through the loop in the manner shown by Fig. 8. The finished round is ornamented with a row of knots, which are worked in the manner shown by Fig. 9.

Figs. 10 and 11 give a button-hole worked in double button-hole stitch. For making this stitch work, first, a common long button-hole stitch, and on this a shorter stitch sideways from left to right as shown by Fig. 11.

For the button-hole, Figs. 12 and 13, which is worked in tatted button-hole stitch, lay a cord under instead of barring; having cut the button-hole, overseam this cord to the edge. The stitch is worked after Fig. 13, being careful to follow the thread of the material. Fig. 13 gives the stitch without the cord in order to render it plainer.

Figs. 14 and 15 give a very pretty button-hole in twisted stitch. Having run the needle through, as shown by Fig. 15, wind it from seven to eight times with the thread, after which draw the needle and thread through, pressing the twisted thread down on the right side, and run the needle back through the same place through which the stitch was taken preparatory to taking the next stitch.

Buttons for Under-Clothing.

It is well worth while to take the trouble of making these buttons, for they are both prettier and much more durable than those that are purchased. They are all worked with fine thread.

Figs. 1 and 2.—Flat button crocheted. For this button work, first, beginning at the middle, seven rounds in single crochet in the round, in doing which crochet from left to right, as shown by Fig. 2, which shows the crochet work magnified. In the second of these seven rounds crochet always two stitches in one of the former round. The next following (8th) round is worked in single crochet like the others, but a brass ring of the requisite thickness must be covered by it. In working this work two stitches in every second following stitch of the former round. The under side of the work is the right side of the button.

Fig. 9.—MAKING OF KNOT FOR BUTTON-HOLE.

Figs. 3 and 4 show how to re-cover the foundation of a worn-out button with little trouble. Take the ring, lay it between two circular pieces of linen of equal size, and fasten the outer edge with a few overcast stitches, after which work as shown by Fig. 4, which is magnified, and shows a piece of the linen turned back.

The button shown by Figs. 5 and 6 is worked in single crochet, and is especially commendable, as it can be washed without injury. Work from the centre outward first, three rounds in the round over a four-chet the following round: * one single crochet between the first two cross stitches, seven chain, one double crochet in the first of the seven chain. Repeat from *. Now work the open-work foundation in point de reprise as shown by the illustrations, bind the under edge with a narrow bias strip of fine linen, and finish the front with buttons and button-hole stitch loops.

Crochet Edge for Coverlets.

THIS edge is especially designed for trimming for coverlets, though it may also be used for other purposes. The pattern is crocheted on the edge of the coverlet, which has previously been worked in button-hole dition of cord, adding a few stitches in every round. Then crochet without cord and with the requisite widening two rounds, after which two rounds with the same number of stitches, and finally the 5th and 6th rounds, in which narrow sufficiently. The working thread may serve for sewing on the button. Fig. 5 shows the upper, and Fig. 6 the under side of the button.

Towel Loops.

THESE loops are greatly to be commended for their durability.

The crochet loop, Fig. 1, is worked with fine cotton. Make, first, a foundation of 36 chain, and, having joined this in a round by means of a slip stitch, 20 chain more; passing over the last of these, work back on these chain stitches and around the loop, and on the other side of the chain stitches a round single crochet, and on this, backward and forward, three additional rounds in the same manner. A few stitches must be added around the upper rounding of the loop, as shown by the pattern.

Fig. 2.—BARRING OF BUTTON-HOLE.

For the loop, Fig. 2, which is also worked with fine thread but crosswise, cast on nine stitches, and, passing over the first stitch, work backward on these one round single crochet, after which thirty-eight similar rounds backward and forward, always putting the needle through the upper vein of the stitches; also crochet a chain stitch at the end of every round. After this edge the loop with little scallops of white and red cotton as follows: one red stitch in an edge stitch, three white stitches in the following edge stitch. Finish the red stitches with the white thread, and the last of the white stitches with the red yarn.

The loop, Fig. 3, is made of a strip of linen an inch wide and as long as may be desired. Double this and sew down the edges, after which work it round in button-hole stitch in white thread and then once with red thread, making the two colors alternate.

Crochet Chemise Yoke.

THIS yoke is crocheted in open-work foundation, and worked in point de reprise with medium coarse white thread.

The illustration, which shows a section of the open-work foundation in full size, shows also the design and the manner of working. The form of the yoke is given by Fig. 65, Supplement, and must be carefully followed in crocheting. Begin on the under edge of the front with the requisite number of stitches (in the pattern 16), and crochet on these alternately one double crochet, two chain passing over two stitches. The entire yoke is worked in this manner, double crochet always coming on double crochet; the rounds must also always be begun from the same side, and widened or narrowed to suit the form; the fronts are straight. Having completed the foundation, border the yoke on the upper edge and on the fronts with two rounds of single crochet (in the first of these rounds crochet around the projecting threads). The rounds double crossed crochet follow; the crossed crochet have two stitches space, and must lie one over another. On the upper corner of the yoke the under veins of the crossed stitches must lie close together, so that the yoke shall not be stretched. On the last round of cross stitches crochet the following round: * one single crochet between the first two cross

Crochet Edge for Coverlets.

THIS edge is especially designed for trimming for coverlets, though it may also be used for other purposes. The pattern is crocheted on the edge of the coverlet, which has previously been worked in button-hole stitch. Of course the edge may also be worked on a chain stitch foundation. According to the pattern crochet: 1st round.—2 sc. (single crochet) separated by 1 ch. (chain stitch) in the middle of the first button-hole-stitch scallop, 11 ch. of the last six of which form a picot by working 1 sc. in the fifth of the eleven, 5 ch.; 2 sc. separated by 1 ch. in the following button-hole-stitch scallop, etc. 2d round.—1 sc. in the ch. between the first 2 sc. of the former round, * 3 sc. in the next ch., 12 double crochet around the picot, 3 sc. in the following ch., 1 sc. in the ch. between the next 2 sc. of the former round. Repeat from *. Repeat these rounds twice, and in such a manner that the shells shall alternate as shown by the illustration.

Needle-Worked Figures for Trimming Lingerie and Under-Clothing.

THESE figures are embroidered on muslin, Swiss muslin, piqué, etc. They are suitable for trimming blouses, collars, cuffs, and pin-cushion covers, as well as under-clothing. The lightest parts of each design are in appliqué. The black stitches are worked with black silk in the manner shown by the illustration. The stitches used are straight and diagonal half-polka stitch, button-hole stitch, knotted stitch, satin stitch, lace stitch, and common back stitch.

ner, taking care to work the sc. around the picot of the former round, as is shown by the illustration.

The hem to which the pattern of Fig. 2 is crocheted is worked with a row of herring-bone stitch. The edging consists of three pointed rows, which are worked in three rounds as follows: 1st round.—1 sc. in the hem, * 4 ch., pass over the last of these; going back on the remaining, 1 sc., 1 short treble crochet, 1 dc., and, passing over the requisite space, repeat from *. Now work two more rounds in the same manner, taking care always to work the single crochet in the point of the preceding round.

Chemise Yoke.

THE straight front of this yoke, which is two inches and a half wide, the straight back, which is an inch and a quarter wide, and the shoulders of the same width are all worked together.

Having cut the yoke of linen in this manner, draw out threads at regular distances each way, so that small squares shall be formed (see Fig. 2, which gives a section of the yoke of the full size). Now fasten the corners and spaces between in the manner shown by the illustration, and work in the centre of each square four knots. Scallop the outer edges, and work with button-hole stitch; as a heading for which work a straight row in button-hole stitch.

THE SECRET OF ECONOMY.

WE will suppose that a mistress, desirous of keeping within her allowance without curtailing the real comfort of her husband and children, has asked herself that simple question—"Can we do without it?" on more than one occasion, and found it answer, in so far that, though several superfluities, such as dessert after dinner and preserves and cakes for tea, have disappeared, all the solid necessities remain, and the weekly bills are no longer higher than they ought to be. How should she act in order to keep down her expenditure to a settled sum; to be sure that as much, but no more than is needful, is used, in the kitchen, the dining-room, and the nursery; and yet to prevent her servants resenting her interference, or exclaiming at her meanness?

It is really very easy, if women would only believe it to be so. It needs no store-room full of hoarded goods, with the key of which the servants are more familiar than yourself; no stated times for measuring out half pounds of sugar and dispensing tea by ounces; no running down to the lower regions a dozen times a day to give out what may have been forgotten; or to satisfy one's self whether they really do cut the joint at the kitchen supper, or Trimmings for Under-Clothing.

THESE trimmings here given are used for the most diverse objects. Some are designed for trimming blouses, collars, pocket-handkerchiefs, etc., while others are for under-clothing, children's clothing, etc.

Fig. 1.—This edge is worked on fine linen, partly in overcast and partly in button-hole stitch. The centre of each figure is composed of a wheel in lace stitch.

Fig. 3.—NEEDLE-WORKED FIGURE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 2 consists of two rows of open cross stitch which join two rolls of cloth together, and connect these with a double collar, cuff, etc. The manner of arranging the rolls is distinctly shown in the illustration.

Fig. 3 gives a very pretty insertion, which may also be used as embroidery for a pocket-handkerchief above the seam. It is worked on muslin. The edges of the material, which are left in cross bars, are corded, while the portions cut out are filled with lace stitch in the manner shown by the illustration.

The trimming of Fig. 4 is made of linen or muslin. The material is laid at regular distances in very narrow tucks, which are joined to a pointed band. This band of trimming serves as the binding and sleeves of the chemise with small sleeves as shown on the double page.

The trimming shown by Fig. 5 consists of strips of muslin two inches long and an inch wide, which are arranged in a box-pleat a third of an inch wide. These strips are joined by cross stitches to very narrow strips which are worked with a row of herring-bone stitch. Each side is completed by a strip of muslin stitched down.

The middle part of the trimming, Fig. 6, consists of a strip of muslin two inches wide, which is set underneath pointed strips on each side. The edges are stitched down.

Fig. 7.—This trimming is made on Swiss muslin. The edges of the twisted strips are corded, the material is cut away between, and the space filled with lace stitch. This embroidered strip is pointed on both sides and stitched down on a strip of muslin.

revel in fresh butter when they should be eating salt.

But it does require the knowledge necessary to keep the housekeeping books properly. A thorough acquaintance with the prices of articles, and the different quantities which a household should consume; and above all, to have what is commonly called "one's wits about one." If every tradesman with whom you deal has a running account with you; if nothing in his book is paid for but what you have written down yourself; if your cook has orders to receive no meat without a check; has proper scales for weighing the joints as they come in, and makes a note of any deficiency (the checks being afterward compared with the butcher's book); it is impossible that the tradespeople can cheat you, and if your money is wasted you must waste it yourself.

It is an old-fashioned plan to pay one's bills at the end of each week; but it is a very good one. Little things which should be noticed may slip the memory at a longer period; besides, it is a useful reminder; it shows how the money is going, and if the tradesmen find you are careful it makes them so.

Following this plan, a quarter of an hour every morning sees the housekeeping affairs settled for the day, leaving the mistress at leisure to pursue her own avocations, and the cook to do her business in the kitchen. It is simply a glance at the larder, and then to write down all that will be required until that time on the morrow; the dinner and breakfast orders on a slate, and the other articles in the books appropriated to them. After a little while it will be found that the labor is purely mechanical; in a quiet family the consumption is so regular that the weekly bills will scarcely vary, and the mistress's eye will detect the least increase, and find out for what it has been incurred. At the close of each month the debit and credit accounts should be balanced, and then, if the allowance is at any time exceeded, it will generally be proved that it has gone on the superfluities before-mentioned, and not on the actual expense of maintaining the household. When people talk of the difficulties of "living," the thoughts of their listeners invariably fly to the cost of bread and meat; and they unite in abusing the tradespeople who send their children to fashionable schools on the profits they extort from us. But there are various ways in which men and women can save besides dispensing with unnecessary eatables.

What woman, for instance, in these days, buying a dress, does not pay twice as much for its being made and trimmed ready for her use as she did for the original material? And who that has feet and fingers, and a sewing-machine, could not sit down and make it in a few hours for herself?

But she will tell you, most likely, that she can not cut properly; that she has not the slightest taste for trimming, and that she was not brought up to dress-making like a dress-maker. Ah! my dear sisters! are not these the days when we should all learn? Men may go through life with the knowledge of but one thing; for if they are acquainted with the duties of their profession they succeed; but women need to know every thing, from putting on a poultice to playing the piano; and from being able to hold a conversation with the Secretary of State to clear-starching their husband's neck-ties.

I don't say we must do it; but I maintain that we should know how. Men are really needed but in one place, and that is, public life; but we are wanted every where. In public and in private; up stairs and down stairs; in the nursery and the drawing-room; nothing can go on properly without us, and if it does, if our husbands, and our servants, and our children don't need us, we can not be doing our duty.

Above all, we have the training of the mistresses of future households, and the mothers of a coming generation; the bringing up, in fact, of the "girls of the next period." If we can not amend the faults we see in ourselves (an assertion which should be paradoxical to any one gifted with the least energy), if we think it is too late to sit down in our middle age, and learn to rub the rust off our brains, and to work our heads with our fingers, we can rear them in a different fashion. If we are wasteful, and extravagant, and useless—deserving of all the hard things which have been said of us lately—let us at least take heed that our daughters are not the same.

MEN OF THE PERIOD.

DEAR BAZAR,—I have been thinking for a long time of writing to you on a subject very near to my heart; for I believe when we have thoughts that clamor for expression, and yet are too sacred to be mentioned even to our nearest and dearest, we are expected to tell them to the newspaper; and for my part it is such a strange thing for me to have thoughts at all, that I am anxious to display them to the world as quickly as possible.

I am not sure, after all, that mine are thoughts, but only feelings. I leave it to you to decide. I honestly confess that, as I have had a pretty good time in life for twenty years or so as demoiselle, I am not unwilling to look forward to a sweet little home of my own, with a pretty library, a nice conservatory, and various little notions I will not stop to talk about now, all preceded by the sweetest trousseau a doting mother could give her daughter out of a limited income. But dear mamma is nothing of a manager, and it costs a great deal to get married nowadays when men are so fearfully indolent and ruinously extravagant, and our people around here are not quite millionaires. So I really do not know what I am to do, unless you will befriend me with a little advice and some information. I know a great many excellent young gentlemen, whom I am very sure I could bring to my feet (that's the story-writing phrase, isn't it?) with a word; but as Dr. Holmes's John pathetically remarks, "Marriage isn't for them." No sensible girl could think for a moment of trusting her future in their hands unless she has a million or two a year of her own; when people have that they can give themselves up to any absurdity they wish. What with their cigars, their pipes, their clubs, their utter ignorance of all domestic affairs, the men nowadays, though very pleasing visitors and charming beaux, are deplorably unsuited for husbands. I have heard my grandmother say—dear old lady! she was a wonderful woman; could cook, and spin, and make cheese as easily as you would dance the gallop, went five times to church of a Sunday, and never saw a railroad, read a dozen newspapers, or heard of the Atlantic Cable in her life; one of the women of a past era whom all good people now deplore—well, I have often heard my grandmother say that my grandfather, when he was a young man, sawed his own wood, put in his own coal, carried his own bundles, mended his own fences, and with his own hands built his own log-cabin; if he had been traveling he would have wheeled his own trunk to the station. If we only had such men nowadays! If we had, then good, pleasant, well-bred girls would not have to sigh in single blessedness for want of millions, and billions, and trillions to support matrimony with. But the good old days are gone. Nowadays, if one's coy lips do let slip the frightened yes, such an array of tailors' bills, and porters' bills, and carpenters' bills, and the man-that-puts-in-the-winter's-fuel bills, and all that sort of thing, arise before one's eyes that indeed, even though he pays them, one is really staggered; for how is one ever to keep up appearances, have pretty bonnets, and pay the dress-maker, let her sew and turn and economize her best, when she is yoked to so useless a mate? I am sure that I need not enlarge upon this text—we women have all heard something like it ever since we were as tall as a cookery book. It's "the beam in their own eye" which our young men do not seem even to dream of. If you should chance to know any handsome, high-born, high-bred young gentleman of unexceptionable habits, who dresses in the best of material and in perfect taste (I am not fastidious, but I have nerves), holds a high position in the best society, reads Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and speaks all the modern languages fluently; who has, in short, all the modern accomplishments and a thorough education (no superficial smattering of this, that, and the other for me), with a perfect knowledge of all the arts and sciences; who never stepped on a lady's dress, nor ever made a social blunder; who can saw wood, bring water from the well, and who is in fact a first-class carpenter, farmer, coal-heaver, coachman, mason, picture-hanger, gas-fitter, and plumber, besides his regular profession; who never has his collars ruffled, or his hands hard or soiled, whatever he is doing—if you know such a one, frugal, industrious, intellectual, and good-tempered, I should like well to know and be supported by him. For I am not exacting. I believe in humoring a husband when he knows his place, and religiously tries to save all the money he can to pay for his wife's wants; and I am not one of those who would insist on his never smoking a cigar, or once in a while, when I haven't any one else to take me, going to the Opera with me or for a drive; for we are a provincial people, and do not often hear a genuine song bird.

What do you think about it? Won't you speak about it to some of those modest young gentlemen who require that the woman they marry shall not be out of her teens, shall be simple as a dove, gay as a linnet, fresh as a morning-glory, wise as Cornelia, discreet as Susannah, a superb musician, a first-class cook, a belle of the first water, a housekeeper of more than Napoleonic talent, a brilliant conversationalist, and a neat chamber-maid and nursery governess, all with the most profound respect and humble submission to her natural lord and master?

THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD.

A Story.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE FOX AND THE CROWS.

EARLY in my first chapter I announced that this tale would deal with the fortunes of very humble and obscure individuals. But, inasmuch as the fortunes of the most insignificant personages are linked inextricably with those of the high and powerful, whose doings history delights to chronicle, it fell out that certain great questions which began to agitate Europe about the period of which I write had a very considerable influence on the lives of the little group of persons who figure in my story. Storms which make the deep seas upheave, also ruffle the rivulets.

Times were coming when it grew necessary to take sides on the great questions affecting Germany; when even silence might be construed into an expression of opinion; and when the most cautious found themselves compelled to abandon their attitude of neutrality.

A man may say, "I am resolved to go straight onward, turning neither to the right nor to the left," and so long as the path shall be straight and even beneath his feet, he can do so. But one fine day he arrives at a point where one road divides into two roads, stretching away on either hand, and diverging ever more widely one from the other. What is to be done then? In front, proceeding straight onward, there is nothing but a stone-wall, or maybe a duck-pond, dull, muddy, and stagnant. If he would not assert his principles by ending his days in the duck-pond, or knocking his head against the stone-wall, the man must choose either the right-hand path or the left-hand path.

Now in Detmold people began to have glimpses of the duck-pond at the end of their political vista. There were some folks, better educated than old Simon Schnarcher the Sacristan, but perhaps not greatly more enlightened, who would have counseled avoiding the dilemma by the simple expedient of going back again to the place whence they started. "If you go on," said these wiseacres, "you certainly must choose the right-hand path or the left-hand path, or else be stifled in the duck-pond. That is true. But why go on?"

Very often people were unable to answer why. But they mostly felt the necessity.

To the tiny community at Horn, however, the condition of European politics was, with very few exceptions, a matter of profound indifference. The echoes from the great noisy world penetrated thither but faintly. It is true that some distorted and diminished photographs of the more important doings of the time were presented to them in their local newspapers. They desecrated from a distance kings and kaisers, princes and potentates, moving hither and thither, troops advanced and withdrawn, and a kind of general running the hayes and changing of places. But they were as a deaf man who looks on at a dance. They saw the bustle and movement, indeed, but had no inkling of the music which regulates the figure.

In the speise-saal of the Pied Lamb, at Horn, there is warmth and good cheer at the usual supper hour—that is to say, about half past seven o'clock. It is more than a month ago since that September night when the reader was first introduced to Fuendel's hostelry, but nearly the same company is assembled within it as on that former occasion. Simon Schnarcher is there, and Peters, and the fat host. There are, too, a few tradesmen and farmers, old habitués of the place. But Franz Lehmann is not present, nor the commercial traveler, whose temerity in defying the sacristan is remembered and still occasionally discussed among them with great gusto. At this present moment, however, the serious business of eating and drinking is occupying the faculties of the company. The night without is very dark and cold. In the speise-saal it is light and warm. The lingering odor of tobacco is still there, but the atmosphere is clear from the thick clouds that sometimes obscure it. They will arise by-and-by. For the present the steam of hot meats ascends unmingled from the table; for, even by a German, the operations of supping and smoking can not conveniently be performed together. The one waiter, assisted by a stout kitchen-maid, has been attending to the wants of the guests, but now there comes a lull in his labors. All are served, and the waiter sits down alone at a side-table to enjoy his own portion of the food.

After a while Herr Fuendel, sitting at the head of the board, wipes his mouth with his napkin, pushes his chair heavily back toward the stove, takes from his pocket a very attenuated cigar, and holds it over his shoulder without turning his head. Johann, the waiter, jumps up, brings a lighted candle in a little, quaint, old-fashioned brass candlestick, and sets fire to the attenuated cigar. Forthwith every man in the room pulls out either a meerschaum or a cigar; they are lighted, all the chairs are pushed back, scraping noisily over the sanded floor, and a semicircle is formed in front of the stove, of which semicircle the landlord's chair on one side and Simon Schnarcher's on the other are the points nearest to the fire. A smaller table is set before the guests, so that each man may have his tankard of beer at hand without the trouble of turning to reach it, and all is made snug and comfortable.

"Ah-h-h!" exclaimed Peters, drawing a long breath and stretching his legs out before him enjoyingly. "Well, to be sure, it's wonderful times we live in!"

Fuendel grunted. The rest puffed thoughtfully at their pipes and cigars. Only old Schnarcher turned his bright, sunken eyes watchfully on Peters, with the expression of one who lies in wait.

"I've been reading to-day," went on the apothecary, "an account of the Atlantic telegraph cable. Now, you know what that is?"

Silence. Fuendel nodded, ambiguously. Old Schnarcher put forth his hand and took a draught of beer, without removing his eyes from Peters's face. The latter proceeded. "A great wire laid right through the sea—through the deep, deep sea, meine Herren—from Europe to America. Wonderful times, wonderful times!"

"I don't see that there's anything so wonderful in dropping a wire into the sea," observed Fuendel, in his deepest bass. "If the wire was only long enough you might twist it all round the world, I suppose."

"And what's the good when you've done it?" asked a horse-faced man, who was proprietor of the general shop in Horn.

"The good? Why only think of the science, the enlightenment, the progress—"

The word was scarcely out of his mouth when Schnarcher—morally—pounced on him with such suddenness as to startle the circle. It was the opportunity for which he had been lying in wait.

"Progress, forsooth! Ay, ay! that's what you're after, is it? You and your friend, the commercial gentleman, who talked so big here the other night—"

"He's no friend of mine," protested Peters; "I never saw the man in my life before."

"You and your friend—that's what you were both driving at," repeated the sacristan, doggedly. "And a nice down-hill drive you'd make of it, if there wasn't some older and wiser folks to put the drag on a bit and pull at the reins."

The illustration was received with many approving words, and one or two murmurs of "Ja so!" "Ganz richtig, Herr Küster."

"I want to hear nothing of your wires and rubbish," snarled the sacristan, on whom the effect of his friends' encouraging approval appeared to be the exacerbation of his contentious humor; "I won't hear of 'em, and I don't believe in 'em."

"Well, but that don't alter the facts, you know," retorted Peters, returning to the charge with a certain mild persistence.

"Ay, ay, ay," rasped out Fuendel, solemnly rolling his head from side to side, "I don't know that, Herr Peters—I don't know that. Herr Schnarcher hasn't been sacristan here for more than forty years without knowing pretty well what to believe in."

At this moment a stumbling step was heard in the passage leading from the street to the interior of the inn, and some one bumped heavily against the door of the speise-saal.

"Johann!" called out the landlord, whose senses were by no means too sluggish to be instantly alive to the prospect of a customer: "Johann! Go with a light. See who is there. Is there no lamp in the passage? Donnerwetter, don't leave the guests to tumble about in the dark!"

"There never is a lamp in the passage now after supper-time!" said the waiter, hurrying to the door with the little brass candlestick in his hand. "Who's likely to be coming at this hour of an October night?" As he spoke, he opened the door of the speise-saal, and admitted a stranger, whose advent caused a shudder to run round the assembly. Let me hasten to explain that the shudder was in nowise due to anything horrible or threatening in the appearance of the newcomer; on the contrary, he was a very quiet and peaceable-looking old gentleman, wrapped up in a loose great-coat, and with a white knitted comforter wound round his throat. But he brought in with him so great a quantity of the outer air—which was by this time very bleak and piercing—as to make the denizens of the hot, close room shiver. And, besides, he looked pinched and nipped with the cold.

"Can I have a bed here?" he asked, blinking round the room. His eyes were dazzled by coming from the darkness without into the comparatively bright speise-saal.

"Surely, surely, Sir," replied the landlord, rising from his arm-chair with as much alacrity as his ponderous size permitted. "Johann! Take the gentleman's coat. Have you any luggage, Sir?"

"Not more than I carry in my hand," said the stranger, showing a very shabby black leather bag, whose contents had been rammed into it so tightly as to make it bulge out in an ungainly fashion.

"Oh," said Fuendel, sitting down again in his chair. Travelers were by no means plentiful at the Pied Lamb, but they had not yet become so rare that such attentions as the waiter could bestow unassisted did not, in Herr Fuendel's opinion, amply suffice to do honor to a guest who carried no luggage beyond a shabby black leather bag.

The stranger, perhaps, perceived something of what was passing in his host's mind, for when Johann had relieved him of his outer coat, he pulled from his breast-pocket a massive gold snuff-box, and took a pinch from it so noisily as to insure the observation of all present. Then he ordered a fire to be lighted in his chamber, and desired that some supper should be got ready with as little delay as might be. "And, Kellner," said he, in a subdued voice, that yet was so distinct as to be quite audible to every one in the room, "give me a bottle of the best wine you have. I am cold and tired."

Then he followed the stout servant-woman out of the speise-saal, saying that he would go and look at his room.

"Number five; Marie," called out Fuendel. "The yellow bedroom."

"The Herr came on foot," observed Johann, busily spreading a clean napkin over one end of the table-cloth, and laying a plate, knife, and fork on it.

"I know that, Sir," said Fuendel, with severity, "I know he came on foot, but he's going to have the yellow bedroom all the same. I haven't been an inn-keeper for five-and-twenty years without knowing a gentleman when I see him!"

It was clear, at all events, that the host knew a gold snuff-box when he saw it.

"I wonder who he is!" said the horse-faced man. Every one else wondered who he was.

"I understand there's a new land steward for the Prince's Detmold property, appointed to fill old Bepp's place," said Peters. "It may be this is the gentleman."

"Bah!" cried Schnarcher. "Nothing of the kind. The new land steward is a major—I forget the name. But that doesn't look much like a military man, does it?" And the old sacristan jerked his thumb upward in the direction of the yellow bedroom.

"Do you suppose, Mr. Apothecary," said Fuendel, reprovingly, "that his most gracious highness's land steward—his representative almost I may say—would come prowling in among us for the first time after dark, and afoot? You surprise me."

Every one was surprised. It seemed to be the cue, ever since the memorable evening of the commercial traveler, to fall foul of Peters and to consider him a dangerous speaker, whose hand was against every man in their society. No one really thought he was so, unless it might be old Schnarcher, whose opinion of his old friend had recently been much lowered by the apothecary having developed a tendency to favor modern theories on various subjects. But the company at the Pied Lamb, speaking generally, enjoyed the gentle excitement of having a victim in common. It promoted good-fellowship, and was pleasant for every body—except the victim; and even he did not suffer much, for, save when the sacristan grew extraordinarily venomous, Peters was mostly placidly unconscious of his own victimhood.

"Well, Herr Landlord," returned the apothecary, "you said yourself that the traveler looked like a gentleman. So he might have been the Prince's representative. And, at all events, there is no disrespect to his highness in saying so!"

The host was about to give utterance to some rejoinder, when the subject of the discussion returned to the speise-saal, and a solemn and unnatural silence fell upon the company. They moved their chairs somewhat, so as to give the new-comer the benefit of the stove's heat, as he sat at his supper; a courtesy which the stranger acknowledged by a silent bend of his head. It was a bald head, very round and yellow, and he thrust it out of his cravat, and then drew it in again, in a way that the reader will perhaps recognize as belonging to a person with whom he has already made some acquaintance. For some time the old habitués of the Pied Lamb remained with closed lips, furtively glancing at the unknown guest. But the latter was very quiet—

"mouse-still," as the Germans say. And even while he was yet discussing the viands set before him he brought forth from the same capacious pocket that held the snuff-box a well-worn note-book, bulky with papers, and laying it by the side of his plate, soon became seemingly absorbed in its contents.

Gradually the rest of the company resumed their talk. They would have liked to discuss the stranger, but as that was a luxury which must necessarily be deferred, inasmuch as it could not be enjoyed in his presence, they got back to the conversation which his arrival had interrupted. Still, very still, sat the stranger, and sipped his wine in silence. So still did he sit, and so silently did he sip, keeping his eyes on the worn note-book the while, that the others by degrees ceased to be conscious of his presence, and warmed into their talk unrestrainedly.

"Why, after all," said Peters—of whose character, as has been stated, a certain mild persistence was a leading trait—"After all, it isn't one thing much more than another. We can't shut our eyes to the great changes going on in the world. I read my newspaper regularly, and I can tell you, meine Herren, that scarcely a day passes without some new invention turning up that would have seemed just like Kindermärchen—fair tales—to our grandfathers. And then in politics—look at the foreign intelligence! Why every thing is changing—changing, in such a way that the geography books can't keep pace with the times."

"Well, Sir," said Fuendel, "and what does all that matter to us? There's the mischief. We will be meddling instead of sitting still and minding our own business. Ain't we very well off here in Lippe-Detmold?"

"Yes, certainly. But you see it will matter to us before very long, if it don't matter now. There's a movement taking place throughout Germany, that—"

But here the apothecary was interrupted by a chorus of loud and angry exclamations. What did Peters mean? Was he a revolutionist? A republican? A mad studenten-burschi? It was all very well to enjoy, like Goethe's burghers in "Faust," the spectacle of the folks knocking each other on the head "far away in Turkey," but when it came near home—when it came to one of themselves, an old inhabitant, a peaceful tradesman of Horn, talking about a "movement going on throughout Germany!"—Dear Heaven! What would happen next? The temerity of the commercial traveler who had defied Schnarcher and alluded to the '48, was completely thrown into the shade. Peters looked quite scared at the storm he had raised.

"But," protested he, feebly, "I said nothing about republics or revolutions. I was alluding to the growing power and influence of Prus—"

"Stop!" cried the landlord, authoritatively, letting his fat hand fall by its own weight on to the table in a way that made the glasses quiver, "stop there, Herr Peters. You've said enough, and more than enough. If any gentleman can't digest his supper without politics, there's a public house across the street that may suit him. Any way the speise-saal of the Pied Lamb is not for such. I'm a man of few words, but what I say I mean."

There was profound silence for a few moments, and then the horse-faced man—who had been peculiarly stolid all through—remarked slowly that for his part he thought Herr Fuendel was right, and that if they couldn't talk of any thing better than politics they had better hold their tongues altogether, which latter mode of passing the time was, in his opinion—when combined with due allowance of beer and tobacco—a pleasant resource enough.

"Right, friend," said the landlord; "and I've known the day when five or six, or eight or ten, burghers could meet together socially, and not say as many words in an hour as folks nowadays will let off in a minute. Ay, and be no worse company either!"

But, somehow, the result of the persistently holding their tongues for some ten minutes failed in this instance to be as convivial and harmonizing as might have been wished. Schnarcher's eyes, indeed, sparkled with spiteful gratification at the apothecary's discomfiture. But the others appeared to be a little oppressed and uneasy. At length one man stretched forth his hand, took his glass of beer, drained it, and then rose slowly to his feet. His example was followed by all the rest, except Fuendel and the sacristan. Good-night was said, and Johann, lamp in hand, proceeded to light the guests down the passage and out of the house-door.

"Broke up early to-night," said the waiter when he returned, glancing at Schnarcher, who remained immovable by the stove.

"I," remarked old Simon, in his sourest tones, "go home at nine o'clock—neither sooner nor later. I've left the Pied Lamb as St. Mary's clock strikes nine, every night, winter and summer, except when kept at home by the rheumatism, for the last fifty years. In your time, Herr Fuendel, and in your father's time before you, that has been my custom. New ways may come up, and new inns may come up, and such as likes 'em are welcome to take 'em. But Simon Schnarcher, sacristan, don't allow his habits to be broken in upon by any body."

Fuendel nodded his close-cropped head admiringly. "Ah," said he, "that's the sort of sentiment I like to hear in this speise-saal."

"Gentlemen," said a dry, subdued voice, "will you allow me to draw up to your table, and finish this excellent old wine in your company?"

It was the stranger who spoke, and who now advanced, bottle in hand, toward the host. Fuendel had more than the ordinary innkeeper's pride in his cellar. He reckoned himself, and with some justice, a first-rate judge of wine, and he had somewhat of the enthusiasm of a connoisseur on the subject. Indeed, eating and drinking, in general, were the only topics on which Fuendel might be said ever to display any thing like a glow of feeling.

"Glad you like the vintage, Sir," said he, pulling forward a chair for his guest, and beginning to form an exceedingly favorable opinion of his taste. Old Schnarcher, too, looked at the stranger approvingly. The gentleman was staid, slow in speech, sombre in dress, took snuff, and was not young. "Good," muttered the sacristan to himself, and made an attempt at a bow.

"You seem to have a very agreeable society here, Herr Landlord," said the Justizrath; for it was he.

"Ach Himmel! Well enough, Sir; well enough. We mostly are pretty pleasant together. But you have chanced on us rather unluckily this evening."

"How so?" asked Von Schleppers, raising his eyebrows inquiringly.

"Well, you see I had to be a little hard on an old acquaintance. A very respectable man—none more so—but weak, weak hereabouts," said the host, tapping his forehead.

"Truly? truly? Well, the fact is, I don't believe I heard six words of what you were saying. I am afraid I am what people call absent. That is to say, I mind my own business, and don't pay much heed to what other folks are talking about. Unless, of course, they happen to be talking to me."

The grin with which the Justizrath concluded his speech was intended to be agreeable, no doubt, but the majority of people would have found it repulsive. Neither Schnarcher nor Fuendel found it so, however. They willingly allowed themselves to be drawn into talking very freely about their fellow-townsmen, and notably about Peters, whose opinions, they regretted to say, were very far from being what they ought to be. Then they answered various adroitly-put questions as to the prosperity of the town and neighborhood, and the value of land and house property in Horn, and gave a good deal of information which the Justizrath carefully stored in his retentive memory, while seeming to pay scarcely any heed to it. When nine o'clock struck from the spire of St. Mary's church the sacristan was still seated by the stove, and still holding forth dogmatically for the benefit of his new acquaintance.

"Good-night, Sir," said the latter, rising as the sacristan rose; "much obliged for your improving society. Ach leider! one doesn't often hear such sound opinions nowadays."

"No, Sir, that's true enough," the old man made answer, decisively. "But I belong to the old school. I like old-fashioned ways and old-fashioned wisdom. I was brought up to think old heads ought to govern and young hands to work. And I was seventy-nine last Pentecost."

"Ay, ay," answered the Justizrath, as admiringly as though to have been seventy-nine last Pentecost involved the exercise of the highest moral qualities, "to be sure, to be sure. Old heads to govern, as you say, and old wine to drink, eh! Herr Landlord?"

Fuendel was wonderfully tickled by this, and lighted his guest up to the yellow bedroom in person.

When next day the news ran through Horn that the stranger who had passed the night at the Pied Lamb was Lawyer von Schleppers from Detmold, that he was to have the chief management, under Major von Croll, of the Prince's estates, and that he had already paid a visit to Franz Lehmann's farm on business connected with a piece of land which the farmer had rented of his highness, both the sacristan and the landlord felt sundry twinges of regret at having been led into making such confidences to an official personage who might put them to what use he pleased. Neither of them were in general communicative men, and yet both were conscious of having been singularly unguarded in talking to the lawyer.

"I don't know how it was," said Fuendel, smoothing down the crop of hair that looked like a grey velvet skull-cap, "but the old gentleman had such a very pleasant way with him. Even the Herr Küster, a man of great experience, took to him astonishingly."

Come, come, to be just, the gorgeous and graceful peacock is not the only vain bird in creation.

Was there not once a certain crow, black and grim, and wise in his own conceit, who let fall his bit of cheese into the flattering jaws of the fox?

THERMOMETERS.

WHEN hot weather comes thermometer readers always try to outdo each other in the amount of heat that their instruments show. "My glass read 86° in the shade to-day," says one. "Mine gave 91°," says a second. "Bless you, mine rose to nearly a hundred," chimes a third; and each insists that his temperature is the truth. The fact is ignored that the reading of a thermometer depends to a very great extent upon its position with regard to surrounding objects—trees, buildings, and the like. One of the greatest difficulties a conscientious meteorologist has to contend with is that of placing his instruments so as to obtain the true temperature of the free air. They may be apparently in the shade, but a proximate wall, upon which the sun shines, may affect them well-nigh as much as the direct solar rays; or they may be so protected by surrounding buildings that they are in a reservoir of stagnant air, which stores up the heat it receives till it becomes a veritable hot well; or again, they may be so near the ground as to receive its exhalations, which are much hotter than the air a few feet above the soil. Several high-class thermometers, disposed about a building in positions all seemingly good, will differ in their indications to the extent of eight or ten degrees. One in a sheltered corner, looking north, will read too low; another upon or near a south or sunny wall will be too high. Judgment and experience are required to mount a glass in a position that will yield a fairly true temperature. It must be in a free current of air, sheltered from the sun, and protected from the radiation from neighboring objects. He who buys a thermometer without knowing any thing of the errors of its scale, and sets it up outside his window, or against his garden wall, without regard to the above conditions, deludes himself with its readings, and misleads every one to whom he communicates them.

"ALL FOR NOTHING."

A SOFTENED tone, a speaking glance:

"Did he mean it?—or was it chance?"

She asked herself, while her eyes grew dim

With foolish tears, for she worshiped him.

Once, indeed, when her hand he took,

Held it until her pulses shook—

"Now," she thought, "is the moment come!

Now he will speak!" But his lips were dumb.

All was over within a week;

Time enough to have blanched her cheek

And wrung her heart, and made life seem

Blank, all blank, since that fever dream.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IT is said that a French photographer has obtained very accurate panoramic views of Paris from a balloon nearly one thousand feet in the air. If true, this step in art will be one of great importance. By-the-way, it has been proposed to use the word photogram instead of photograph, and considerable discussion has arisen in connection with the topic. Stereogram and lithogram would naturally follow. Cablegram and cabled have been suggested. In this progressive age new words are constantly being coined as a matter of necessity.

About one hundred years ago a remarkable spring was discovered at Ballston, and its waters were regarded as very efficacious. For years Ballston was a favorite resort of invalids; but some attempt was made to improve the spring, and it was lost in the porous sand. Recently borings for oil were made in the vicinity, when, at a depth of about six hundred and fifty feet, instead of oil, the old mineral-spring made its appearance, much to the astonishment of the workmen. The water is very clear, and tastes like the Congress water, but is more pungent. Ballston will be likely soon to become a famous watering-place.

A large number of children were lately poisoned in Boston from eating castor-oil beans which had been thrown among useless garbage by a manufacturer of castor-oil. The refuse beans were spilled out of the barrel in which they had been placed for the city scavengers to remove, and a number of children in the vicinity thought they had discovered a store of peanuts. They helped themselves generously, and reported the treat to all the juveniles in the vicinity. Suddenly they were all taken violently sick—about seventy children, it is said, and twenty adults. Great alarm was felt, and the most exaggerated reports of deaths were circulated. When, however, the cause of the sudden epidemic was ascertained, physicians went to work to relieve the sufferers, and in most cases were successful.

It is said that there is a great deal of intentional fraud in Washington and other large markets. Fruit is frequently sold in "quarts," which have false bottoms.

Lightning seems to despise all attempts to chain or control it. In a late storm the gable of a house in Cleveland, belonging to a lightning-rod seller, and which was protected by nineteen rods, was torn into splinters by the electric fluid. It should be remembered that lightning-rods which are not in perfect order are worse than useless.

Borax has many excellent qualities. Just at this season it will be a comfort to those who suffer from the bites of mosquitoes and other poisonous insects to know that a solution of borax is a valuable remedy. It is made by dissolving one ounce of borax in one pint of water that has been boiled and allowed to cool. Instead of plain water, distilled rose-water, elder, or orange-flower water is more pleasant. The application causes almost instant relief—the alkaline reaction of the borax neutralizing the acidulous poison deposited in the skin.

It is stated that about eight hundred thousand watches are annually made in the canton of Neuchâtel, Switzerland. The trade employs not far from thirty thousand hands.

Ten thousand dollars' worth of books has been offered to Mount Holyoke Female Seminary by a benevolent woman, on the condition that a suitable fire-proof library building be erected to receive them.

The difference between religious denominations is often more in name than in reality; otherwise such mistakes as the following would more speedily be discovered: Two ministers named Miller, one a Baptist and the other a Methodist, were engaged to supply pulpits in Rahway, New Jersey, a few weeks ago. The Methodists sent a carriage to the dépôt first, and there a gentleman in black was found waiting; and on giving his name as Rev. Mr. Miller, he was made welcome by them. Soon after the Baptists found at the same dépôt another Rev. Mr. Miller, and took him along to supply their pulpit. Both supplies proved very acceptable to all parties; and it was not discovered until after service that the two Millers had got mixed.

A pigeon flying match recently took place, in which twelve London pigeon-fanciers were engaged. The race was from Dover to London, a distance of about eighty miles. The swiftest bird performed the trip in two hours and six minutes, being at the rate of one mile in one and a half minutes. The weather, moreover, was not favorable, a heavy atmosphere and a drizzling rain impeding the progress of the pigeon.

It would be a satisfaction if the police in all cities were as vigilant as they are in New Albany, Indiana. There, strangers who are found upon the streets after eleven o'clock, are, to say the least, noticed by the authorities. A few nights ago a ludicrous incident occurred. New Albany was honored by the presence of the State Geologist—a man well versed in science, but somewhat careless in dress. In a rough garb he encountered two policemen about midnight, while he was plodding along the street with carpet-bag filled with hammers, chisels, and other geological implements suitable for digging out specimens.

"Ho! there! Halt!" challenged one of the policemen.

The Illinois State Geologist halted.

"Who are you, Sir, and where are you going at this late hour of the night?"

"Well, Sir, my name is —, and I am the State Geologist of Illinois. Who are you?"

"You are, eh?" returned the officer. "Well, we've heard of such fellows as you before. What have you got in the carpet-bag?" sounding it with his foot, and hearing the tinkling of the tools. "We are policemen, Sir."

"Well, I have some hammers, chisels, etc., for digging out specimens."

This did not exactly seem to suit the policemen, and they looked suspiciously upon the rough-looking stranger. The geologist saw their quandary and said: "Well, gentlemen, I commend your vigilance as guardians of the peace; but I would thank you to conduct me to the DePauw House, where I will satisfy you as to my identity." His request was complied with, and the policemen were convinced that he was no burglar, but a veritable live geologist.

It is now announced that Victor Hugo's new romance is entitled "93." The French publisher has given 100,000 francs for the work.

The Union Pacific Railroad has issued a card time-table, closely printed. The list of stations occupies about eight inches. When the road is finished what will be the length of the card containing the names of all the stations on the route?

The catastrophe which recently occurred near Abergele, Wales, is one of the most fearful and fatal yet recorded in the history of English railways. The Irish mail train was on its way from London to Holyhead, when, shortly after passing Abergele, a collision took place between it and some trucks loaded with barrels of petroleum. The oil exploded on coming in contact with the engine, and in an instant the front carriages were enveloped in flames. Becoming saturated with petroleum, they blazed with a fury that no human appliances would have been capable of quenching. Every thing combustible fell a victim to its fury. The wood-work of the carriages fed the flames, while their unhappy inmates were in a very short space of time reduced to a mere charred mass, in many cases all semblance of human form being quite destroyed. It is hoped that the victims were unconscious of more than momentary suffering, as the dense smoke must probably have suffocated them almost immediately. It is supposed that about thirty persons were in the carriages which were consumed, several of whom were individuals of high rank.

The orderly citizens of Meriden, Connecticut, are resolved to sustain the good old-fashioned habit of showing respect to elders—if the following incident be true. Not long ago a young man disrespectfully saluted a respectable gentleman, whose head-covering was somewhat peculiar, with the ejaculation, "What a hat!" The judge of the police court immediately fined him five dollars and costs.

The great Shoshone Falls of Idaho seem to compare favorably with Niagara. The Snake River, in its descent over the elevated plains of Idaho, forms these falls about four hundred miles from its source in the Rocky Mountains. The river runs through a narrow rocky gorge, which widens and terminates abruptly in precipitous cliffs, the summits of which are about one thousand feet above the level of the rapids, and so steep that the traveler can descend at only one point. The rapids form a series of cascades, ranging from thirty to sixty feet each in height, and just below them the river, in one unbroken mass, leaps two hundred and ten feet into the abyss below. Although the river is not quite so wide at this point as the Niagara River, the falls are higher and quite as beautiful. The scenery about the Shoshone is most romantic and picturesque.

Quite recently a wanton outrage has been perpetrated in the vicinity of Dublin, which has awakened feelings of regret and indignation in the neighborhood. About ten miles from Dublin, in a deep valley at the base of the Kippure Mountain, was a beautiful and romantic spot known as Lough Bray, which has long been a favorite resort of excursionists. The lake was encircled by lofty precipices, covered with dark fir-trees and heather. An old Elizabethan cottage stood in picturesque beauty on the margin of the lake, surrounded by scenery of great grandeur. One evening the residents of the cottage noticed a solitary figure on the opposite side of the lake, then came a puff of smoke, followed by the bursting forth of flames, which rapidly spread from crag to crag, till the entire side of the mountain was in a blaze. Help was sent for, and every effort made, but the fire raged all night, the fir-trees flaming like torches. The house escaped the devastating element, but one of the most beautiful scenes on which the eye could rest has been transformed into a scorched and blackened desert; many years must elapse before the damage of that one night can be repaired.

It is a curious fact that almost all flowers sleep during the night. Go out into the garden at twilight, and you will observe many blossoms just shutting themselves up. There are, however, some exceptions. The Night-flowering Cereus begins to expand its sweet-scented blossoms at twilight, and is in full bloom at midnight, and closes forever at the dawn of day.

Ladies' Negligé Collars.

See illustration on double page.

Fig. 1.—This collar is made of a piece of muslin thirty-six inches long and six inches in width, which is pleated in narrow pleats lengthwise and cut sloping on the ends. It is hemmed around the edge, and bordered on one side and on the ends with lace one-third of an inch in width. The edge, which is left without lace, is laid over on the right side and ornamented with a row of herring-bone stitch in white cotton. Knot one end of the collar and draw the other end through the knot in the manner shown by the cravat for sailor's blouse, Harper's Bazar, No. 44. This saves tying the ends every time, and keeps the collar neat a longer space of time.

Fig. 2.—For this negligé collar take first a piece of muslin twenty-eight inches long and two inches wide and pleat it cross-wise in narrow pleats. Finish the upper edge with a muslin frill edged with lace and two-fifths of an inch in width, and the lower edge with a similar frill an inch in width. For the ends sew on two plain pieces of muslin each eight inches long by four wide, which are hemmed, edged with lace, and laid in three small pleats on the under edge. These are sewed together from the under side.

Netted Night-Cap.

See illustration on double page.

For making this cap, which is entirely plain and netted over a mesh half an inch in diameter, work first a long, straight, four-cornered piece for the middle of the foundation by laying on 28 stitches and working backward and forward twenty-seven rounds. Work around this 34 rounds in the round and fasten the thread. Now count off 43 stitches for the front and 24 for the back edge, and leave these untouched. On the stitches remaining at each side work the strings with 95 backward and forward rounds, round off the ends with 11 additional rounds, in which narrow 1 stitch in each round. Sew the back to a narrow band, which, as well as the remaining edges, border with four rounds of crochet lace.

1st round.—3 dc. (double crochet) in every edge stitch of the cap. 2d round.—1 sc. (single crochet) between every 3 dc. of the former round, after each of which 4 ch. (chain stitches). 3d round.—* 1 sc. around a ch.-scallop of the former round, 1 ch., 3 dc. each separated by 3 ch. around the next ch.-scallop, 1 ch., 1 sc. around the following ch.-scallop. Repeat from . 4th round.— 1 dc. around the next ch. of the former round; 1 p. (picot) composed of 5 ch. and 1 dc. in the first of these, 5 ch., 2 dc. separated by 1 p. around the next ch.-scallop, 1 p., 2 dc. separated by 1 p. around the following ch.-scallop, 1 p., 1 dc. around the next ch. Repeat from *.

Netted Night-Cap.

See illustration on double page.

This night-cap is simple and very serviceable. It consists of two similar three-cornered pieces which are sewed on each other in a double triangle. The point of this triangle is laid over in the manner shown by the illustration, and fastened on the under half of the triangle. The edge and seam which join the two halves are trimmed with a crocheted lace. The pattern is worked over a mesh half an inch in diameter. Begin each half on the corner with a foundation of 2 stitches. Work in backward and forward rounds, adding one stitch at the end of each round till the number of stitches counts 60. Then sew the two pieces together and border the edge and the edge of the band, which is arranged as in the cap previously described, with the lace. This lace consists of two open-work rounds made by dc. (double crochet), each separated by a ch. (chain stitch) and 1 round sc. (single crochet), working 4 sc. in every ch. between 2 dc.

Gentleman's Night-Shirt.

See illustration on double page.

Having cut out the shirt, overcast the body together on the sides, beginning ten inches from the upper edge. At the end of the side-seams leave also ten inches for a slit and set in a small gusset. Make a slit in the upper part of the front seventeen inches long; at the under end of this cut on each side a cross-slit an inch long, and at the upper end nine inches on each side for the neck. Make a hem an inch in width on the fronts, and stitch the left hem over on the right a fifth of an inch from the under edge. Gather the edge left by the slit in the body of the shirt, and sew this edge between the two seams. Stitch down on the right side the two small pleats which by this means are made on either side of the hems. Next stitch on the shoulder-pieces and cut these in the shape of the arm-holes, lay the edges together and set in the three-cornered gore. Gather the neck, and bind it between the edges of a collar which must be stitched around the edge and furnished with a button and button-hole. Join the sleeve with the gusset, sew it together, leaving a slit on the under end, and fasten between the two edges of the binding of the wrist. This is also provided with a button and button-hole. The upper part of the sleeve must also be gathered, after which sew into the arm-hole.

WAS SOLOMON RIGHT?

WITH all due respect for the opinion of that venerable sage, I am strongly inclined to the belief that if he had lived in these days, and kept house on a smaller scale than a palace, he would not have written that the borrower is servant to the lender.

It may be all very well for men who have no conscience or delicacy about dunning one another for little debts of honor; but for a woman there should be quite another set of rules, and in my secret heart I do think of the two the lender is the servant. At least it has always been so in my case. It may be on account of my generous and confiding disposition, which, as it comes by nature, I can not overcome; but throughout my school-days nobody ever wanted a sponge that they did not sponge on me, my knife was continually the prey of some sharper, and many a time have I impoverished myself of my books and slate-pencils to relieve the pressing necessities of my neighbors. At length, taking the advice of one more worldly-wise, I established a sort of second-hand lending apparatus, but always felt inexpressibly mean when responding to appeals for aid, and it was not long before the strongly expressed preference for better articles started me in the old habits again.

And so it has gone on, until here I am to-day with a house, and husband, and two small children to look after, and no more prospect of servants from the lending process than if I had been a borrower all the days of my life. Indeed, no sooner do I get a handy maid-of-all-work than even she discovers my failings, and is sure to entreat the loan of "Missus's nuby, just to wear to the ball with Patrick"—or if it happens to rain, her water-proof—"they are such mighty convenient things, they will fit any body."

But never has my bondage reached such a pitch of servitude as since last month heralded the arrival of our neighbors, the Dunns, from Great Dunnington. They duly moved in and took possession of the little brown cottage just opposite our own, and on account of my husband's frequently expressed desires that I would be neighborly on account of the advantage to him, I called forthwith. Mrs. D. had no sooner made her appearance than she entreated the loan of half a dozen cups and saucers for tea, as she had not unpacked all their crockery, and what she had was unfortunately broken; then, as the family was large, six children, she could not possibly make out with less. I assented, of course (what else was there for me?), with visions of our own tea without tea-cups, for I knew but too well that we possessed but the solitary half-dozen. As I was beating my retreat she called after me, "And, by-the-way, Mrs. Lendemall, a pound of butter, if you please. I haven't time to send to the store to-night."

Now, if I have one weakness, it is the quality of my butter. I'm a born Philadelphian in that respect, notwithstanding my early emigration from the Quaker City, and I would not dare to tell in Gath the prices I have been beguiled into paying for an extra article. My butter-man comes but once a week, and so nicely do I calculate for keeping a fresh supply that my seven pounds just lasts me.

All these facts flashed rapidly through my mind as I heard the order for butter, but scarcely conscious of what I did, I hastily responded, "Yes, ma'am," and ran across the street, not knowing what might come next. If Mr. and Mrs. Dunn had been young married people just setting up their first housekeeping, I should have joyfully acceded even to a request for butter, for there is nothing in which I take more delight than assisting a pair of cooing doves; but for this old, experienced couple, with six children, and Mr. D. a retired grocer to boot, was a little too much. However, cups and saucers, and a good pound of butter (for I can't bear to do any thing by halves), were sent over, and like a discreet and prudent wife, I said nothing about the latter to my husband.

He grumbled a little at drinking his tea from a tin cup, but was quenched when I informed him it was only in furtherance of his neighborly desires, and, after all, it was nothing more than he used to do in the army.

The next morning after breakfast appeared my cups and saucers, dirty, of course (I never lent a dish that returned as it went forth), and one of them minus a handle.

"Our little Gerty," Mrs. Dunn explained, "is so playful that she sometimes knocks over the dishes for mere sport, and it is no use to say any thing to the dear child. Children will be children." With which comforting reflection I stowed away my crippled cup, and wondered where might be the butter. It came at last, preceded by an odor that was not of green pastures and balmy breathed cows, but rather of the stale and musty precincts of the store-cellar. Happily the pound had dwindled to a half by the Dunn discount; and, reflecting that my fresh supply would be due on the morrow, I set it on the table.

My better half's nose, generally a most accurate Roman, was elevated into an unmistakable pug as he took his seat and wonderingly looked to me for an explanation.

"My dear, the Dunns," was all I had occasion to say, and he subsided into the meekest man woman ever gazed on.

In the middle of the following night we were aroused by a tremendous pounding at the door. Fire and burglars were my first thoughts as my husband hastily threw on his dressing-gown and ran down stairs, to return shortly with an expression of supreme disgust on his usually amiable countenance. On inquiry it appeared that dear David (the hopeful heir of the Dunn family) could not sleep, and his mother thought a mustard plaster might be beneficial by bringing on a perspiration. They had forgotten to provide themselves with the necessary article, and if I had it, would I please spare them some?

Of course I had it. Nobody ever applied to me yet that I did not have just precisely what they wanted, and was only too happy to lend it. Moreover, Mrs. Dunn had confidentialized to me extensively on the subject of dear David, who, she declared, was so weak in his lower limbs, and so disinclined to exertion generally, that they were beginning to fear spinal complaint.

I had myself seen him quite active among the branches of our cherry-tree in the morning, when he came over to borrow a few cherries for a pudding; and thinking it not impossible his sleeplessness might proceed from too great exertion then, I chose my very sharpest mustard and sent over with directions for a good strong plaster. Since then dear David has comparatively subsided, with the exception of requisitions for one or two eggs to mix him a little egg-nog and an occasional glass of wine.

"Our little Gerty" was the next applicant. I had just finished embroidering a white merino sacque for Clara when Mrs. Dunn appeared to request the loan of it as a pattern, that Gerty might have one for a juvenile tableau party, in which she was to enact the female Babe in the Wood. With a slight reluctance unworthy of my nature I handed it forth, and when it reappeared the day after the performance, was not surprised to find that "the pattern" had served in lieu of a copy, and was plentifully sprinkled with stains from the green leaves which the robin had scattered, and occasional grease-spots from the cake the male Babe had insisted on chewing.

Clara was furious; for I regret to observe she does not inherit my yielding and generous disposition. "You might have known better than to lend it to those people, mamma. You may just give it to them now, for I will never wear it—no, never!" and she stamped her little foot with a vehemence quite unworthy of a young Lendemall. I reproved her accordingly, and tried to inculcate some of the proper feeling. But I fear it is no use, and can only comfort myself with the reflection that she will hardly experience such a length of service as I have had. A few days afterward I was surprised to see the Dunn windows bowed and craped in the most approved style, with a long rosette flying from the bell-handle. What could be the matter? Had dear David dropped off suddenly? I wondered; when the mystery was solved by Mrs. Dunn's appearance with a countenance lengthened to an extremity of woe. She explained to me that they had just heard of the death of their former pastor's sister-in-law, and proposed going on to Connecticut to be present at the funeral. To be sure they did not know her so intimately; but it would be a nice little trip for the children, who were beginning to need change of air; and, as they would stay at the pastor's house, they need not be under much expense. She went on to say, that of course she would not like to attend the funeral without a nice suit of black; and as I was in mourning, and had just had my spring suit made, would I be so kind as to accommodate her with it? She must leave that afternoon; and our figures were so nearly alike she knew it would fit her charmingly, so I must not trouble myself about that.

Now I was particularly pleased with this new suit of mine, made in the very latest fashion, and fitting to a T, and, as I was just lightening my mourning, by no means devoid of trimming. This latter fact I hinted to Mrs. Dunn, and my doubts as to its suitability for the occasion, but she instantly set them all at rest by assuring me that it was exactly what she would choose for herself, and if she ever had an opportunity of accommodating me in the same way she would be delighted. Whereupon the dress was delivered, the family departed, looking properly melancholy, and I retired to meditate on the uncertainty of all earthly possessions.

Three, four, five days passed, and no tidings of the Dunns, until night before last the stage drove up to unload the family. With characteristic promptness Mrs. D. sent over my dress, "thinking I might like to wear it to church on Sunday." But what a sight! Was this spotted, bedraggled, cinder-hued, tobacco-stained garment the glossy alpaca I had so set my heart upon! Alas for my vanity! The three little ruffles were torn and mussed, the dress had lost its fit, and with unwonted energy (when a woman is roused to battle for her costume what will she not do?) I forthwith returned it to Mrs. D., with the request that she would make use of it for future funeral occasions. She received it very graciously, but a few days afterward remarked to my most intimate friend that she really was quite disappointed in Mrs. Lendemall—she had thought her at first a very pleasant, amiable neighbor, but found she had considerable temper.

It is wash-day. I am reminded of the fact by the smell of hot soap-suds; by the reflection that we have no dessert for dinner on this most monopolizing day; above all, by the glowering looks of my domestic as she inquires when I expect her to put out the clothes. When, indeed! for across the street I recognize my clothes-line laden with the garments of the Dunn family—my clothes-pins officiating to keep them in place. It is but the weekly occurrence, and I ought to be used to it by this time; but it only brings me to the point where I began: the question of King Solomon's writing as he did on the relation of borrower and lender. Were it true, I should surely have a small army of servants at my call, and first and foremost Mrs. Dunn and her family; but it is all I can do to retain a solitary maid, and I live in daily expectation of Mrs. D.'s sending over to borrow her services for washing dishes or rubbing silver.

Of course I should let her go—it is my destiny. Do I not know as well as if I had been told that to-morrow is ironing-day, when two or three of the Lendemall irons will be called in to assist the Dunn laundress, and I shall not dream of saying nay.

King Solomon was undoubtedly a very wise man, but he could not have written altogether with reference to the female sex in this glorious nineteenth century.

HORTICULTURAL HINTS FOR SEPTEMBER.

DURING the month of September the leading florists and seedsmen receive their annual importations of bulbs, and as it is desirable to plant them as early as possible, especially for house culture, we shall now give some directions for their cultivation. No class of plants are more desirable for this purpose than these; none are more easily cultivated; none can be grown in such a variety of ways; and none combine in a greater degree such beauty and gracefulness of form, fragrance, and brilliancy of color. Among them all for general cultivation the Hyacinth is the most useful, and we shall commence with directions for its culture in pots and glasses.

Hyacinths require a rather light and rich soil: a compost of three-fourths well-rotted turfy loam, and one-fourth fine sand, somewhat gritty, with a little well-rotted cow manure added, suits them very well. If the cow manure is not to be had, it is well not to use horse or other manure, but to water them occasionally, say once or twice a week, with well-diluted liquid manure when they have commenced growing. If grown singly in a pot each bulb will require a pot four or five inches in diameter. If three are grown together, and this produces a pretty effect, especially if different colors are mixed, a pot seven inches in diameter will be sufficient.

In planting them put about half an inch of clean sand immediately under the bulb, and let the bulb project about one-third of its depth above the surface of the soil, which should be pressed down very firmly. After they are potted water them and plunge the pots in some dry, sheltered situation out of doors, and cover them to the depth of five or six inches with sand, coal-ashes, or old tan-bark, protecting them from heavy rains by placing a piece of board or other water-proof material over them, but watering them moderately when the soil appears dry. In a few weeks the pots will be filled with roots, and the leaves and flower-stems will begin to show themselves, when they may be removed into the house; but care must be had not to expose the young leaves in their blanched state to the full rays of the sun, as the ends will become burned and disfigured. They should be kept in a shady part of the room, yet where they can get plenty of light until they become green, when they will be benefited by being exposed to the sun.

It must be borne in mind that good blooms can not be obtained unless the bulbs are previously well-rooted, and this they will not do if exposed to a higher temperature than 50° or 55°; after they are well-rooted they will thrive well in the ordinary temperature of a sitting-room or parlor. The principal reason why persons fail in blooming them well is because they put them into too high a temperature at first, which excites them to growth before they have made sufficient roots to sustain it. If it is not convenient to plunge them out of doors they may be placed in a dry, cool cellar, or even in a cool cupboard, in either case covering the pots with damp moss to the thickness of three or four inches, and surrounding the pots with the same. In this case it is perhaps more convenient to place the pots in a box—say an old soap or candle-box—filling the interstices between the pots with moss, and then covering them with the same material. If from any cause the flower-stem should not appear to elongate itself sufficiently, or to remain close set among the leaves at the crown of the bulb, a flower-pot of the same size as that in which it is planted, or a paper funnel, inverted over it for a few days will remedy the defect by drawing the stem up. When the blossoms begin to show color, and during the whole time of flowering, they should be moderately supplied with manure-water, as this greatly strengthens the flowers; but when the flowers begin to fade the manure-water should be withheld, as then it is very apt to be injurious to the bulb.

Hyacinths may also be grown in pots or any other vessels of an ornamental character, filled with moss or pure sand; but in such cases especial care must be taken that they are very carefully watered, for if the roots become dried in the least, the whole plant will become sickly and perish. When grown in such materials the same preparatory treatment is required as when grown in pots with mould.

All roots appear to have as instinctive a dislike to light as leaves and flowers have an ardent desire for it; for this reason the glasses best suited for growing bulbs in water are opaque, or of very dark colors, such as blue and green. Transparent glasses should never be used.

The glasses should be filled with water so that the base of the bulb just comes in contact with it, and then placed in a dark, dry, cool cellar or closet for three or four weeks, by which time the glasses will have become partially filled with roots, when they may be removed to the sitting-room or parlor, giving them but a moderate supply of light until the leaves become green, after which they should have as much light as possible, with plenty of air. The water in the glasses should be changed every two or three weeks, care being taken that it is of the same temperature as that in which the bulb has been growing; if this is neglected, the bulbs will receive a check, and the flower-stems will be much weakened. In changing the water, withdraw the bulb about half an inch from the glass, and then pour the water off, refilling the glass from a pitcher or other vessel with a spout. If the roots are wholly withdrawn they are apt to get broken, being very brittle, and are very liable to injury when being returned to the glass.

Sometimes the tips of the roots become enveloped with a pellicle of mucous matter, which is very injurious to them. This should be removed by withdrawing the roots from the glasses and gently cleansing them by immersing them in a basin of milk-warm water, and then drawing them gently through the hand a sufficient number of times to remove it. The glass should also be cleansed by washing it with soap and water before returning the roots to it. These pellicles may be in a great measure prevented by cleansing the glasses—when giving the bulbs fresh water—with milk-warm water very dilutely alkalinized with lime-water, common washing-soda, or cooking-soda. First pour off the water in the glass without fully withdrawing the roots; then fill it half full of warm water alkalinized by dissolving a piece of washing-soda about the size of a hazelnut, or half a tea-spoonful of cooking-soda, or a tea-spoonful of lime-water, to a quart of water; agitate rather gently, as in cleansing a bottle; then pour it off and refill the glass with fresh water.

After the flower-buds make their appearance the plants are much benefited by having a small quantity of diluted manure-water added to the water in the glass every fortnight. An ounce of guano dissolved in a quart of water, and a tea-spoonful of the solution added when the water is changed, answers a good purpose; or about a dram of carbonate of ammonia dissolved in a quart of water, and a tea-spoonful of the solution added when the water is changed, will be found to be beneficial.

When grown in the open air, Hyacinths and most other bulbs will do well in any light friable soil, having a liberal dressing of well-rotted manure well dug in; cow manure is the best. The soil should be dug deep and well pulverized; a spading fork is preferable to a spade for this operation. The crowns of the bulbs should be about four inches under the soil. They can be planted at any time until heavy frost sets in, when it is well to cover them with two or three inches of leaves, or long litter of any kind, so as to shield the bulbs from the effects of thawing and freezing during the winter, removing the litter early in the spring. They show to much better advantage when grown in groups of three or five bulbs than when grown singly; the bulbs should be from four to six inches apart from each other, and on no account touch each other.

As a general rule Hyacinths grown in glasses or moss are scarcely worth the trouble of saving; yet if it is considered desirable to do so, it can be done by taking them out of the water when they are done blooming, and planting them in pots filled with a light friable compost—say two-thirds loam and one-third sand—and watering them freely as long as the leaves are green, gradually withholding the water as the leaves become yellow and dry up. They may be planted out of doors in the ensuing autumn, and after remaining in the open ground for two or three years will then become flowering bulbs, suitable for outdoor culture. Those grown in pots are to be kept in a growing state after they are done blooming, and as soon as the weather is warm enough in the spring—about the middle of April or the beginning of May—they may be planted in the flower-beds out of doors, where they will eventually make good bulbs for pot culture again.

In selecting bulbs it should be remembered that the size of the bulb is not to be considered as a criterion of its value; many of the best sorts for general cultivation have but comparatively small or moderately-sized bulbs. Select bulbs that are hard and firm, and free from any fungus or signs of decay, rejecting such as give readily to a slight pressure of the hand, or appear to have the coatings or layers of the bulb laying loosely together. For indoor culture the single ones are far the best, blooming earlier and much more freely than the double ones; the spikes of bloom and the bells are also much larger.

We append a list of a few of the leading varieties that have been found to be most suitable for indoor culture:

DOUBLE RED.

Bouquet Tendre, fine deep red.
Grootvoorst, delicate blush.
Comtesse de la Coste, delicate rose, purple eye.

DOUBLE BLUE.

A la Mode, porcelain blue, purple eye.
Activité, agate blue.
La Grande Vedette, pale blue.

DOUBLE WHITE.

La Tour d'Auvergne, pure white.
Anna Maria, white, violet eye.
Sultan Achmet, white, yellow eye.

DOUBLE YELLOW.

Louis d'Or, straw-colored, reddish eye.
La Grandeur, clear yellow.
Goethe, cream-colored.

SINGLE RED.

L'Ami du Cœur, dark red.
Mars, deep red, green tips.
Lord Wellington, bluish red.

SINGLE BLUE.

L'Ami du Cœur, dark blue.
Baron von Thuyll, deep blue.
Orondatus, clear blue.

SINGLE WHITE.

La Candeur, pure white.
Grand Vainqueur, pure white.
Voltaire, bluish white.

SINGLE YELLOW.

La Pluie d'Or, pale yellow.
Heroine, yellow, green tips.
Roi des Pays-Bas, copper yellow.

For general outdoor cultivation it is not necessary to purchase the named varieties unless a person makes a specialty of this class of plants, or it is desirable to have some precise shade of color. The bulbs can be bought in mixtures of each leading color, either single or double, at much lower rates than when named. The sorts selected above would cost at any respectable seedsmen's or florist's from twenty-five to fifty cents each, whereas the mixtures would cost from one dollar and a half to two dollars per dozen; but, being smaller bulbs, they are not suitable for growing in glasses, although they do tolerably well for pot culture.

The culture of Early Tulips in pots, moss, or glasses is the same as for Hyacinths, only that they may be planted in smaller pots, or if planted several in a pot five of them may be put in a seven-inch pot or three in a five-inch pot, and of the Early Duc Van Tholl varieties even a larger number may be planted. Tulips when planted out of doors should be planted in groups of five or more together; they make a much finer show than when planted singly or only two or three together.

The Early Dwarf Duc Van Tholl Tulips form a distinct class, being very dwarf, very brilliant in color, and blooming very early. They are to be had of red, carmine, rose, vermilion, scarlet, white, and yellow, all single with the exception of a double variety which is red edged with yellow. There is another class of Early Tulips, blooming somewhat later than the Duc Van Tholl varieties but quite distinct from the ordinary garden tulips, which are very desirable for indoor culture on account of their brilliancy of color and their freedom of blooming, some of them being double. We select a few varieties:

EARLY DOUBLE TULIPS.

La Candeur, pure white.
Purple Crown, dark crimson.
Mariage de la Fille, white striped with red.
Admiral Kingsbergen, yellow striped with red.
Couronne des Roses, deep rose.
Imperator Rubium, deep scarlet.
Yellow Rose, deep yellow.
Tournesol, scarlet edged with yellow.
Duke of York, crimson edged with white.
Extrémité d'Or, crimson edged with yellow.
Gloria Solis, scarlet edged with yellow.
Blanche bordé Pourpre, white edged with purple.

EARLY SINGLE TULIPS.

Pottebakker, canary color.
Pottebakker, pure white.
Pottebakker, yellow and red striped.
Belle Alliance, crimson and gold.

Alba Regalis, cream white.
Pax Alba, pure white.
Wapen Von Leyden, white edged with rose.
Vermilion Brilliant, scarlet.
Cramoisi Royal, white with rose stripes.
Grisdelin Aimable, violet striped with lilac.
Lac d'Asturie, violet with white edge.
Bride of Haarlem, white edged with crimson.

When planted out of doors the bulbs should be planted about six inches apart, and the bulbs covered with three to four inches of mould and protected by leaves or litter.

The Polyanthus Narcissus are a very beautiful tribe of bulbs for indoor culture, requiring the same treatment as the Hyacinth, but the bulbs being larger they require somewhat larger pots, they are generally best grown singly in a pot. The best varieties are:

Grand Primo, white with citron cup.
Grand Monarque, white with yellow cup.
Grand Soleil d'Or, yellow with orange cup.
Paper White, pure white.
Bazelman Major, white with yellow cup.
Double Roman, white and yellow.

If the Double Roman is planted early, it can be made to bloom by Christmas.

Crocuses can be grown in any ordinary sitting-room window, by planting them in any convenient-sized pot, placing the bulbs about an inch apart and covering them with about two inches of mould, and treating them in other respects as Hyacinths. They are, however, generally grown in vases, pots, and other vessels made purposely for them, of various shapes and forms, as pyramids, hedge-hogs, baskets, etc. They can also be grown in sand or moss in saucers, bowls, etc., care being taken that they are never allowed to get dry; small glasses are also made for growing them in water. They can be had of various colors, viz.: white, blue, yellow, purple, and striped. Jonquils should be grown in pots only, treating them as Hyacinths, only more of them can be planted in a pot, as the bulbs are small.

Many other species of bulbs are found in the seedsmen's and florist's catalogues, but the above comprise all that can be grown successfully by the majority of persons who have not got the facilities afforded by green-houses or conservatories. If, however, any of our readers should desire to enlarge their collections, or to try their skill in cultivating other species, they can obtain catalogues from the leading seedsmen and florists, some of whom give short directions for the cultivation of the different species.

CHAPTER IX.

I GO TO LONDON.

It was at the George Inn, Warborough, that I spent the wretched night of my departure from Hauteville; but not in sleep. Slow and dreary were the hours of that hopeless night, as I lay in a small room of the inn, thinking of all I had lost, and the utter loneliness of the life that lay before me. I had opened and kissed Miss Hemsley's little Spanish volume, and had striven to pin my mind to those pious sentences of Kempis, or Gersen, or whoever was the saintly creature that composed them. But my spirit was too wide of that calm mystic region which the recluse inhabited, and I could not yet bring myself to take comfort from a consoler whose experience had so little in common with my own sorrows. I could but lay the precious volume under my pillow, as a charm or talisman, and then lie broad awake, thinking of my hard fate, which had from my very cradle—nay, before my birth itself—made me a mark for the poisoned arrows of hate.

I had not even so much curiosity as to open the note-book thrust upon me by my generous mistress. What cared I how rich or how poor I was to enter on my strange, friendless life? It was enough for me to know that my dear benefactress still loved and trusted me; and this knowledge was more precious to me than all the wealth of the Great Mogul, of whom I had lately read in the Jesuit Bernier's travels.

Before leaving Warborough I made all possible inquiries about the missing girl for whose absence I had been so unjustly blamed. After much questioning, and going from one person to another, I found one of the hangers-on of the coach-yard, who remembered to have seen Jack Hawker's daughter leave by the night mail, so close-hooded that it was only by accident he had caught a glimpse of her face, which he remembered by having seen her at market with her mother. He wondered what should be taking the girl to London, and made bold to ask her whether she was going out to service; but she had answered only by a shake of her head.

On this I went to the coach-office and questioned the clerk who booked the passengers' places; but here I could discover nothing to cast light upon Margery's departure. The places had all been engaged by persons of the male sex, but the clerk remembered one of these persons saying that the single place he engaged was wanted for a young woman. I sought in vain to obtain a description of this man. The clerk could only tell me that he looked like a gentleman's servant.

"I suppose you know all the servants at Hauteville Hall by sight?" I said; but the young man replied in the negative.

"Was the man who took the place short and stout, with reddish hair?" I asked.

"I rather think it was some such person," replied the clerk; "but as I didn't observe him closely I would scarce venture to be positive. He seemed in amazing haste to be gone."

The person I described was Mr. Lestrangle's valet and confidential follower; for I could not but think that gentleman was at the bottom of my foster-sister's flight, and had forged—or ordered the forging of—the letter which flung the guilt on me. I had good cause to know him as an unprincipled profligate, by the witness of his own lips; and I had heard his broadly-declared admiration of Margery's beauty. Nor could I forget the malignant look which he had given me when he surprised me on my knees at Miss Hemsley's feet. To gratify his own wickedness, and at the same time to ruin me in the estimation of my Hauteville friends, would be a double stroke of mischief to delight that cruel and treacherous nature.

I arrived in London at dusk, and great was my wonder at the vastness of the city; the noise and riot; the gaudy, painted signs of merchants and chapmen swinging across the street; the sedan-chairs with running footmen carrying flambeaux, which we met at the court-end of the town; the stark, ghastly heads of the Scottish traitors rotting on Temple Bar; the roar and turmoil; the noisy hucksters and impudent beggars who assailed the coach-door; the news-boys bellowing and blowing horns with as much excitement as if the Pretender had again landed on our shores, or the king been stabbed in his coach by some Jacobite desperado. At any other time I should doubtless have been both amused and delighted by the strangeness of these things; but my heart was burdened with too many cares and troubles, and I looked upon all I saw as on the scenes that pass before one's eyes in a dream—mere confused pictures in which one has no part.

It was of course too late to deliver my letter of recommendation to Mr. Swinfen, so I lay at the inn where the coach stopped, and spent another sleepless night in a stifling chamber, the one small window whereof opened upon a covered gallery that ran round the inner quadrangle of the house. The strange noises, the brawling of some drunken revelers in an apartment below, the arrival of ponderous wagons and coaches which lumbered into the court-yard long before cock-crow, would have deprived me of slumber even if my own uneasy thoughts had not been sufficient to keep me awake; and at cock-crow began shrill cries and bawlings of hucksters in the street without, mingled with a constant rumbling of wheels.

Never, I think, had I known the meaning of the word solitude until that bitter morning when I seated myself in a darksome little den, or partitioned corner of the coffee-room, called a box, and breakfasted alone in London. Crusoe on his desert island had at least the animal creation wherewith to consort; but I, in all this vast metropolis, knew not so much as a dog. Nor did the friendly looks of strangers invite my confidence. Roughness and impoliteness marked the manners of all I had hitherto encountered. Even the waiters seemed to regard me with suspicious looks; and I doubt not that my gloomy face and dispirited manner were calculated to inspire curiosity and disgust. The man who can not face the world with a smile is likely to be suspected of having some sinister cause for his despondency. I breakfasted quickly, and it was but eight o'clock when I had finished—too early an hour, most certainly, for a ceremonial visit to Mr. Swinfen. Nor had I the smallest inclination to explore the town, of whose wonders I had heard so much. What are sights and wonders to the man who has just been abruptly torn from all he loves? St. Peter's of Rome may be at his elbow, and he will scarce raise his weary eyes to look at it. The shadow of Pisa's leaning tower may slope across his pathway, and he will not take the trouble to glance from the shadow to the substance. I sat listlessly, with my arms folded on the little table before me, listening idly to the talk of customers ordering breakfast, and waiters attending upon them.

I had sat thus for nearly an hour, when I bethought myself of Lady Barbara's note-book, and, to while away the time, set myself to examine its contents. It was a little memorandum-book, originally of some twenty pages, but all except three of these had been torn out. One little silken pocket was crammed with bank-notes, which I unfolded, and found to amount to near three hundred pounds. But in another pocket there was something more precious than these bills on the directors of the Bank of England. This was an oval crystal locket, with gold rim, containing a miniature likeness of my dear lady, and a lock of dark hair, which I knew for hers. Nor was this all the comfort hidden in the tiny volume. One of the pages was inscribed with sentences of hope and counsel in Latin and English, hastily written for my consolation by the hand of my dear benefactress:

"Sperate, et vosmet rebus servate secundis."

The Lord also will be a refuge for the oppressed, a refuge in times of trouble.

Commit thy way unto the Lord.....Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him.

The wicked plotteth against the just.

The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord: and he delighteth in His way.

Though he fall he shall not be utterly cast down: for the Lord upholdeth him with His hand.

Tu fortis sis animo, et tua moderatio, constantia, eorum infamet injuriam."

I was thus rich in money and in friendship; and I began to feel that to persist in a dull and obstinate despair when so much yet remained to me would be beyond measure sinful. How different must have been my feelings if Lady Barbara and Dora Hemsley had believed in my guilt! as they might reasonably have done, considering the ingenious evidence that had been contrived against me. Revolving this in my mind, I resolved to face my position boldly, supported by the hope that my own actions might be made to prove the falsehood of my enemies. "I have my future all before me," I thought; "and am my own master. Hitherto I have been a child in leading-strings; my manhood dates from to-day, and it shall be my study so to plan my life that treachery itself can not assail it. I am not of so proud a nature as my father, and I freely accept this money from the hands of the dear lady to whom, under Providence, I owe my very life; nor is there any painfulness in the knowledge that I am so much indebted to her. I have youth, strength, and an excellent education; and it must go hard with me if with these weapons, and a resolute fortitude, I do not conquer in the battle of life. But I have first to learn something of the battle-ground, of which at present I know no more than a baby."

I called for a newspaper, hoping therefrom to learn something of what was stirring in this busy city, to which I was so utter a stranger; but the Daily Courant—a sheet which the waiter brought me—gave little information on this head. It was chiefly taken up by our foreign politics, the enormous subsidies or gifts granted to the Empress Queen and certain German princes; by which it appeared that Britain had been made to pay very dearly for a peace that was worse wanted by her allies than by herself. One paragraph that attracted my attention was an account of a new colony that had just been formed in Nova Scotia. Four thousand persons, with their families, had lately embarked for this wild, unknown region, tempted by the liberality of the Government, which offered a free passage out, and a freehold of fifty acres to each settler, with ten years' exemption from all taxes.

"Why should I not go thither," I thought, "and flee like a new Æneas from the ashes of my Troy? In that new world, if I have no friends, I should have at least no enemies, and I might make myself a name and a home among settlers as friendless as myself."

The thought was but for a moment. What would home or friends or name be to me without Dorothea Hemsley?

"Perish the thought of new lands across the sea," I said to myself; "I will stay in England and be near the dear girl I love, perhaps to serve her in some hour when she may need the strong arm of a faithful friend."

To this bold outburst followed sudden despondency. Alas, poor wretch! should I be any nearer Dora at London than at Nova Scotia? She was severed from me by a gulf more impassable than that sea which the American emigrants had traversed under command of Colonel Cornwallis.

At noon I left the inn, and inquired my way to the Temple. Being now in a somewhat more hopeful frame of mind, I regarded the bustle of the streets with curiosity, and was even amused by the strangeness of all I saw. My way took me again beneath the gloomy arch which I had ridden under in the coach, and I looked up with a shudder toward those ghastly severed heads which were impaled there as bloody memorials of a nation's severity. I could but think this dreadful exhibition eminently calculated to keep alive the Jacobite feeling which Lady Barbara had told me was by no means drowned in the blood that had been shed since '45, and I wondered much at the foolish policy which had elevated traitors into martyrs.

I was much pleased with the tranquil and studious air of the Temple, whose shadowy courts and solemn squares seemed to me to bespeak it a retreat for learning. I had yet to discover how such appearances may deceive, and how many a shallow pate idles and drinks and games away existence in a suit of chambers, the very atmosphere of which whispers of a Bacon or a Selden.

Mr. Swinfen's apartments I discovered in a noble row of houses commanding a view of the river, on which I saw innumerable boats plying, and all the pleasant water-traffic I had read of in the Spectator. Towering grandly above all meaner roofs I saw the noble dome of St. Paul's, and beyond many spires and steeples dimly blue in the hazy distance, for there was a notable difference between the sky that overarched this city, and the clear ether above Hauteville Woods.

The gentleman to whom I was recommended was happily at home, and received me with much graciousness.

"I would do a great deal to serve any relative of Lady Barbara's," he said, courteously, after he had read my patroness's letter; "I knew her father, and I remember her ladyship before she married Lestrangle. She spent but one short season in London before her marriage, and would have been one of the reigning belles of that season but that she was too modest to assume so public a position. And so you are an Ainsleigh? Are you nearly related to that Roderick Ainsleigh of whom Lord Hauteville was so fond?"

"I am his only child, Sir."

"Indeed! I did not know he lived so long as to marry."

I felt my face flush at this.

"His marriage was an obscure one, Sir, and he died in poverty. But for Lady Barbara's goodness I doubt if I should be living to tell as much. I owe every thing to her."

"And I am glad to see that you are proud to acknowledge your indebtedness," replied Mr. Swinfen, kindly.

After this he talked much to me, examining me as to my education, and directing me in the course which I should have to take in order to prepare for entering the profession that had been chosen for me. I will not linger over the details of this period of my life, since the labor I devoted to the study of the law was wasted work. The career which I thus begun was destined to have neither middle nor end, but to be abruptly cut short almost at the outset. Fate called me to a harder life than that of a law-student, and it was my lot to play my humble part in a more stirring drama than was ever enacted in that grave sanctuary of legal lore in which I now took up my abode.

My patron kindly sent one of his clerks with me to hunt for a set of chambers suited to my purse and position.

"You can not practice too much economy at the outset of your career," said Mr. Swinfen, just before he dismissed me. "Advancement at the Bar is a plant of slow growth, and the man is lucky who, after some eight or ten years' patient industry, can command bread and cheese, and wear a decent coat. But if the struggle be a hard one the prizes are splendid; and the man of parts who can dine on a red herring and a dish of tea, or a four-penny plate of beef from the eating-house, may hope to mount the wool-sack. I trust you have an inward conviction that you are destined to be Lord Chancellor, Mr. Ainsleigh?"

"Indeed no, Sir," I answered, smiling.

"Then I am sorry for it. Every man who passes the Temple gate should say to himself, 'Bacon, or nothing!'"

"And suppose it is nothing, Sir?"

"For such a man there is no possibility of utter failure. In trying for the highest rung of the ladder he will at least contrive to scramble to the middle. But for the fellow who enters his name at the Temple because it is a genteel thing to do it, who spends his nights at Vauxhall, and wastes his substance at cards and in cock-pits, and brings loose-lived women to his chambers, and cheats his tailor to sport a suit of cut velvet in the Ring, the road he travels is the highway that leads to the dogs. I hope you are not come to London to be a man of pleasure, Mr. Ainsleigh."

"I have little inclination for pleasure, Sir, and not a single acquaintance in this city."

"So much the better," growled Mr. Swinfen; "and now go along with you, for I have half a dozen attorney fellows waiting in the next room. My clerk will find you decent chambers, and will see you safely through the formalities of your entrance. Good-day. Dine with me on Tuesday next, at four o'clock. I have a haunch from a ducal demesne that will be in prime order by that time, and you will meet some gentlemen from whom a nod in public is a patent of social standing for a youngster."

I thanked Mr. Swinfen for his kindness, and departed in company of the clerk, a decent elderly person, who quickly found for me a couple of small rooms in a house in Brick Court, which was afterward destined to become famous as the abode of genius and poetry. The rooms were at the top of the house, and commanded an extensive view of roofs and chimney-pots; but they were cheap, and of this advantage I was fully conscious, as I was bent on extreme economy in my management of Lady Barbara's handsome gift.

When all preliminary ceremonies had been duly gone through, at an outlay which absorbed a good deal of my dear benefactress's money, Mr. Swinfen's clerk left me, and as I stood alone in my somewhat cheerless garret I felt that now I had begun the world in real earnest.

I sent to the city inn for my portmanteau, and went out myself to purchase certain books which Mr. Swinfen had informed me were necessary for me to possess, at the same time that he offered me free use of his own noble library of law-books, which he bade me convey to and fro from his chambers to my own as I needed them.

On the following Tuesday I dined at my patron's chambers among a party of gentlemen, the youngest of whom was at least twenty years my senior. The talk was of politics and of legal matters. I heard much of the Duke of Newcastle and his brother, Mr. Pelham, and of that rising politician, Mr. Pitt, then only paymaster of the forces, but already exercising considerable influence in the senate. There was also much discussion of the great will-case of Barnsley versus Powell and others, that had been decided in the previous year, and the details of which had lately been published by a bookseller in Fleet Street. To this and all other conversation I listened with respectful interest, pleased to hear the discussion of clever members of that profession in which it was my earnest desire to prosper.

And now began for me a life of the extremest loneliness. Secluded day after day in my garret-chambers, waited on at rare intervals by a deaf old woman, who came and went with a stolid mechanical air, and looked at me with a dull unseeing gaze as she flourished her well-worn broom or knelt to light my fire, as if scarce conscious of my existence, I was little less remote from the world than if I had been the pious inmate of some cave hewn in the solid rock by one of Iona's early bishops.

On the days when I dined in hall I did certainly exchange some civil commonplaces with my companions at table; but these were would-be beaux, who knew the town, and boasted loudly of their acquaintance with fine gentlemen and their conquests among fine ladies. I was, indeed, at once horrified and disgusted by the tone in which these scoundrels talked of women of quality, whom I have since discovered they knew only by name. Sometimes toward evening I found my spirits oppressed by an almost painful sense of solitude. I felt a desire to hear my own voice, nay, sometimes even a panic-stricken notion that I had lost the faculty of speech, so strange sounded the syllables when I tried to roll out a few lines of Demosthenes, or demanded with Cicero how it came to pass that, for the last twenty years, no man had been my enemy who had not also shown himself a foe to the republic.

On these occasions, when my eyes ached with long hours of reading, and my head was heavy from the continuance of study, I snatched up my hat, ran down stairs, and went out in the fog and drizzling rain, or in the bleak winter wind, to loiter in the crowded streets, and amuse myself with the busy life about me. And in this the hermit of London has a supreme advantage over the rustic solitary. Friendless he may be, but never quite companionless, for in every coffee-house or city tavern he can find company which, if not select, is by no means uninteresting. While my legal education progressed steadily in the solitude of my garret-chamber, the streets and the humbler class of coffee-houses enlightened me as to the ways of the world. I learned to talk politics, became vastly familiar with the affairs of the Prince of Wales and his party, railed against the old king for his devotion to ugly women, reviled the Duke of Cumberland, growled at the money taken from us by the Prince of Wolfenbuttel, and eagerly perused the adventures of the young Ascanius, a romantic history of the Chevalier Charles Edward's adventures in the year forty-five. I purchased this luckless Prince's bust in plaster, which was at this time much sold in London; while a wealthy squire in Staffordshire went so far as to clothe a fox in a scarlet military coat, and hunt him with hounds clad in tartan.

I remembered what Anthony Grimshaw had told me of my father's sentiments on this subject, and was already at heart a staunch Jacobite. Nay, I think the frequent sight of those ghastly eager hope. Should I see her as well as Lady Barbara? Alas, I knew that no good could come of any meeting between us two. But none the less eager was my longing—none the less sweet the dreams in which sleep restored my lost happiness, and I fancied that Dora and I were seated side by side in the sunny window at Hauteville, with our books about us, as we had sat so often in the summer days that were gone.

It was while I was looking forward to the arrival of the family in St. James's Square that a change took place in my mode of life, and the loneliness of my humble chambers was exchanged for company which I found sufficiently agreeable.

I had returned to my chambers late after treating myself to a sight of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, which was then being played at the rival houses, at one Garrick and Miss Bellamy, at the other Barry and Mrs. Cibber, on which the wits declared that one saw at one house Romeo and Juliet, at the other Juliet and Romeo. Several distinguished members of Mr. Garrick's company had withdrawn themselves to Covent Garden, and there had been complaints made of him in a prologue, whereon Mrs. Cibber replied sharply in an epilogue spoken by her at Drury Lane, and there was war between the patent Theatres. It was to see Garrick that I had spent my shillings, and the delight afforded me by that great man's trophies on Temple Bar would in itself have been sufficient to inspire me with sedition. But in the character and fortunes of the Pretender there was an all-powerful magnet which drew to him the youth of the nation. What generous lad or sentimental woman would be faithful to an elderly German ruler while the brave young heart of an exiled Prince was pining in obscurity, dependence, and banishment, and while the country from which he was excluded seemed to have gained so little by its ill-treatment of him?

"WHEN I HAD MANAGED TO LIGHT MY SOLITARY CANDLE I TURNED AND SCRUTINIZED THIS NEW ACQUAINTANCE," ETC.

I had lived in London three months, and had eaten my Christmas dinner at a tavern in Fatter Lane. Once only had I heard from Lady Barbara, though I had written to her at the milliner's address several times. Her letter was long and kind. She gave much comfort and wise advice, but, alas! little news of her whose name alone would to my eyes have shone upon the page as if written in starlight. Of my foster-father and his wife the charitable lady wrote with deep tenderness. Nothing had been heard of the poor runaway, and the hearts of father and mother were all but broken. Lady Barbara had been many times to see them. Sir Marcus and his family were to come to London in January, and then my dear benefactress said she would contrive to see me, though it must needs be by stealth.

From this letter I derived new comfort; to this promised meeting I looked forward with genius had amply repaid me for my extravagance.

It was black as Erebus on the staircase leading to my garret, but I was accustomed to the crazy old stair, and mounted quickly without tripping. But close by my own door I stumbled against some heavy body.

"Who is this?" I called out, surprised.

"A wretch who would be lying on a door-step in the open street if he were not sheltered here. You are new to London, Mr. Ainsleigh, and should have some spark of charity's divine warmth yet left in your heart. I crept here at dusk, thinking to find you at home, and have lain here in hiding ever since. Will you give me a supper and a night's shelter?"

"I would rather give you the money to pay for them," I answered, "since you and I are strangers."

"That is your true London charity—alms given at arm's-length," replied the stranger, with a sneer. "I don't want your money; I want your friendship."

I could see nothing of the man's face or figure in the darkness, but he spoke like a gentleman, or at least a man of some education.

"Come, Mr. Robert Ainsleigh," he continued, "you had best take me into your chambers, and strike a light. We shall understand one another better when we see each other's faces. I do not come to you as the first that offers, and a crown from you is not the same as another man's five shillings. For the last week I have been hanging about the Temple, where I was once a student-at-law, and have watched you come and go. I like your face. I feel an interest in you that I don't feel in other men, because you are beginning life pretty much as I began it, and with the same chances before you. You stand almost alone in the world, as I did, and you belong to a good old family, as I do."

"How do you know all this?"

"From a clerk of Swinfen's, who remembers me when I was a gentleman. Come, Mr. Ainsleigh, you had better unlock your door and strike a light."

I had no inclination whatever to admit this forward stranger into my rooms, but yielded weakly because I knew not how to refuse. I opened my door, and the unknown followed close upon my heels, as if determined I should have no time to change my mind. When I had managed to light my solitary candle I turned and scrutinized this new acquaintance as closely as the feeble glimmer of the tallow-candle would allow me.

He was a man of from thirty to five-and-thirty years of age, with a face that had once been handsome, but which was prematurely worn by care or dissipation. He wore no wig, but his light brown hair, plentiful at the back though his brow was bald, was tied with a greasy black ribbon. His clothes were of the shabbiest, but had once been fine. His eyes were large, gray, and penetrating; but I was at this time too bad a judge of countenance to perceive their sinister expression. As it was, however, his face did in no wise prepossess me, and when I too weakly yielded to him I was influenced by his conversation alone. He had groped for a chair while I lighted my candle, and sat by my cheerless hearth, shivering.

"Let me light your fire," he cried, espying the fuel in a box by the rusty fender. "I can make a fire as well as any Temple laundress, and cook a steak better than most of them."

He suited the action to the word, and was on his knees piling up coals and fire-wood in the little grate before I could object.

"And now, Mr. Ainsleigh," he said, flinging himself into a chair when the fire was lighted, "let us talk reasonably. You are a solitary young man, just beginning the world, with fair prospects of success, and with, I have no doubt, a decent allowance from your aristocratic kinswoman."

"What right have you to be so certain of my business?" I asked, angrily.

"The right which knowledge of the world gives to every man who is not an arrant block-head. I know you are living on money from your kinswoman by the left hand—"

"Sir!"

"Pshaw! let us have no affectation of anger. What if I knew your father? I'll not say I did, but I know those who knew him. I know you are a dependent on the bounty of Lady Barbara Lestrangle, and that you were turned out of doors by her husband."

"Oblige me by carrying your knowledge elsewhere, Sir. It is close upon midnight, and I do not care to be entertained with your version of my biography."

"I want to show you that I am no flatterer, and that I can beg without licking the shoes of my patron. Come, Mr. Ainsleigh, you want a servant and I want a master. Give me a closet to sleep in, or let me lie on the mat at your door. You pay your laundress something, and I will do her work for nothing. I know more law than many a prosperous counselor, and can give you some help in your studies if you will consent to take it from such a vagabond as me. I can valet you, and cook for you, run on your errands, and show you the town, which I know by heart, and which is a profounder science than you may fancy. I want a shelter—and a friend."

"Friendship is scarcely won by such means as you employ."

"Say, then, an acquaintance, a companion. Some one fresh, and young, and true, with whom a battered wretch may consort to the profit of his soul and body. Mind you, Mr. Ainsleigh, I am a beggar to-night, but not a beggar always. I suppose you have heard of that notorious beast of burden, the bookseller's hack? That is my species. I have a prose translation of Homer that I hope yet to turn into cash, in a portmanteau in pawn at my last lodging."

"From the Greek?"

"No; from Chapman. I know something of Greek too, but we bookmakers prefer adapting the labors of a predecessor. I have also a history of that strange extinct race the Amazons, which I think might tempt Mr. Cave, could I but approach him in a decent coat."

It is needless to dwell longer on my conversation with this gentleman, whose persuasion ultimately prevailed with me. That he was a man of some education and had fallen from a better estate, was very obvious; and this touched me, for I remembered that my father's condition must have much resembled that of this penniless stranger. And then common humanity pleaded for this unfortunate. Could I, who had been reared by charity, refuse a shelter and a crust to another? True, the man might be a rogue; but true compassion first feeds and clothes the reprobate before it essays to reform him. Swayed by these considerations I consented to share my lodgings with the stranger. I assisted him to make up a bed on the floor of my sitting-room, selected for him a few articles from my well-stocked wardrobe, and promised that, so long as he proved honest and I had money, he should not starve. And thus, on the very threshold of manhood, I suffered myself to be coaxed into an alliance with a vagabond, of whom I knew nothing save that he was impudent and persevering.

Work-Basket.

MATERIALS: Perforated card-board, steel, crystal, and chalk beads, black and blue zephyr wool, blue filoselle silk, fine black sewing-silk, black ribbon two inches wide, blue cashmere, heavy cord.

Four illustrations show the manner of making this pretty flat basket. The inner surface is of perforated card-board worked in Berlin work, while the outside of the basket is covered with blue cashmere. The handle and edge consist of a roll which is covered with black silk and a bead network. First work a piece of perforated card-board ten inches long by seven inches wide. Embroider the squares, which are worked with black silk, in the manner shown by Fig. 2, seven rows half cross stitch (backward and forward). This done, embroider the squares which are worked in satin stitch, in doing which work, first, the under layer with blue wool and only over four holes, and after this two other layers with wool, and lastly one with blue silk, each successive one in the opposite direction from the last. Fig. 2 shows this distinctly. Lastly, sew on the steel beads which edge the squares. Now cover the other side of this with cashmere over a pasteboard lining and fasten to the border, in doing which full in the edges sufficiently to give the basket the form of the illustration. For making the border take a heavy double cord of the requisite length, join the ends, and wind it regularly with black wool until it is about three-fourths of an inch in diameter, after which cover with black silk and with a bead net-work. Work this net-work as follows: having fastened the thread on the roll, string on two chalk beads, then six times alternately three glass beads and three chalk beads, after which three glass beads, and join this in a ring around the roll by running the thread through the first chalk bead. Now string on the thread one chalk bead, three glass beads, three chalk beads, three glass beads, one chalk bead, and run the thread (passing over an equal number of stitches) through the middle one of the second next three chalk beads of the ring, and continue in this manner till the roll is covered with a bead net in the manner shown by Fig. 1. Fig. 3 gives a section of the beaded net spread out in full size. Fig. 4 gives another way of making the net. This can be executed by reference to the illustration. The handle of the basket is arranged in the same manner as the border, and fastened between the embroidered part and the outside cover. The sides where it is fastened on are covered with rosettes of loops of crystal beads, which have been strung on wire. Under the roll arrange a fringe of crystal and chalk beads, which are interwoven in the manner shown on Fig. 1.

Case for Drawing Materials.

MATERIALS: Golden-beetle-colored leather, brown silk, brown silk braid one-third of an inch wide, muslin, oiled silk, green silk twist and sewing silk, yellow silk twist, narrow brown silk, elastic braid.

This case is made of golden-beetle-colored leather, lined with brown silk and edged with brown silk braid; the braid is ornamented with a row of herring-bone stitch of green silk twist. The initials are embroidered on one end with green and yellow silk in satin stitch and oblique half-polka stitch. In the inside of the case are arranged several bands for the reception of the implements. The little pocket is lined with oiled silk, and is designed for the reception of stamps, crayons, colors, etc. Figs. 36-38, of the Supplement, give the pattern of the case. The pieces may be sewed together by reference to the illustration and to the corresponding figures on the pattern. In Fig. 37 run the seam from 71 on 71 to 70, then from 71 to 72.

Spectacle Case.

MATERIALS: Pasteboard, brown silk, fine brown silk cord. This convenient spectacle case is easily made. The original is covered with brown silk, and embroidered with brown silk cord. Cut of silk from Figs. 83 and 84 of the Supplement each one piece, baste each of these pieces on a piece of stiff muslin, sew on the cord according to the design given, then line each piece with the pasteboard, and this with a brown lining. Having cut the two cross lines shown on Fig. 84, and corded the edge of the openings, join the two pieces according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, and edge with the silk cord.

THE MOONSTONE.

A NOVEL.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

Author of "Armada," "The Woman in White,"
"No Name," "Antonina," "Queen of Hearts," &c., &c.

With many Illustrations.

8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

The style alone would secure for it a prominent place among modern works of fiction. Its merits in this respect are apt to be lost sight of in the very remarkable plot, to the construction of which Mr. Wilkie Collins has brought endless ingenuity and labor. The arrangement of the materials is admirable.—London Review.

 Altogether The Moonstone is one of the most remarkable novels of the day, its literary excellence being not the least of its many merits.  If any writer of the time possesses the faculty of interesting his readers in his work, it is Mr. Wilkie Collins. Indeed, he possesses it in so great a degree as to withdraw attention from other faculties of his, which are full as worthy of admiration. The mass of his readers are so astounded at his skill in concocting and unraveling plots that they forget to observe his skill in delineating character. In The Moonstone the characters and the scenes through which they move are exceedingly life-like.—Albion.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE GREAT REBELLION.

HARPER'S PICTORIAL HISTORY OF THE REBELLION. By ALFRED H. GUERNSEY and HENRY M. ALDEN. Complete in Two Vols., with nearly One Thousand Illustrations. Quarto, Cloth, $6 00 each.

This work contains 998 Illustrations. Of these 562 are authentic representations of Scenes and Incidents in the War; 99 Maps and Plans of Battles, among which is a large Colored Map of the Southern States, showing the position of nearly every place of note, together with the great lines of communication; and 337 Portraits of persons who have borne a prominent civil or military part in the war.

I have seen no other History of the Rebellion that seems to embrace so many admirable qualities as this does. I wish that so carefully prepared, beautifully illustrated, and reliable a History of our late Civil War might be placed in the library of every Grammar and High School and Academy in our country.—ABNER J. PHIPPS, Agent of the Massachusetts State Board of Education.

This is as valuable a work as ever was compiled on a historical subject.—Zion's Herald.

A careful, comprehensive, minute, and graphic record of the origin and progress of the war; and in the size and beauty of its pages and paper, in the profuseness, costliness, elegance, and completeness of its illustrations, far exceeding any other history yet attempted.—New York Observer.

A thoroughly well written and complete history of the great war.—World.

Clearly, simply, and impartially written.—London Spectator.

Many of its illustrative pictures are the best that we have seen in such a work; and some of the numerous portraits of prominent actors in the war are admirable as likenesses and works of art.—London Athenaeum.

Every thing that relates to the contest is here given—military and naval operations, political matters, financial matters, and so forth—and always in a style that is as clear as it is strong, and with entire impartiality. The criticisms are sound and weighty, and full justice is done to each and every department of the public service, and to the enemy. The great story is told with spirit and fidelity, and in a tone that must be acceptable to all persons of sound taste. . . . The Pictorial History of the Great Rebellion in no sense depends upon its illustrations for its worth, though they are excellent specimens of the art, and help the reader to understand the incidents of the war. The real merits of the work are apart from its engravings. Those merits are a strong and lucid style, a vast amount of well-digested and well-told information, just and well-considered criticisms, and impartial statements of all points about which there are disputes. . . . Every library should have this work, for it is one of singular value as a book of reference, because of its comprehensiveness as well as accuracy. . . . As a work of general reading it is of unsurpassed value.—Boston Traveller.

Full of interesting matter.—London Review.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA: ITS ORIGIN, AND AN ACCOUNT OF ITS PROGRESS DOWN TO THE DEATH OF LORD RAGLAN. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. Vol. II. now ready. With Maps and Plans. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Vol.

Whatever opinion may be formed of some of the author's deductions, no one can hesitate to allow that he has clearly devoted the utmost patience to the sifting of a mass of materials by which a less laborious or clear-sighted writer would have been confused, if not overwhelmed. The polished diction and burnished style which first made their author famous are still maintained in this volume; and were the interest of the subject even less momentous, they would be eagerly read as specimens of a literary production of consummate skill.—Saturday Review.

By a happy accident the author has acquired extraordinary opportunities and advantages for ascertaining and verifying the incidents of a remarkable episode in history, with which the national honor is inextricably mixed up. He has shown himself willing to undergo any amount of personal sacrifice and responsibility for the adequate performance of what, to him, is both a public and a private duty. He has instituted a careful survey of the localities; he has consulted and collected dispatches and correspondence without end; he has personally communicated with statesmen and warriors, with almost all the leading actors and many of the less prominent characters who have figured on the scene, and he has got together a mass of information perhaps unequalled in pari materia for fullness, accuracy, interest, and variety.—Fraser's Magazine.

(In regard to the Charge of the Light Brigade.) Mr. Kinglake, in our opinion, states the case in its different aspects, clearly and impartially, and is disposed rather to extenuate faults than to set down aught in malice. . . . Mr. Kinglake in his present volume fully sustains his reputation; and this is saying much. Few non-professional men have ever so completely mastered the true spirit of the art of war, or described military events with such graphic power; fewer still can clothe their impressions in such pure and nervous English.—Examiner.

Mr. Kinglake has exhibited extraordinary powers as a historian in his account of the Battle of Balaklava. The minuteness with which he traces all the movements of that terrible action—the care and industry with which he weighs the several and sometimes conflicting accounts—the mastery of detail and knowledge of military tactics which he displays—and the general vividness of the narrative, which often seems to glow with the light and echo with the roar of mortal combat, combine to form one of the most remarkable pictures of a great battle which our literature can boast. Sometimes composed in the spirit of military criticism—calm, cool, and observant—and at others in that of some modern prose Homer, who feels the inspiration of the fight, and kindles with the personal heroism of individual actors, it shows throughout the hand of a master in this species of writing.—London Review.

FACETIÆ.

TIM B.—Is a life insurance agent, and a most inveterate punster. Walking down street not long ago he met a friend who is largely in the tobacco trade, and who, knowing Tim's fondness for the "weed," was exhibiting a sample, and dilating upon the exceeding good qualities of the same, when Tim interrupted with, "I say, old fellow, why don't you set your wife up in business?" The question was a poser, but brought the proper inquiry of "What do you mean?" "Why," said he, coolly, "nothing, only you have so much capital to back-er" (capital tobacco). Cigars were in order, and Tim, "feeling relieved," walked down to the wharf just as the good steamboat Elector was leaving port, when he called to her second officer, "I say, Jack, are you the mate, or the man that buys the mate?" (meat).

WHAT THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO SWITZERLAND REALLY MEANS.

As some anxiety seems to exist in the minds of certain politicians as to the real objects of Queen Victoria's trip to Lucerne, we are happy to inform them that they are:

1. The establishment of an alliance, offensive and defensive, between England, Spain, Italy, Russia, the Pope, Austria, Sweden, and Montenegro, for the total absorption of France by the various members of this new Grand Alliance.

2. The propagation of Orleanist documents throughout France by means of white mice trained for that purpose.

3. The total removal of the Alps, and rearrangement of the same as an ice barrier around the coasts of England, provided only that the Wenham Lake Ice Company can be induced to consent to the measure.

4. The creation of large vineyards all round the Swiss Lakes, to the infinite prejudice of the French Champagne trade.

ABOVE THAT KIND OF THING.

SISTER. "Come, now, go and talk to little Miss Brown, Freddy, and be agreeable."

FREDDY. "Oh, bother, no. I'm not going to make myself conspicuous and spooney, like you and Captain Noodle!"

A wag suggests that a suitable opening for many choirs would be: "O Lord, have mercy on us miserable singers!"

NAUTICAL NEATNESS.—Sweeping the horizon with a glass.

SCIENTIFIC NOTE.—The appearance of the mosquito may be regarded as the immediate effect of a quatuor-mospheric change.

An orator, who had raised his audience to a great height by his lofty soarings, exclaimed: "I will now close in the beautiful and expressive language of the poet—I forget his name—and—I forget what he said, too."

THE FASTEST THING OUT.—A conductor's baton. It beats time.

POINT BLANK.

ELLEN. "Now, don't you Like this much better than Croquet, and a lot of Stupid People?"
[The Major thinks he does—RATHER!]

PATERFAMILIAS, SURROUNDED BY HIS FAMILY, WRITETH AN ODE TO THE OCEAN.

The sea, the sea, the wide, the open sea—
(My dear! I'm sure I've heard that line before:)
Thou art the blue, the fresh, the ever free—
(John, I don't think you locked the bedroom door.)

O, Father Ocean! how these words recall
Our navy's glories, reaped in many zones—
(If Jane's not careful, dear, that baby'll fall;
And Charley, you give over throwing stones.)

I love thee, Ocean, in thy calmer mood,
When, like a mirror, in the morning sun
Thy surface shines—(now, Ellen, don't be rude;
And Tommy, give the baby back her bun.)

I love to be upon the open sea,
With the waves dancing bright beneath the keel—
(If in the cupboard, John, you left the key,
We sha'n't have meat left for another meal.)

O, Father Ocean! I must leave thee now,
Though half thy glories I have not yet told;
Farewell! I leave thee—(Johnny, stop that row, Ma's beckoning to us—dinner's getting cold.)

LOSS OF TIME.—A lady, who was desperately addicted to play, was confessing herself. The priest, among other arguments to dissuade her from gaming, said "she ought to consider the loss of time." "Ah, father," said she, "that is always what vexes me, so much time is lost in shuffling."

The stars are called wicked because they sin-till-late.

THE NOVEL STYLE OF NOVEL-READER.

HUSBAND (Old style question). "What! dipping into the third volume, to see if every one is married?"
WIFE (New style of answer). "Oh, they were married in the first volume. I only wanted to see if it was really her husband who poisoned her."

A clergyman was sent for the other day. The man was rather deaf to whom he was called. "What induced you to send for me?" pompously said the clergyman. "Eh?" "What induced you," he repeated, "to send for me?" "What does he say?" said the man to his wife. "He says, what the deuce did you send for him for?"

A temperance lecturer, descending on the superior virtues of cold water, remarked: "When the world had become so corrupt that the Lord could do nothing with it, he was obliged to give it a thorough sousing in cold water." "Yes," replied a toper present, "but it killed every critter on the face of the earth."

The following advertisement appears in a Canada paper: "Will the gentleman who stole my melons last Saturday night be generous enough to return me a few of the seeds, as they are a choice variety."

A lady who changed an i for a y and added an e to her name, while abroad, was recently asked if she had seen the Dardanelles. "Oh yes," she replied, "we dined with them in Paris."

Are people who attend hops naturally fond of ale?

A fresh arrival from England went the other day to a livery stable, and expressed a wish for a carriage. The man in attendance asked if he would like a buffalo. The cockney seemed startled, and stammered out: "Well, I think I'd rather 'ave a 'oss."

A swain visiting his girl the other day found her putting up preserves, and covering the jars with his love-letters. Those beginning "Darling Susan" were put on the peaches, and those with "My Own Love" on the apples. He left in disgust when she asked him to write another of the latter sort to make up the number she wanted.

THE MOST POPULAR MAN OF THE BOOT AND SHOE TRADE—The sherry cobbler.

A critic, speaking of Pater's vocalism, says: "We hang upon every note." "This," says a contemporary, "is a proof of the lady's remarkable powers of execution."

A physician stopped at the shop of a country apothecary, and inquired for a pharmacopœia. "Sir," said the apothecary, "I know of no such farmer living about these parts."

"Waiter, I'll take my hat," said a gentleman at a party, who was about going home. "What kind of hat did you wear?" "A bran-new hat, that I bought this very morning." "Well, Sir," said the waiter, "all the good hats have been gone more than two hours."

A lady was once declaring that she could not understand how gentlemen could smoke. "It certainly shortens their lives," says she. "I don't know that," replied the gentleman. "There is my father, who smokes every blessed day, and he is now seventy years old." "Well," was the reply, "if he had never smoked he might have been eighty."

When Adam and Eve partook of the tree of knowledge did they study the higher branches?

THE REFRESHMENT AN IDLE MAN WOULD PREFER—Loaf cake.

What is smaller than a mite's mouth? Its tongue.

RIGHT AND LEFT.—Two Quaker girls were ironing on the same table. One asked the other what side she would take, the right or left? She answered, promptly: "It will be right for me to take the left, and then it will be left for thee to take the right."

PLEASANT FALLS.—Falling in love with a pretty girl falling heir to a hundred thousand dollars.

A CRAFTY OCCUPATION—Ship-building.

There's a gentleman in Philadelphia so considerate for the comfort of others that he won't have a mosquito to canopy over his bed. He wouldn't deprive even a gallinipper of fulfilling the evident ends of his creation.

NATURE'S TAILORING—A potato patch.

BEAUTY AND THE BEAST.—(AT THE SEA-SIDE.)

Fall Styles of Hair Dressing.

See illustrations on first page.

We give several illustrations of the newest styles of hair dressing, some with the natural hair and some with chignons, braids, and curls.

Figs. 1 and 2.—Coiffure for girl from 12 to 14 years old. The front of the hair is rolled back as shown by the illustration, then joined with the back hair and plaited together on each side in a three-strand braid, which ends in a curl. A colored velvet ribbon is wound around the top of the head and the braids. If the hanging braids are not desired, they may be arranged as shown by Fig. 2, or in any other manner that individual taste may direct.

Figs. 3 and 4.—Fleur de lis coiffure. The chignon belonging to this coiffure is in the shape of the well-known fleur de lis, the royal flower of France. The front hair is combed down over the forehead and back at the sides, and arranged at the back as shown in the illustration, with a braid across the front.

Figs. 5-7.—Negritine coiffure. This chignon consists of interwoven strands of crimped hair, the hair being puffed on the top of the head. The puffs are separated by a tortoise-shell band, and a similar band passes over the top of the chignon. Fig. 7 shows the manner of parting the hair preparatory to dressing it in this manner. On the small braid which is made of the middle front hair fasten the ends of the front hair as well as the chignon.

Fig. 8.—Coiffure of curls. This coiffure consists of a curled chignon (Fig. 12), a strand of knotted hair (Fig. 11), and a band over the front. The natural hair is combed backward and covered with the chignon.

Fig. 9 shows the manner of using the crimping-pin.

Fig. 10.—Diadem of curls.

Fig. 11.—Marguerite knot.

Fig. 12.—Curled chignon.

Fig. 13.—Fleur de lis chignon of braids.

Fig. 14.—Chignon of braids fastened on a comb. The end left hanging is to be fastened under the braids already arranged.

MODERN HOSPITALITY.

HOSPITALITY is a word seldom used nowadays, and as the virtue is nearly extinct, it is not surprising that its verbal symbol should become obsolete. Hospitality, as it was understood by our forefathers, is too homely a virtue for their pretentious descendants. These are not less ready than the former were to spend their money in entertaining. On the contrary, the present age is more prodigal in this respect than any which has preceded it. A modern host will give in a single night's entertainment more than his ancestor, however rich, would have distributed among his guests in a twelve-month.

There is this marked difference between the two: that the prodigality of the one is for himself, and the prudent generosity of the other was for his friends. This distinction between the motives of the modern and ancient entertainer seems to justify the statement that hospitality, as it was understood by our forefathers, no longer exists.

The whole power of entertaining seems to be more and more concentrating in the form of large parties. These are becoming recognized as such social necessities that no woman the least nice about her "gentility," and discreetly regardless of Mrs. Grundy, will venture to dispense with them. The sacrifices made to satisfy the requirements of respectability in this regard are heroic. What deprivations are submitted to! What sufferings endured! Such humiliations of mind! Such tortures of body! A single night's prodigality, painfully wrung from the moderate income, and thrown promiscuously to a throng of scornful and wasteful wantons of fashion, shrinks a whole year's housekeeping to a frugality close to starvation. If the effect were only to leave the larder bare, and shorten the commons of those who commit the act, it would be hardly worth while to waste words upon such consummate folly. It, however, has a wider and more disastrous influence, ruining whole families, and blighting society.

This substitution of party-giving for social entertainments, apart from its expensiveness and the consequent deprivation which ensues, not only of domestic comfort and convenience, but of essential advantage, is fatal to character. Our youth become mere party-goers, with no conception of social duties beyond dressing, dancing, and flirting. Display becomes the main purpose of life, and hence a false standard of respectability is raised where, if not too dazzled by the glitter, we may read the inscription: "Show, not worth." Fashionable acquaintance takes the place of sober friendship, and even alliances for life are formed without any other bond of sympathy than a common pursuit of the frivolities of fashion. It may be possible that, for certain people and on certain occasions, those demonstrations of cost, waste, and ceremony, called fashionable parties, are necessary; but it is certain that they are not desirable for general adoption. The motive of the modern entertainment is a selfish love of display, which must be harmful to all, and ought and can not be confounded with a disinterested hospitality which blesses those who give and those who receive.

PREMATURE EMANCIPATION.

IT may be said, without much exaggeration, that there are no boys and girls in America. It is not that the Divine injunction, Increase and multiply, is disobeyed in this country. On the contrary, the production of the human kind is no exception to the general fertility of our prolific land. Babies are born in abundance, but their transition to the habits and manners of grown people is so rapid that, as in the change of the grub to the butterfly, there is apparently no intermediate state. The pupa is hardly dry in the male mouth before it is puffing a cigar; and on the female lips ere they talk about the latest fashions.

In old times there were many reminders of childhood which have become obsolete in these modern days of rapid progression. The bib and tucker have departed with the nursery meal of beef and pudding, and Master Augustus and Miss Euphemia dress for dinner, and eat their way through a succession of French dishes with all the appreciation of fins bees or finished epicures. In their eating and drinking, in their dress and address, in their talks and walks, they are but men and women of a smaller growth. The amusements of the boys and girls of a former generation are rejected by those of the present. The ball, the kite, the hoop, and the marble are pronounced by these Lilliputian gentlemen and ladies of the best families as too juvenile and vulgar, and are left accordingly to the scanty-breeched and meagrely educated offspring of the poor, who, fortunately for mankind, still keep up those venerable traditions of childhood so essential to the conservation of the robustness of our race. Our little cavaliers and dames prefer the drawing-room and fashionable promenade to the field and the play-ground. To dance and flirt, to dress and ogle, and to get up and break off affaires de cœur are their amusements when together. When apart they seek those distractions usual with their fashionable elders. The boys smoke, frequent the bars and billiard-rooms, and the girls loll over a fashionable novel, or stroll into Stewart's or Dieder's.

In former days, such was the immediate demand in our country for labor of all kinds that youth was called on to fulfill the duties of manhood. It was better that these should be performed imperfectly by boys and girls than not performed at all. The necessity of filling the various occupations of life with immature men and women no longer exists, but the aspirations of the young survive, and impel them to seek a premature emancipation. This is fatal to robustness of body and mind, as it curtails those periods of gradual development essential to the perfection of the human being. There can be no sound men or women without a genuine boyhood and girlhood. This is so not only as regards their physical but their intellectual and moral condition. It is true human beings can be forced into a premature development, but this is "as summer fruits, which are easy to corrupt and can not last."

The dress is responsible for much of this fatal precocity of our youth. If boys and girls were clothed more as boys and girls they would be easier reconciled to the conduct suitable to their age, and less disposed to rival full-grown fools in their frivolities and vices. Let parents restore to use the old-fashioned bib and tucker, and prolong the epoch of jackets and short frocks, and we shall have fewer precocious gentlemen and dames, but more mature men and women.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

On not Seeing Sights.

MY DEAR DORINDA,—I lately went to pass a few of these brilliant September days with Tomasino, who has a very pleasant country retreat near Trenton Falls. It is so near indeed that in the still nights, when I have awakened and have lain reflecting upon my many shortcomings, making the most strenuous good resolutions for the future, I have heard the steady, monotonous sound of the Fall, and have suddenly wondered if that was what the poet meant by hearing Time flowing in the night. Tomasino would hardly be considered a romantic man, but I have found a touch of genuine romance in him, as, indeed, there always is in a true humorist.

"I observe," said he one morning after breakfast, "that you are commenting upon our traveling manners."

I replied that it was true I was treating of some little aspects of conduct upon the great journey of life.

"Yes, yes, I see," continued my friend; "the world is our carriage, and space is our road. Very well; very well, indeed. But do you know the chief charm of the journey?"

I involuntarily turned my eyes to Mrs. Tomasino, who, clad in a fresh and becoming negligé, seemed to have just emerged from the chamber of the morning. The husband followed my glance and smiled.

"No," said he, "I don't mean exactly in that sense. I mean the charm of the journey irrespective of our fellow-travelers."

This, of course, was one of the questions that are not meant to be answered. They are merely parts of a soliloquy. So I smiled in turn, and blandly waited.

"The charm is that you never arrive and know nothing of your bourne."

Tomasino spoke very gravely, and his wife now, in her turn, looked at me with a smile.

"Who is it," continued Tomasino, "that somewhere says, 'What's won's done; Joy's soul lies in the doing?'"

"I don't believe it was Sisyphus," said Madame, demurely.

Tomasino bowed to his wife and said, "No, it was a much wiser man. But it is a very universal experience, and many a man feels it without knowing it. Don't you suppose, Bachelor, that many a married man looks at his wife, say after twenty years, and wonders where is the girl—I mean the nymph, the goddess—he asked to marry him? Perhaps, after all, Daphne was more coquette than coward. 'He will love me always,' she may have said, 'if he can never have me.' Women have such fine instincts."

It was peculiarly impossible for a bachelor to reply to such a remark from a husband in his wife's presence, and I did nothing, therefore, but beam benevolently about the balcony upon which we were sitting. Luckily I thought of the serviceable line of Campbell, and said:

"'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view," and Mrs. Tomasino murmured in reply,

"In notes by distance made more sweet."

Tomasino instantly added, "Oh yes, the poets understand it. Poetry is full of it; so is painting and music. 'What's won's done.'"

The morning was very beautiful, and the autumn air exhilarating, and I said, after a little pause,

"These speculations and reveries are very pleasant; but, my boy, I am going away in a day or two, and you have not yet taken me to Trenton Falls. Why not to-day?"

Mrs. Tomasino smiled, and Tomasino answered, dryly,

"I have never been there."

I looked in amazement at him, and with an interrogation point in each eye—as Dickens says of the Yankee traveler—at his wife.

"Never been there?"

"Never."

"Why it's the finest thing in this part of the country."

"I believe it," answered my friend, with an air of profound satisfaction.

"I have heard," said I, "of dull bumpkins living within the roar of Niagara, who have never seen the cataract, nor cared to see it. But you are not a dull bumpkin."

"You do me too much honor," replied Tomasino, laughing heartily.

"What the deuce, then, do you mean?" said I.

"What's won's done." I like some perspective to my picture. I want this actual landscape to melt away into the ideal. I want some point for my imagination, and I have much more enjoyment in my fancy of Trenton Falls than I could have in seeing a river tumbling over rocks—and there an end of it."

Tomasino laughed softly and smiled; and I found that there was no doubt of the fact, and that he had never seen the chief attraction of his neighborhood.

Thereupon I fell into the most prodigious reverie. Here, thought I, is a queer passenger enough, and his manners upon the road are astounding. Fancy a man always going to Boston and stopping always at Newton Corner, or to Washington and refusing to go beyond Bladensburg, or to Florence and unbundling at Leghorn, or to Rome and settling in Civita Vecchia, or to Jerusalem and never putting foot further than Gaza, or to New York and alighting in Harlem? And yet, on the other hand, how many a man is content to remember famous places without going to see them again! Why not keep them in the future as well as in the past? I reflected that in other years I had seen St. Peter's at Rome. I wouldn't—I was just going to say that I wouldn't surrender that remembrance for a thousand dollars. But I will restrain myself, and look at the subject calmly. Tomasino has never sailed across the Atlantic Ocean, consequently he has never—been sea-sick? No, no. I do not say that. All in good time. Not having crossed the ocean, he has never been in Italy. Never having been in Italy, how could he have been at Rome? And not having been in Rome, it is demonstrated that he has never seen St. Peter's.

Now, then, he has an image of it; so have I. He keeps his in fancy; I keep mine in memory. He beholds a vast, vague temple; the genius of Michael Angelo made visible; a dome—the Pantheon hung in air; all is symmetrical, magnificent, faultless. I, for my part, behold a great church, mingled of various designs and times. I step inside, and there is an odd medley of statues and tombs, good and bad, tawdry and grotesque. There are snuffy monks and priests shuffling about. There is a motley crowd loitering curiously. Here is a rosy Englishman in bouncing shoes and a bob coat, staring about with his red "Murray" in hand. There is a shepherd from the Abruzzi, in his goat-skin and sandals, kneeling before the bronze statue of Saint Peter and kissing its great toe worn smooth with multitudinous kissing. But it isn't a statue of St. Peter at all. It is a figure of Jupiter. Hark! there in a side chapel they are singing vespers through their noses. And here comes a cardinal, a Prince of the Church, a withered old man in red stockings, attended upon his carriage by three gorgeous flunkies. And, oh! how my leg itches! Excuse the truth, I am a mere flea pasture. And these wretched people, evidently so poor, so ignorant, so superstitious! The heart sinks and aches for them; the mind protests. This is the temple of the power that keeps them what they are; and as I hear the chant dying away—the chant a thousand years old, and whose strange monotony seems weaving a spell upon the life of my time, as a dull cobweb is stretched and catches flies—I think of the sweet ringing of Sunday bells among the hills of New England, and the big, shapeless, old barn of a meeting-house, and I wonder if I would not prefer to sit by the window there and see St. Peter's in fancy rather than in memory.

Or I thought of this whim of Tomasino's in another light. Jones, the great author, whom we all know through his beautiful novels and philosophies and epic poems, and whom we all admire as the happy and long-expected individual who has at last laid the corner-stone of American literature—Jones is a neighbor of mine in the house where I lodge, and I am, without any fault of mine, necessarily familiar with many of his ways as well, I hope, as with all his works. Jones is a very worthy man, but he is of an age which can not now be precisely determined; also, when you see Jones, you can by no means accurately say how much of Jones you see. Let me explain. I, as you know, am no chicken, and when I was a boy, Jones was a young man—and if Jones does not still look like a young man, it is no fault of his. Do you understand? That hair, for instance; it is certainly very brown and curly and glossy, but, upon the whole, do you inwardly believe that it is Jones's own hair—own, I mean, by growth; for Jones is a strictly honorable man, and punctually pays all his bills? Yet it is a fact personally known to me by involuntary observation that Jones goes to a drawer in his room, clips something there, and incloses the clipping with a carte de visite, and sends both clipping and card off in a letter by mail to—somebody, any body: you, for instance, gentle and dear reader, who admire Jones's poetry so sincerely and treasure a lock of your poet's hair.

One evening I was returning late from the theatre, and I passed the room of the poet and philosopher Jones. His door was open, and I unconsciously glanced in as I passed. Dear Powers divine, what a figure I beheld! It had an entirely bald head; livid and sunken cheeks; a dark cavern of a mouth without a single pearl; and as my eye fell upon it, the figure was engaged in removing the calf of its leg! This was Jones undressing. And the horrible thought entered my mind, that when in that ceremony he had taken off all his clothes he did not stop there, but still went on, taking off and off indefinitely, until, as I believe, that man actually goes to bed in his bones. But I fear it is not only in the matter of appearance that Jones is so—if I may use the expression—evasive. I am of opinion that his manners are like his hair, and his teeth, and his calves. I hear him rating the poor little chamber-maid dreadfully, and when his washer-woman's daughter brings home his collars too limp, I pity that young woman with all my heart, for she hears the most petulant and disagreeable words flying at her out of the mouth of Jones, the poet and philosopher, and popular novelist—words which I certainly shall not repeat, although I too frequently for my peace of mind overhear them. Upon which occasions I have no hesitation in saying that I lie in wait for the young woman at my door, and try with a few cheerful and courteous words to repair the mischief wrought by that ruthless Jones.

Indeed, I am compelled to say that the great Jones, although very eminent and popular, and the idol of young ladies, is a vain and ill-tempered coxcomb; and if you, Dorinda, or any of your friends, after reading aloud his flowing lines, or weeping over the woes of the hapless heroine of his latest romance, or delighted to find that his abstrusest metaphysical speculation is your most familiar thought, can not delay a moment in writing to him to beg the precious favor of an interview, I advise you to reflect for a moment, whether this is not a case in which you would prefer to keep your Trenton Falls unseen. Leave something to the imagination, Dorinda. "I have at last seen the great Mr. Pope," said an ardent admirer of the poet. "Ah, happy fate!—and what was he doing?" was the response. "He was bl-w-ng his n-se!"

You see Tomasino's humor is not without reason. If I were he, indeed, I should certainly go and see Trenton Falls; but there are some Trentons that are wisely left unseen.

Your friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CHIGNONS.

"ADDITIONAL hair," as the French call it, is now universally worn, and is indispensable for full dress. Plaited chignons and coils of crimped hair are worn for morning toilettes, and light short curls, in the Diana Vernon style, for evening. Two long locks are worn over the left shoulder, partly crimped and partly curled. Newer than this is a short, crimped fall extending around the lower edge of the chignon, concealing the back of the neck. The ends are in ringlets. The price of this novelty is $15. It is made of the boiled hair, in which the crimp is permanent. Crêpes for the front hair are arranged to represent natural waves, and are put on in a way that defies detection; a harmless deception, much better than destroying natural hair with crimping pins. The chignon is still worn very high and large. Tortoise-shell combs are in favor again. All fancy combs are to give place to the plain straight band of tortoise-shell, engraved with gold.

A simple chignon for morning is made of hair sixteen inches long, plaited over crêpes. These are made into three wide plaits, each of three strands. The two outer ones form a curve with the centre plait between. Plain shell comb at the top. Another, very stylish, is formed of two puffs placed crosswise above a shell comb. Several short ringlets below fall on the neck. A dressy chignon for evening has only two plaits, with curls of different lengths between, and falling from the sides. The front hair is drawn back over a high Pompadour roll, with short frizzed curls on the forehead.

Evening head-dresses are coronets of flowers, high and prominent on the forehead; large carnation or rose in the centre, with buds and shaded leaves at the side. A bridal wreath has full-blown orange flowers in the centre of the diadem, with branching vine and buds.

KID GLOVES.

An improved glove fastening is a movable chain adjusted with studs at either side of the wrist, and caught by a hook when drawn together. The fashionable colors for kid gloves this winter will be Vesuvius, flame color, bear's ear garnet, and the glowing Sultan red. Tastes will change, and ladies who a year ago would have shuddered at the idea of wearing a red glove are making haste to adopt the new fashion.

A forest of colors in the wood browns and bright capucine are in unquestionable taste, as are all the shades of gray and purple, from the dark Humboldt, more red than blue, to the delicate pearl color. A box of gloves shows fine gradations of color, the difference between the shades being so slight as to be scarcely perceptible; but it is necessary to keep this variety in order to match silks of all shades. The most popular glove is that with two buttons or studs on the wrist. A shorter glove has the centre stitching extending to the top of the wrist between studs of gilt or silver. The silk tippettes with crimped tassels are the exact shade of the kid. Useful black kids are enlivened by stitching of purple, magenta, green, or white between silver eyelets laced by a cord and tassel of the same bright hue. The wristband is also bound and welted with a color. All the light tints of cream, salmon, flesh color, and white are made in long gloves for evening, with three, four, or six buttons extending above the wrist, and sloped to fit a tapering arm. Many of these are stitched in contrasting colors with beautiful effect.

The substantial undressed kid for demi-toilette is made in the very best style. The castor gloves of light doeskin, for walking and driving, are soft and pliant, fit as neatly as kid, and are numbered in the same way. Children's gloves are double stitched on the seams, with a band and two buttons at the wrist. These are new this season and very desirable. Misses' gloves are numbered like ladies' gloves, but are much shorter in the fingers. Ladies are not generally aware that there are two sizes of each number, a small six and a large six, a slender and a broad glove.

VEILS.

New veils of real lace are larger than the mask veils, are square-cornered, and long enough to fall below the chin, instead of cutting the face in two as did apparently the shallow veils of the summer. The dots are small, and the border not very deep. Some of them have inch wide bands of insertion to tie across the chignon. Fancy veils for round hats are round and short with long tabs. They are of Spanish net in diamond and polka spots, with embroidered borders. The modistes affirm that colored embroidery on veils is too pronounced to please the fastidious. Gauze and grenadine veils are a yard long, with a string in one end, worn around the crown of the hat.

COLLARS AND NECK-TIES.

Embroidery on Swiss muslin and linen cambric is revived this season for collars and chemisettes. The French needle-work is the handsomest and most expensive. The collars are not very wide, and are turned down and slightly pointed in front, or with a square revers. The edges are scalloped and bordered with narrow Valenciennes. A few standing collars are imported, straight behind with points turned down in front, a style becoming to long necks. A knot or bow of lace is worn in front. Muslin chemisettes for surplice waists are embroidered in a point to the belt, and cut low in the neck with a standing frill of Valenciennes.

Collars of French cambric in stripes or figures of color are being generally adopted for morning toilette and traveling. Black and cherry stripes are in favor, but require to be carefully worn, especially on the street, where they look best with black costume. Deep cuffs are made of cambric of the same pattern as the collar, and if in stripes a belt is sometimes added, fastened with a jet buckle. This fashion seems to be in imitation of the gentlemen who wear in public the striped linen shirts that were once considered en deshabille.

The neck-tie has become an important feature of feminine dress. It is not really a neck-tie but a bow that takes the place of the breast-pin. Broad ribbons, shaded, striped, or self-colored, are tied into loose bows and knots, with a studied carelessness that is the perfection of art. The rich Sultan red, matching the color of the feathers so fashionable on hats, is most often used. A half yard is all that is required for a knot with fringed ends.

Velvet dog-collar necklaces, with locketts attached, or fastened with an ornamental slide, are becomingly worn above turned-down collars. If the neck is long the band may be an inch wide. On short necks narrower velvet is tied behind with long loops and ends.

SHOES.

The half Polish boot of the summer will give place in cold weather to the full Polish fitting high up on the calf of the leg. Toes are medium round, the shank is very narrow, and the heel high, slender, and curved. The fashionable buttoned boot for walking has the uppers of glove kid, or, if preferred, the glazed kid, the lower of pebbled morocco. Very dressy boots are stitched with white, and buttoned with imitation pearl buttons. Models of English shoes are much lower on the ankle than those worn here, with heels of the broad military shape. These are comfortable for walking, but are not so showy as the French shape now in favor, with Louis XV. heels. The fashionable shoe is ruining the shape of the feet by producing bunions and corns. A short shoe is more apt to disfigure the shape than a narrow one. High heels throw the weight of the body forward, and if the foot can not find room in front the joints at the side are enlarged or the heel made prominent. It is best to have shoes made to order, as scarcely any two persons have feet alike. Polish boots made to order cost from $6 to $12 a pair, according to the material and decoration.

Tassels and satin bows no longer decorate the top of the boot, but are removed to the instep. A new rosette of kid, bound with silk, extends high up on the instep, and transforms the plainest slipper into the stylish Pompadour shape.

FRENCH WALKING DRESSES.

Some French walking dresses just arrived have the tunic or upper skirt without a front width. The side widths are buttoned to the front seams of the under-skirt. This is a good plan as it gives the flat front so desirable with paniers. The simple trimming may be easily made at home by any expert needle-woman. The tunic is scalloped and bound with silk. Inside each scallop is a button the color of the binding, with a button-hole simulated beside it. Sleeves are close-fitting with a puff at the top, and sometimes a puff at the elbow.

A suit of purple ribbed cloth—a beautiful material, as soft as cashmere—has two skirts, basquine, and cape, trimmed with four rows of black satin braid half an inch wide. The upper skirt forms a long square apron, which is edged with fringe. Price $95.

Black and white together are in favor for fall costumes. A silk suit of black striped with white has a petticoat of broader stripes than the upper dress. The petticoat is untrimmed. Black and white folds of corded silk, with fringe of the two colors, is the trimming. Price $90.

An economical suggestion is a black silk tunic or over-skirt, with a small cape reaching to the waist, to be worn over short silk dresses that may have become defaced. A small cape of black silk, composed of successive collars like the carrick, is trimmed with satin folds, and, with the addition of a tunic, gives variety to costumes.

The Cheltenham suit just introduced abroad would be convenient in our fickle climate and for traveling. It is of water-proof tweed, in black or any shade of gray. The skirt is made like a short dress skirt, but rather more ample, and is buttoned down the front. The jacket is short and loose. This suit may be worn as protection for another dress in bad weather, or, if made in good style, as the only dress.

It is early to speak of velvet suits, but we have just seen some that are too elegant in their extreme simplicity to be omitted. They are made with short gored skirt and loose sacque. The trimming is placed on the edge of the skirt and up the front seams. It consists of folds, half of which are satin, the other half faille, joined in the centre by a row of stitching. The price is $200 each.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Cushions filled with down are worn in Paris instead of horse-hair tournures. These will be comfortable only in cold weather.

Buttons and ornaments for cloaks are pendants, long and slender. The frog-button, round with pointed drops, is also fashionable.

Pretty chatelaines, furnished with all the implements for needle-work, are made of pale Russian leather, attached to a belt of the same.

Parasols are trimmed with borders of marabout feathers, and with fringe made of quill shavings. White marabout on black satin is very stylish.

Handkerchiefs for the street are of fine cambric with two-inch hem, with a vine of embroidery or a Grecian design.

For information received we are indebted to the courtesy of Messrs. W. J. BARKER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; MILLER; and Miss PAGE.

PERSONAL.

GOUNOD, the composer of the opera of "Faust," was, some fifteen years ago, walking about the streets of Paris as an abbé, and determined to devote himself to the Church; but he long ago abandoned the idea, and has since given himself up to music. He lives in good style, is a polished and cultivated gentleman, has a fine face, and easy and affable manners, and is a general favorite. He is fifty, but looks younger; is married to the daughter of the late German pianist and professor of music, ZIMMERMANN. His next opera will be "Francesca di Rimini."

M. THIERS, it is said, has been offered £10,000 for the ten volumes of "L'Histoire de la Restauration" on which he is now engaged; but he has not yet accepted. Some American historians have done better than that.

There is a Mr. SMITH in Boston, a colored man, whose business is that of a caterer. He is a well-educated, modest, sensible man, and enjoys in a high degree the respect and confidence of many of the best and most cultivated people of that city. We have heard that Senator SUMNER invited him to his wedding, though he did not attend. Mr. SMITH recently gave a very fine dinner to a few of his friends at his residence in Bulfinch Street, and seated at table with him were the Hon. CHARLES SUMNER, the Rev. Dr. BOLLES, Rev. Dr. POTTER, Rev. J. W. DADNUM, Mr. PARKMAN, Hon. MOSES KIMBALL, and several other persons of the best social position in Boston. All sides, in politics, were represented; and the entertainment was, doubtless, in every respect, refined and delightful.

Mr. GEORGE W. CHILDS, the energetic, sagacious, successful, genial proprietor of the Philadelphia Ledger, goes to Europe next month, with his accomplished wife, for a little respite from the arduous duties of journalism. No man is better entitled to it. Not long since Mr. CHILDS, with characteristic generosity, presented to persons employed in responsible positions on the Ledger, life-insurance policies amounting in the aggregate to $40,000—undertaking, at the same time, to pay the premium—about $3000 per annum—for ten years, at the expiration of which time the policies become, by their terms, self-paying.

On the evening preceding the delivery of Mr. WEBSTER's reply to Colonel HAYNE, Mr. W. was at Colonel SEATON's residence until near midnight, and on leaving Mr. SEATON took Mr. WEBSTER's arm and insisted upon seeing him home. On reaching Mr. WEBSTER's the latter insisted upon seeing Colonel SEATON home. The scene was amusing, but Mr. WEBSTER's object seemed to be to take exercise, enjoy the conversation of his friend, and look upon the star-studded sky, now descending upon the wonders of astronomy, and then repeating passages from the Bible, Virgil, Shakspeare, and Milton, while not an allusion was made to the impending event of the morrow.

The Springfield Republican says of the Japanese pupils at the Monson Academy, Massachusetts: "That gentlemanly 'Jap,' OHARA REYNOSKE, was in town on Wednesday on a furlough from the Academy, where himself and brother natives of the Orient are making good proficiency in the language of the Occident, and in the customs and usages of the best New England society. The two older ones of the five are called home to join the army; the others will remain some time longer. All like Mr. HAMMOND for a teacher, Yankee boys for fellow-students, and Monson for a place to live in. They attend the Congregational Church."

Mrs. LESLIE STEPHEN, a daughter of THACKERAY, is traveling in this country in company with her husband.

The Rev. Mrs. P. A. HANNAFORD, editress of the Ladies' Repository, officiated before the Universalist Society at North Adams, Massachusetts, two weeks ago last Sunday. She preached from the words, "I shall be satisfied." Of course her hearers were satisfied, as she is a lady of ability, culture, and refinement; besides, men do love to hear clever women talk.

A prominent Albanian has a wife who is often seen rowing her own canoe upon the Hudson, above the State Dam. She has ordered a fine paper shell-boat of the manufacturers at Troy. She is a fine oarswoman, and has no end of health and muscle.

The daughter of Mrs. GASKELL, the well-known English authoress, superintends a public kitchen at Manchester for the sick. This kitchen was started some three years ago in one of the poorest and most populous districts in Manchester, with the object of supplying dinners gratuitously to the patients of the Ardwick and Ancoats Dispensary, and of St. Mary's Hospital, during their illness or convalescence. VICTOR HUGO has written a letter to Miss GASKELL, highly complimenting her on her good works.

Young authors who are really conscious of having the right stuff in them need not be disheartened at a polite refusal of manuscript now and then from publishers. VICTORIEN SARDOU says that the first eighty of his manuscripts, plays, poems, etc., were rejected, and that for two years he did not make a sou by his literary labors. Since then he has become popular, rich, and is in great demand from those who once declined his productions.

Lord LYTTON is said to have rewritten his drama of The Sea Captain, originally played in London in 1839 for thirty successive nights. MACREADY, HELEN FAUCIT, and Mrs. WARNER then played the leading characters. It is now to be produced at the Lyceum Theatre, London, under the supervision of Mr. BANDMANN (well known in theatrical circles here), who will himself take the character of Norman, the hero of the play.

A gentleman of Cincinnati (his name is not given though it ought to be), who owns one of the finest country seats in the suburbs of that city, on leaving home for the sea-shore, gave his gardener orders that twice each week all the roses on his place should be gathered and sent to St. Luke's Hospital, which was done throughout the summer. The delight that that kind-hearted gentleman imparted to the weak and weary invalids was such payment as money could never give. Fortunate man to have the roses; happier to have the thought to put them beside the pillow of sickness!

Swiss inn-keepers must live, as well as inn-keepers elsewhere; so at least thought the honest Boniface who prepared a plain breakfast for Queen VICTORIA, not long since, and charged for it the modest sum of seven hundred francs. He was remonstrated with on the ground that eggs were plenty, but remarked, pleasantly, in reply, that "sovereigns are scarce."

Mr. G. VICTOR LE VAUX, an eminent journalist staying at Niagara Falls, states that the Horseshoe Falls have receded more than six feet at the great bend, or "central bight," since his visit last year, and that the average rate of retrogression from this point along the precipice to the "Canadian bend" has been five feet. During the last year the rate of the retrogression of the American Falls was three feet at one point (the Luna indentation or bight) and one foot at another. Elsewhere the retrogression is not perceptible.

The Queen of the Belgians recently was driving a spirited span along the mountains where she was temporarily sojourning, and once ventured into a road which was barely passable for carriages; she met one of the simple and honest peasant women of the Ardennes, and inquired of her if she could continue upon that road. "Yes," she replied, "but it would be a shame to break your carriage, and spoil those pretty horses, and the man who has let them to you will not be well satisfied."

A new star has arisen in the musical firmament of Paris—Mlle. HISSON, who recently debuted in "Trovatore," with unusual success. LA MARQUISE DE CAUX was among her warmest applauders; and M. MERMET, the composer of "Roland à Ronçevaux," has selected her to be Jeanne d'Arc, in his new opera, now in preparation.

MATILDA HERON now gives her entire attention to the instruction of young ladies for the highest rank of the drama. Terms from $100 to $500 per quarter. Poor aspirants taught gratis.

THADDEUS STEVENS, when jocular, never kept back a witticism, whether it hit friend or foe. On one occasion he called on President LINCOLN. "It was a hot day," said Mr. STEVENS, "and he was lying about on sofas and chairs, in a disjointed way he had. I knew him by the fragments, and so was able to reconstruct him."

Mr. LONGFELLOW, when in London, visited the Temple, to see where GOLDSMITH and JOHNSON once had resided, and rested beneath the old sycamore-tree, now fenced round, under which they used to sit and chat. In the burial-ground of the Temple GOLDSMITH found his final resting-place, though his grave can not now be identified. He died at forty-six, and a bust, by NOZ-LEKENS, with a Latin inscription, by JOHNSON, do honor to his memory in Poet's Corner in Westminster Abbey. GOLDSMITH was a little of every thing good, with a strong dash of every thing bad. GARRICK hit him off with tolerable accuracy when he said:

"This scholar, rake, Christian, dupe, gamester, and poet;
Though a mixture so odd, he shall merit great fame,
And among brother mortals be GOLDSMITH his name."

Royalty does not always forget the pecuniary meum and tuum. A Paris letter to London says: "The other day the Archduchess SOPHIA was asked by her chaplain for money to pay for masses for the repose of her unfortunate son MAXIMILIAN's soul. Without reflecting, she put down her name for a considerable amount. Encouraged by this success, the chaplain took the list to Archduke ALBERT, and begged him to subscribe. 'I will gladly subscribe to a collection in memory of my unfortunate brother, but I shall insist on the money being applied to pay his creditors, which appears to me the first thing to be done.' A proper reply, though not regarded as vitally pious by the chaplain."

TERESA TIETJENS, the new prima donna, soon to make her appearance in this city as the prominent artiste of Mr. MAPLESON's company, is at the head of the tragic opera of the day. Great as PATTI and NILSSON are, TIETJENS stands higher as a lyric artist. She was born in Hamburg, and is now thirty-four years old. Her voice is a pure soprano, fresh, penetrating, even, and powerful, unusually rich in quality, extensive in compass, and of great flexibility. She possesses every requisite needed by a cantatrice of the highest order, personal beauty, physical strength, originality of conception, a superb voice, and inexhaustible spirit and energy. She is a blonde, is well educated, speaks English, and is otherwise quite accomplished.

The reports that Count BISMARCK is much broken in health are without truth. He is simply on a prolonged visit to his estates in East Prussia, and is in good health; rises early, rides over his farms, dines, rests a while, and then looks after his office-work. A telegraph wire extends from his castle to the capital, and he communicates instantly and directly such orders as may be required. He has not had occasion to see a medicator since he left Berlin.

All France is talking of the audacity of young EUGENE CAVAIGNAC, who refused recently to accept a college prize at the hands of the PRINCE IMPERIAL. The young man was educated in stern hatred of Imperialism by his energetic young mother, who was but nineteen years old when her illustrious husband died. CAVAIGNAC died very suddenly in the country, and his wife, though overwhelmed with grief, had the corpse placed in her carriage, and drove with it to Paris, which she reached in nine hours afterward. Her son was only a year old at that time. When THIERS called on her she showed him the child, and pointing to him, said, "He shall never take the oath." The French Government has long since placed her under the special surveillance of the police.

The recent unveiling of the new monument to MARTIN LUTHER at Worms has excited fresh interest in matters relating to his family. Of his lineal descendants only one, JOACHIM LUTHER, survives. MARTIN LUTHER had six children: HANS, ELIZABETH, MAGDALENE, MARTIN, PAUL, and MARGARETE. Of these only three—HANS, PAUL, and MARGARETE, reached maturity. The HANS branch expired early in an only daughter who died a childless wife. The PAUL branch multiplied, but expired in the male line in the fifth generation.

Tidy with Rosettes in Crochet and Point de Reprise.

MATERIALS: Green cloth, green twisted wool, black sewing-silk.

This tidy is made of green cloth, and ornamented, as shown by Fig. 1, with rosettes, which are worked with green wool in crochet stitch and point de reprise. Fig. 2 shows one of the rosettes for the outer edge of the tidy of the full size. For working these make, of green wool, a foundation corresponding to the inner circumference of the crochet edge of the rosette, join in a round by means of a slip stitch, and crochet on this two rounds sc. (single crochet), in which widen one stitch eight times at regular distances; in the second round the made stitches must lie over the made stitches of the former round; also in the second round crochet around both the upper veins of the stitches. On this work one round picots as follows: * 1 sc. in the first stitch of the former round, 1 picot composed of 3 ch. (chain stitches), 1 sc. in the first of the 3 ch., pass over one stitch of the former round and take one stitch, and repeat from *. At the end of the round crochet a slip stitch fastened to the first stitch of the round and the thread. Arrange this crocheted edge on pasteboard, and work within it the star composed of eight leaves in point de reprise. We have already frequently described the manner of working these leaves. Lastly, finish each leaf and also the edge with a row of herring-bone stitch worked in black sewing-silk, as shown by the illustration, and make a few knots of the green wool in the centre of the star. The large rosette in the centre of the tidy is made in the same manner, as shown by Fig. 1. Sew the rosettes when finished on the cloth, and cut the latter away underneath.

Sofa Pillow in Application.

This embroidery is worked on cloth laid over satin; it is extremely pretty with the materials all in green, and the satin and silk twist in a lighter shade than the cloth. Mark on the cloth the square of the design, lay the satin under the cloth, and, following the lines marked, work through the double material the rows of chain stitch seen on the illustration.

SOFA PILLOW IN APPLICATION.

The manner of working this chain stitch has been already described in Harper's Bazar, No. 47, page 740. Next work the alternate squares with point russe figures as shown by the illustration, and cut away the cloth of the plain squares so that the satin squares shall appear on the surface.

Section of Patchwork Cloth Tidy.

This tidy is formed of small pieces of black cloth sewed together. These squares are of the size shown by Fig. 1, and are worked on the edges with a kind of button-hole stitch of green wool. Fig. 2 shows the manner of working this stitch. Join the squares thus prepared on the right side with chain stitch of black wool, putting the needle through the edges of the stitches worked on the outer edges of the squares. Remnants of cloth of the same or different colors may be made useful in this manner.

Border of Worsted Work.

This border is worked in ordinary cross stitch with zephyr worsted and filoselle silk in the colors designated on the illustration. When set together with alternate strips of plush it forms a pretty cover for lounges, foot-stools, etc.

Fish-Shaped Emery Bag.

See illustration on page 773.

This elegant little emery bag is simple and easily made. First, cut in the form given by the illustration, exclusive of the fins, two pieces of white muslin, gray drilling, or some such material, and sew them together around the outer edge with the exception of a small opening, after which fill the bag thus made with iron filings or emery and close the aperture. Then cut two similar pieces of red or gray cloth, ornament these in button-hole stitch with gold-colored or red silk, in imitation of scales, and overseam them together with fine silk of the same color. The eyes are made with a small round piece of white cloth and a black bead. The fins are formed by sticking in pins in the manner shown by the illustration.

Two Embroidery Patterns for Shoes, Cushions, etc.

See illustrations on page 773.

THE design, Fig. 1, is to be worked in cross stitch with wool and silk.

The design, Fig. 2, is worked with beads.

Antimacassar of Embroidered Bits of Linen.

See illustrations on page 773.

This antimacassar is pretty and easily made, and serves to use up the bits of linen which collect about a house. The pieces of linen are button-hole stitched around the edges and embroidered partly in herring-bone stitch and partly in satin stitch, in the manner shown by Fig. 2, which gives a section of the full size. The centre is adorned with a sprig in satin stitch, which can be easily worked by referring to the illustration. In working the separate pieces embroider the centres, and then work the outer edges, after which cut away the surplus material. The illustration shows the manner of joining the pieces. The circular bands are made of straight strips in which small pleats have been laid on one side at regular intervals, after which the surplus material is embroidered and cut away. The cross bars may either be joined to the circular bands on the under side or when the edge is button-hole stitched.

EGYPTIAN MUMMIES.

THE greater part of the national existence of Egypt, it has been said, seems to have been spent in a struggle against the natural laws of corruption for about four or five thousand years; and the long ranges of mummy cases, with their painted decorations, with their monotonous uniformity of almond-shaped eyes and hieroglyphics indecipherable to the uninitiated, stowed away in countless crypts and vaults, like the rolls of papyrus on the shelves of a Roman library, represent well the interminable similarity of the years of Egyptian history.

What a strange spectacle must Thebes, the great necropolis of Egypt, have presented when the business of embalming was in full fashion! The quarter devoted to the manufacture of the mummy was in the centre of the city. There, in silence, under the supervision of the priests, the various castes of embalmers worked day after day. In interminable alleys and halls these busy artisans expended their care and their labor with the regularity of a Birmingham manufactory on the production of the mummy, and, like the razor or the pin, the body required the

EMERY BAG.—FULL SIZE.

The king or the priest of Egypt did not, like the Bishop of St. Praxed, merely give orders about his tomb on his death-bed, he was preparing it his whole life long—all his aspirations were posthumous and subterranean. How often must Ramees or Sesostris have come to superintend the construction of his palace-sepulchre as thousands of naked, onion-fed workmen proceeded, under the whip of the inspectors, to hew out gallery after gallery, ante-chamber after ante-chamber, colonnade after colonnade, and burrowed deep into the bowels of the mountain! How often must he have wandered with pleased and vacant eye, while his dreamy inner vision was fixed beyond the horizon of the grave, before the quaint skeleton-like representations of his sports, his festivals, his hunting-parties, his battles, his sieges, and his conquests, with which the painter had lined the walls of his eternal subterranean palace; how lovingly he joint and successive manipulations of many hands before it was raised to the mummy state. Girt with panther-skins and helmeted with the skin mask of a jackal's head, the disembowellers were busy in one alley on ghastly rows of thousands of corpses. These, when thus prepared, were passed on to the spice-stuffers, who filled the corpse with aromatic preparations; a third set of workmen plunged the corpse in a seething bituminous bath, which, like the Styx, was to render the body invulnerable to corruption. Then the blackened form was delivered over to other artificers, who deftly swathed it in the interminable folds of the long bandages of linen, after which it was consigned to its papyrus-case, and received the outer embellishments of the painter and the varnisher, and the scribe in hieroglyphics, who with brush and reed-pen gave it the last touches of ornamental labor.

But even these classes of mummy-workmen were subdivided again into others, for the mummy manufactory necessarily was fashioned out into grades which represented all the hierarchical castes of Egypt; there were distinct mummy manufacturers for the aristocracy, for the citizens, and for the populace and slaves—nay, even for the birds and beasts. The mummy of the king, or the priest, or the noble, or the rich man, was delivered over to the guild of wig-makers, who devised for it a wonderful structure of intricately-woven jet-black hair, and a beard knit with elaborate skill, while eyes of precious stones and enamel were fitted into its mask. On ladies of rank no pains or expense was spared in preparing this mortuary toilette, which was intended to endure forever. There was a sort of special gynaceum in the establishment for them; and there the perfumer and the goldsmith and the worker in precious stones expended all their art in impregnating their delicate forms with unfading perfumes, and adorning them with gilding and jewelry for eternity: they gilded the lips and the nails and the bosoms; they crossed their hands upon their breasts in attitudes of prayer, or in other ways: a mother disinterred in Thebes presses against her bosom the little mummy of a newly-born child.

The mummies of persons of a lower class had less of this delicate manipulation; their swathing-linen is coarser, and their outer adornments likewise of a rougher fashion; while the pauper and slave, having gone through the embalming process, were bundled up into and serpents. Egypt, as we have said, expended its existence in one interminable revolt against the tyranny of death, and undertook the defense not only of humanity, but of the brute creation, both in its useful and its noxious members, against the laws of corporeal dissolution; and indeed so mechanically fossilized became life in Egypt that the innumerable inhabitants of each gigantic necropolis must have seemed in their silence and darkness almost as much alive as their descendants whose whole energies were expended in making preparations for sepulchral state when released from the ennui and monotony of daily life.

For the whole land of ancient Egypt became but a kind of vestibule of the sepulchre—the people lived in order to die, and the chief care of men and women must have been to become decent mummies—the houses and palaces of the living were but mere temporary objects of consideration compared with the eternal resting-place on which, according to the condition of each, all the skill and art of Egypt was to be lavished.

must have regarded the innumerable slabs of hieroglyphic inscriptions which were to record for all time the monotonous grandeur of his reign, and in the midst of which he was to repose forever! For these Pharaohs of Egypt must have been as like each other as the Noahs, Shems, Hams, and Japhets made by the Nuremberg toy-maker. The great wonder is that Nature did not grow weary, and either put an end to the race, or produce something fresh by way of change; then, if ever, was there room for a lulus nature.

What worth, indeed, could the living man figure to himself to possess in the vicinity of forty or fifty centuries of the dead, embalmed and preserved religiously, in the serenity and sanctity of post-mortem habitations! Forty or fifty centuries of the dead of Egypt must have represented millions and millions of inhabitants, who claimed eternal possession of the soil, which was honey-combed and covered with stupendous constructions for their protection. The living were a mere appendage of the dead, and the long history of Egypt was a subjection and a slavery to extinct forms. All notion of progress was utterly absorbed in the past; hundreds of millions of witnesses and guardians of the past were there close by and beneath the living, to plead for and defend it; how could the little army of breathing men form any notion of departing from traditional observances and beliefs, of which this vast army of the dead were the representatives? If these dark millions of the tombs were to emerge into upper air, disturbed in their sepulchral ease by the violation of the rites and customs which give them still a hold on existence, it would have been a frightful parody in rehearsal of the day of the Last Judgment, and the valley of the Nile would have swarmed with bituminous crowds some hundred and fifty times more numerous than the existing population of Egypt. If old doctrines and ideas still so often rule from the tombs of the dead over mankind, what must it have been in Egypt, where conservatism was embalmed, and stuffed, and perfumed in countless forms, and allowed a realm of sanctity to itself, and adored in the shape of countless human fetiches, whose shrines were to remain forever inviolable!

The greatness of the reign of a monarch was measured by the size of the pyramid he could raise, or the depth of the hypogeum which he scooped out of the mountain for the reception of his shriveled bituminous corpse. Egypt was little else than a kind of tomb. The pains, and prodigality, and expenditure of human life with common cases woven out of dried palm leaves. But not only the pauper and the slave were submitted to embalmmnt, but all animals, domestic or wild, consecrated by the fetich worship of Egypt, were also subjected to the process—cats and dogs, ichneumons, crocodiles, scarabæi, which a king endeavored to hide within a mountain of stone one small chamber where his worthless remains might rest forever in inviolable security, denote one of the most singular psychological conditions of humanity in the whole history of the race; but there is one thing still more curious, and that is the unerring sagacity with which a Belzoni—gifted with a finer scent for a royal mummy than a jackal or a hyena for a corpse—arrives, after the lapse of thousands of years, and drives onward through a tortuous up-and-down labyrinth of stone, in spite of every cunning device of Egyptian architects to mislead the explorer, right to the heart of the pyramid, disinters Cheops or Ramees, and makes his body a show for holiday people.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY;

OR, THE

Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh.

CHAPTER X.

WHEN I arose next morning I found my breakfast comfortably prepared, the room swept and dusted, and the char-woman who had hitherto attended me dismissed, while my new acquaintance, dressed in the clothes I had given him, presented a decent and even gentlemanlike appearance. He certainly had not exaggerated his handiness, for my room looked cleaner than ever it had done under the régime of my deaf laundress; and the steak which he had cooked for my breakfast might have gratified the senses of a Lucullus.

He would fain have breakfasted off the fragments of my own meal, but this I refused. If he was good enough to live with me, he was good enough to eat with me. I had a lurking consciousness that I had done a foolish thing, but felt that I could not amend my folly by a haughty treatment of my unknown companion. While we breakfasted he gave me a brief sketch of his career and fortunes.

"My name is Philip Hay," he began; "and I am the son of a parson, a man of great learning, but a poor spirit, who spent his life in the seclusion of an agricultural district, neglected his flock while he read the classics, and brought up his family on the produce of his garden and pig-sty. I can hardly remember wearing a shirt that was not ragged, or a coat and breeches that had not served my elder brother faithfully before they fell to my share. At our table butcher's meat was not the rule, but the exception; and I am somewhat inclined to attribute my want of moral stamina to that deficiency of beef from which I suffered in my boyhood. Butcher's meat is the foundation of your true Englishman. I will not say that my father gave me a good education, for he suffered me to pick up the crumbs of his learning very much as the cocks and hens that stalked about our carpetless parlor at meal-times were accustomed to pick up the fragments of each repast. I may say, without boastfulness, since my education has never been of the smallest use to me, that I had a natural aptitude for learning. Nothing in the way of scholarship came amiss to me. I knew my Greek alphabet before I was breeched, and read Erasmus in the original while other lads were blundering over their first declension. This early proficiency soon attracted the notice of neighbors, who, entirely unlearned themselves, were disposed to regard me as a juvenile prodigy, very much as they would have done had Nature gifted me with two heads, or enriched me with a superfluous arm. My reputation at twelve years old spread as far as the mansion of a wealthy nobleman, who sent for me one day when he had a house full of company, and bade me repeat an ode of Horace, and specimens of other classic poets, for the amusement of his guests. The result of this exhibition was an invitation to spend the holidays with my lord's son, an idle but by no means stupid young jackanapes, whom my learned example might possibly convert to industry. My father was but too glad to accept such an invitation; friends and neighbors declared that my fortune was made; my mother patched and turned the soundest of my old clothes, and my father pledged his credit to procure me the first suit of new ones I ever owned. I left home in high spirits, and ingratiated myself at once with my patron's son, Viscount Escote, whom I was so fortunate, or so unfortunate, as to amuse, and whose friendship or fancy I was soon master of. With this young gentleman I spent the merriest, and indeed the happiest period of my life, and the acquaintance thus begun was not destined to lapse. The boy had a warm heart, and I had perhaps reason to love him even better than I did.

"Lord Escote's tutor, a very grave and pompous gentleman, was at first inclined to object to his pupil's affection for my society; but as I speedily discovered his own incompetency, and was able to pose him at any moment by a seemingly-innocent inquiry about a crabbed sentence in Juvenal, or an obscure verb in Æschylus, he soon became more amiable, and permitted me to enjoy my share of the good things which he obtained by the exercise of grave humbug and sanctimonious imposture. When his lordship went to the university, some four years after our first meeting, nothing would please him but I must go also; and his father, Lord Mallandaine, being by this time deceased, and he succeeded to the title, with no one but a foolish, indulgent mother to govern him, he of course had his way, and I enjoyed the education of a gentleman at my patron's charge.

"I could tell you rare stories of those wild days, Mr. Ainsleigh—stories of exploits that redound rather to my cleverness than to my patron's morality or my own sense of honor. To sum up the whole, we were both expelled the university under circumstances of peculiar disgrace; and Lord Mallandaine, not caring to face a doting mother, proposed a continental tour, with me for his companion. Together we visited France, Italy, and the Low Countries, intrigued with Venetian courtesans and gamed with Parisian dandies, got up cock-fights in the Coliseum at Rome, and sparring-matches in a Florentine palace, returned to England low in pocket and broken in health, discontented with each other and disgusted with the world. I happened fortunately to be master of more than one important secret of my patron's, and in consideration of this fact, rather than from any remnant of his early friendship for me, my lord presented me with a few hundreds, and bade me make my fortune at the Bar, for which profession, he was good enough to observe, my natural impudence and capacity for lying eminently adapted me. I thanked him in my politest manner, and, cursing him in the spirit, wished him good-day. Since then we have met rarely, and then only by accident, and my chief consolation while going to the dogs has been to know that he is treading the same road."

"That is scarcely a Christian sentiment," said I, "since, by your own showing, Lord Mallandaine was kind to you."

"Kind? yes! He kept me about him so long as I amused him, and kicked me off when he tired of me. You do not know—your simplicity can not conceive the things I have done for that man, the degradations to which I have submitted, the perils I have encountered. Believe me, your Sganarelle's situation is no sinecure. And some day, in a brief fit of virtue, Don Juan turns away his faithful servant."

"How came you to succeed so ill at the Bar?"

"You will understand that better ten years hence. I began steadily enough, and for the first two years ate my dinners and studied with a pleader; but the habit of dissipation was too strong upon me. I took to spending my nights in gaming-houses, and even worse places of entertainment, brought discredit to my chambers, got into ill-repute with the Benchers, and it ended by my being kicked out of the Temple, as I had been kicked off by my patron, and as I had been expelled from my university. You perceive I have a genius for getting turned out of doors."

"And since that time you have lived by literature?"

"I have lived by writing for the booksellers, if you call that literature: I don't. I have composed more biographies of lately-deceased celebrities than I can count; have written a history of the Greek and Roman heroes, adapted for schools, and stolen from Plutarch; have composed metric translations of such Latin poets as are least fit for translation; have invented a scandalous history of the Princess of Wales, whom I have no grounds for supposing any thing but a very estimable matron; and have written pamphlets for and against every party. And now, Sir, you know the worst of me. Upon my merits I have not presumed to touch; but even my enemies admit that I have an easy temper and a daring spirit, and that I can be a firm friend to the man who wins my regard. I have flung myself upon your charity because I like your face; and it is for you to decide whether you will turn me out of doors, or allow me to remain as your faithful drudge and servitor until my luck turns, as it is sure to do in a week or two, when I will freely pay my share of our expenses, and continue truly grateful for your company."

And now came my fatal moment of weakness. I was but just twenty, and easily won to pity the misfortunes of my fellow-men, however well-deserved might be their woes. The man's story was in every manner calculated to prejudice me against him; but I reflected that this very fact told in his favor, and was at least evidence of his candor, since it would have been easy for so clever a rascal to give a plausible account of himself. There seemed a reckless honesty about the fellow that fascinated me in spite of myself. How often had I felt the solitude of my chambers intolerable, and here was a learned and jovial companion eager to share them with me. True, that his character might be against him; but I had now begun the world, and must expect to encounter strange characters. And then, I doubt not that my vanity was tickled by his avowed fancy for me; and I suffered this adroit flattery to influence me in his favor. What chance has rustic youth against a citizen of the world such as this? The snare had been ingeniously prepared, and I walked blindfold into the meshes.

"I'll not turn you out of doors!" I cried, heartily; "and if you possess the learning for which you give yourself credit, I shall be very glad of your company."

"Your hand on that," said Philip Hay. "And now that I am provided with a decent coat I'll go and look up Mr. Cave, and see if I can strike a bargain with him for my Amazons."

On this he departed, and was no sooner gone than I began to ponder seriously whether this Mr. Hay would ever return, and if I had not been cheated out of a substantial suit of clothes by this eloquent adventurer. I had been warned against the tricks of the town, and this might be one of them. I laughed aloud as I thought how easily I had been cheated.

In this matter, however, I was agreeably disappointed. At five o'clock in the afternoon comes my gentleman, with his hat cocked on one side and his face triumphant.

"Look you there, Mr. Robert Ainsleigh!" he cried, flinging a purse of guineas on the table. "Your clothes have brought me luck. Mr. Cave happened to be in rare good-humor to-day, and I have struck a very fair bargain for my history. There was a great hulking fellow, with a queer twitch of his face and limbs, hanging about the shop, who went near to spoil my market by the display of his learning. He cried out that the Amazons were fabulous females, and that I could know as much of them as I knew of Achilles—just what was told in Homer, and fragmentary snatches of the Cyclic poets. But I extinguished my twitching friend—who wore a coat that was patched at the elbows and ragged at the cuffs, showing at once premeditated poverty and natural slovenliness—and talked Cave into an affection for my Amazons. Here are ten guineas earnest-money, and by your leave, Mr. Ainsleigh, we'll spend a pleasant evening. Shall it be at Marylebone Gardens or Don Saltero's, Ranelagh or Vauxhall? Under which king, Bezoni-an?"

I would fain have avoided appearing in public with my new acquaintance, of whom I knew nothing that was not to his discredit; but his good-humor and joviality soon vanquished my scruples. I had a natural curiosity about the pleasures of the town, those dazzling scenes of riot and delight which I had heard so praised by my fellow-students in the dining-hall—the places not to know which was to be in some manner behind the age. In a word, I suffered Mr. Philip Hay to lead me where he pleased; and those evenings which had hitherto been spent in the studious quiet of my chamber, or the grave gossip of an obscure coffee-house, were now given entirely to the pleasures of the town.

I might perhaps have continued to regard Philip Hay's assumed affection for myself with doubt and suspicion if that reprobate individual had required any thing from me. But his fortunes revived from the first day of our acquaintance, and he was more extravagant in his expenditure than myself, notwithstanding that my purse had been replenished by a bank-note inclosed in Lady Barbara's last letter. He reproached me loudly for my parsimony when I refused to drink or game in the vivacious company to which he introduced me at Vauxhall and other public places; and on more than one occasion, by his somewhat scornful offers to pay my score, drew me into an outlay which I afterward regretted, for I never forgot that I owed all to my benefactress; and the natural pride of manhood was only sustained by the hope that I should one day be able to repay all.

Nor were my nights spent in noisy pleasure at Don Saltero's, or wasted in the Ranelagh Rotundo, unattended by the after-bitterness of remorse. From scenes so frivolous, from company so loose and unprincipled, my thoughts went back to Hauteville, the calm days and happy evenings, the pleasant conversations over my lady's tea-board, the summer sunsets Dorothea Hemsley and I had watched from the Italian garden, when the night-dews hung heavy on the roses, and the last of midsummer's nightingales sang loud in the dusky distance of the wood. But, in spite of these better thoughts, the pleasures into which my companion plunged me were not without their charm. The restraint in which my boyhood had been spent especially fitted me to be the fool of such frivolous temptations; and my Mephistopheles contrived his snares with a rare genius. Scoldom did he suffer weariness to mar my amusement. A skillful courtier, set on by wily ministers to lure a crown-prince from thoughts of statecraft into the vile slough of dissipation, could not have acted his part with greater care or wisdom. In a word, my tempter played upon me as Prince Hamlet bade the courtiers play upon "this pipe;" and it was only afterward, when I saw the other side of his cards, that I knew the subtlety of his game, and how utterly helpless I had been in his hands.

I had enjoyed the privilege of Mr. Hay's society for six weeks before Sir Marcus Lestrangle and his family came to London. I had ventured to call more than once in St. James's Square, where the house-porter informed me that his master was suffering from an attack of gout, which detained him at Hauteville, and that Mr. Lestrangle was in Paris. I was relieved to hear of Everard's absence, and to know that Dora was for the present free from the attention, or persecution, of her enforced suitor.

We came through St. James's Square one night, after an evening spent at Vauxhall, whence it had pleased us to return on foot. I have since had reason to believe that Mr. Hay had his own special purpose in bringing me this way on this particular night. We had supped with some of his rascally acquaintance at the gardens, and he had induced me to drink a little more than usual. The punch, the company, and the long walk in the night-air had combined to excite my brain, and for the first time during our acquaintance I had spoken freely of my friends at Hauteville; nor did I perceive until afterward, when considering my night's folly in the sober reflections of the next morning, how artfully my companion led me on to the revelation of my most secret thoughts.

The windows of Sir Marcus's house were blazing with the light of numberless candles as we came into the square. The family had arrived, and Lady Barbara was holding a reception. The great hall-door was open, and we saw the splendor within, with guests ascending and descending, and footmen bawling in the hall and on the staircase. Without there was a crowd of chairmen, footmen with flaming torches, link-boys, and lantern-bearers, though it was a fine spring night, and the stars shining high up in the clear cold gray. We stood to watch the company passing in and out, powder and diamonds, rustling trains of gorgeous hues, and gold and silver brocade that flashed in the glare of the torches. The crowd proclaimed the names of beaux and belles, soldiers and statesmen. Now there was a hush and murmur in the crowd as Mr. Pelham descended from his chariot, with ribbon and star upon his breast, and a smile upon his florid countenance. How soon was that respected head to be laid low! And here, close behind him, came the Duke of Newcastle, looking right and left, with his glass held affectedly to his eye, challenging the plaudits of the crowd.

"What a grinning baboon goes yonder!" cried my companion, who knew every one; "it is a monkey that clammers into power on the shoulders of better men."

A thick-set, clumsy-looking man, with a dark, scowling face, came presently through the crowd.

"Yonder goes the Secretary of War, Henry Fox," said Mr. Hay; "one of the greatest statesmen we have, but not eloquent as a speaker. Did you ever see such a hang-dog countenance? One would say 'twas a fellow that had just committed murder and hid the body in a ditch. But the man is a genius! If he and Pitt could but combine their forces, the brotherhood of Pelham must bow their diminished heads. Sir Marcus is well in with the Ministry, you see, and I doubt not will get some new berth abroad or at home. Why, with such interest you ought to be in the House of Commons, instead of slaving for the reward of a shabby stuff gown, and the right to cross-examine the witnesses for the crown against a sheep-stealer! But come away; it is sorry pleasure hanging about the door when we feel ourselves good enough for the best company in the drawing-room."

"I am not so sure of my own merits as you are of yours, Philip," I answered, laughing; "but there is one in that house I would give a great deal to see."

"And that one is Miss Dorothea Hemsley, a young lady with fifty thousand pounds for her fortune, who is engaged to her cousin Everard Lestrangle, and who would marry you to-morrow if you had the courage of a mouse!" said my companion.

We had now drawn a little aloof from the crowd; Philip Hay had thrust his arm through mine, and was leading me homeward.

"What do you mean?" I cried, aghast at such sacrilege as this light mention of a name that was, and has ever been, sacred to my ears.

"I mean that I am a man of the world, and know what stuff women are made of. You tell me that Miss Hemsley is plighted, or all but plighted, to young Lestrangle, as hardened a sinner as my late patron Mallandaine, from whom I have heard his character. And you have watched her, and seen her unhappy; and you surprised her once in tears, and she owned that the burden of her sorrow was hard to bear. Yet with all her sorrow she found time and patience to teach you Spanish, and was pleased you should polish her Italian; and sang with you, and walked with you, and watched with a face white as a corpse while Sir Marcus reviled and banished you, and sent you a little pious monkish book for your comfort. Why, man alive, the woman loves you—it is as plain as the nose on your face—and would marry you out of hand if you had the spirit to ask her."

"That is impossible—even if I could do such an act of dishonor against Lady Barbara, which I could not. Those who have authority over her would take care to prevent such a marriage."

"Yes, if you were so dull a blockhead as to ask their permission. But I don't suppose even your rustic simplicity is simple enough for that. There are parsons by the score in May Fair and the Fleet who will marry you without leave or license from parents and guardians; and you will surely not let the young lady be sacrificed to a man she hates for lack of a little courage on your part."

"If daring of mine could secure her happiness there are few perils I would not dare," I answered, boldly.

"Pshaw! thou art a creature of ifs and buts. Had I such good fortune as to win the heart of an orphan heiress, I would not stand shivering on the door-step while my lady-love was pining for me within."

The cold night and the walk had sobered me by this time, and the man's tone offended me. I begged him to trouble himself no more about my business, which I assured him I could conduct without his advice. He received my rebuff with his usual good-humor, and for some time forbore to offend by any mention of Dora's name.

CHAPTER XI.

WE FLIGHT OUR TROTH.

ON the following day I received a note from Lady Barbara. It had been written before the assembly of the previous night, and it informed me that the writer would walk in the Mall in St. James's Park at three o'clock on that afternoon, attended only by a footman, and would be pleased if I could join her there, as if by accident.

Philip Hay was present when I received this letter, and soon after proposed an expedition that would occupy the afternoon and evening. When I declined this he questioned me so closely that I confessed I was going to meet my patroness. He congratulated me on being so high in her favor, and went out upon his own business.

My heart beat high as I entered the Mall. If Dora should be with Lady Barbara—if!—but I knew this could not be. My lady herself had been anxious to banish me from that sweet society, and would she again expose me to the danger which had already well-nigh wrecked my peace? No; I felt sure my benefactress would be alone; and yet it was with a pang of disappointment I saw her solitary figure approach me. It was not the fashionable hour for promenaders, and, except for an occasional passer, or a strolling nurse-girl with her brood of children, we had the walk well-nigh to ourselves.

Lady Barbara dismissed her footman, bidding him return for her in half an hour. She led the way to a retired seat under one of the newly-budding elms, and here we sat side by side, my lady for a few moments silent with emotion, and I no less deeply moved.

Presently she took my hand and kissed it. "Dear Robert! dear adopted son!" she murmured gently, "it is hard to meet you thus by stealth."

"Nothing is hard to me, dear Madam, except the loss of your affection."

"And that loss can never happen to you. I have only to look in your face, and the past comes back to me, and I fancy you are your father, and I am young, and jealous, and wicked, and miserable once more. No justice that I can do to you will atone for that old wrong to him. Oh, if it could! But that is a vain wish; a wrong done to the dead is done forever. How well you look! how manly you have grown! You had never much of the rustic air, but even that you had in gone, and you are a courtier, a man of the world. In what school have you been graduating?"

I blushed as I bethought myself that it was in those notorious seminaries of Ranelagh and Vauxhall I had acquired the manly air on which my dear lady was pleased to congratulate me.

"Speak to me of yourself, dear Madam," I said, "and of—"

"And of Dora!" said Lady Barbara, as I paused, confused. "Ah, Robert, that is a business which sorely troubles me."

"What business, Madam?"

"Dora's marriage with Everard. As the time draws near I begin to doubt the wisdom of my husband's conduct in this matter."

"As the time draws near!" I cried, my heart beating painfully. "What do you mean by those words, Madam?"

"Ah, I forgot. You know nothing of what has happened since you left Hauteville. Sir Marcus has hurried on this marriage between his niece and his son. I fear he has pressed his suit somewhat too persistently. The dear child yields, but I am sure she is unhappy; and oh, Robert, I sorely fear it is for her fortune Everard is so eager!"

"I know as much, Lady Barbara," replied I, and proceeded to repeat the remarks on this subject with which Mr. Everard had favored me. "No man who loved a woman would speak of her thus," I said, in conclusion.

On this my lady became very thoughtful.

"Oh, Robert, would to Heaven I knew what is best to be done!" she cried, after a pause.

"Any thing is better than that Miss Hemsley should be unhappy," said I; "and I do not believe that marriage can result in her happiness. Oh, Madam, believe me, this is no selfish argument. It is not because I love her that I say this. Alas, what hope have I? Sever her from Everard Lestrangé to-morrow, and she is no nearer me. But why should her peace be sacrificed to any ambitious design of her guardian's?"

"It was her father's wish also, Robert. Mr. Hemsley was a rich city merchant, who owed his position in society to his alliance with the Lestranges. He had a great friendship for my husband, and it was he who first mooted the idea of Dorothea's union with her cousin. His will was made with a view to this; and if Dora marries without her guardian's consent she forfeits half of her fifty thousand pounds, which sum goes to Sir Marcus."

I was inexpressibly glad to hear this; it seemed to lessen by one-half the distance between the heiress and me.

"Ah, Madam, how happy the lover who should win her against her uncle's will!" cried I.

"Even then she would have no despicable fortune. The stringent terms of Mr. Hemsley's will are by no means singular in days when clandestine marriages are so common, and an heiress the mark for every adventurer. There is some talk of a bill to stop Fleet marriages; but they say Henry Fox will oppose it with all his might, since he owes his happiness to a stolen match."

"You spoke of Miss Hemsley's marriage as near at hand, Madam. When is it to be?"

I faltered, and felt myself cowering like one who waits his death-blow.

"Alas, Robert, very soon; in a few weeks."

"That is indeed soon. But surely, Madam, if this young lady does not love her cousin you will interfere to prevent her misery? If Sir Marcus be the guardian of her fortune you are as surely the proper guardian of her peace; you can not consent to see her sacrificed."

"I know not what I ought to do, Robert," replied my lady, helplessly; "I wish I better knew the dear girl's heart; and yet I dare not question her. I have tried my uttermost to dissuade Sir Marcus from this hasty marriage, but he is inflexible. And Dora is his niece and ward, not mine. Everard is in Paris, where he is appointed Secretary of Legation; but he comes back to-morrow night. He is on the road at this moment, and the preparations for the wedding are already begun. The milliners are busy with the bride's finery; but the poor child takes no pleasure in laces and brocades. I remember the fuss about my own wedding-clothes, and what weary work it all seemed to me. Ah, Robert, these loveless, joyless marriages must surely be displeasing to Heaven! But I see my servant coming back to us. You must go, dear; I shall write to you soon. Good-by, and God bless you!"

So we parted; I to return to the Temple, sorely depressed in spirits. Nor were Mr. Hay's persuasions of any avail with me for some time after this. The very thought of crowded public gardens filled me with aversion; I sickened at my comrade's boisterous jokes; I buried myself in my books, and would have given much to be rid of this old Man of the Mountain, who had contrived to fasten himself upon my shoulders. I think Mr. Hay's tact enabled him to perceive this; for he left me to myself for upward of a week soon afterward, absenting himself upon his own business, as he said.

Days and weeks passed and brought me no letter from Lady Barbara. I suffered tortures of anxiety, and every evening after dark stole away from my books and walked to St. James's Square, where, under cover of the friendly night, I reconnoitred the mansion that sheltered Dorothea Hemsley. The lighted windows, more or less brilliantly illuminated, told me nothing of her who was perhaps sad and sorrowful within. Sometimes the thought that she was being forced into a hateful marriage went nigh to drive me to desperation. I remembered what Philip Hay—that soldier of fortune and citizen of the world—had said to me. The great doors of the diplomatist's house stood open before me. Why should I not rush in and rescue my darling from her oppressors by force of arms—my own strong arms, which should be able to shield and save her from all the world? Why should I not do this? Why, indeed, except that I had no right to suppose such a proceeding would be agreeable to Miss Hemsley. Could I have been assured of her love there would have been little need of hesitation. But how was I, the least learned of students in the science of woman's heart, to interpret with any certainty tender looks, and gentle blushes, and downcast eyelids, and faint fluttering hand, and low, tremulous voice? Those sweet signs of maiden bashfulness might mean so little, or so much.

One night that I found the house in St. James's Square dimly lighted, and the porter standing at the open door tasting the evening air, I made so bold as to ask that functionary whether there was not soon to be a marriage in the family he served. The man had not been at Hauteville, being no doubt too burly and ponderous a person for removal from his leather-hooded chair in London, and I therefore ran no hazard of recognition.

Yes; he informed me that on Thursday fortnight the young lady of the house was to be married. The blow struck hard. Thursday fortnight! It was now Tuesday; in sixteen days Dora would be gone from me forever.

I returned to my chambers with a distracted mind, but happily found a brief note from Lady Barbara awaiting me.

"We shall be at Vauxhall to-morrow evening," she wrote; "be sure to be at ten o'clock in the dark walk to the right of the statue of Neptune—and be cautious. We shall not be alone."

"We." Did "we" mean my lady and Miss Hemsley? I thought as much; and I know not how I lived till the next night. Philip Hay's presence and lively interest in my welfare seemed at this time particularly obtrusive. He questioned me closely as to where I was going to spend my evening, and said he had made a special appointment for me with some friends of his own at Vauxhall.

I doubt not that some movement of vexation at this intelligence betrayed where I was going, if he had not the knowledge already from another source.

Evening came, and I found myself for the first time alone in the gardens, fluttered with unspeakable hopes, and very anxious to avoid any encounter with Mr. Philip Hay. Though I had meant to arrive only a few minutes before the hour named by Lady Barbara it was but nine o'clock when I entered the gates, so swiftly did my desires outrun time. I kept entirely to the dark walks, and looked at my watch every time I came to a solitary lamp. Every footstep fluttered me, every rustle of brocade set my heart beating with a sudden tumult. I thought the gardens could never have been so full of fops and belles, the dark alleys never so affected by the company.

At last the clock struck ten; the distant music grew confused in my ears; placid stars above and twinkling lamps below swam before my eyes. Two ladies in hoods and masks approached, and in another moment Dora was at my side.

"Dora—Miss Hemsley!" I faltered; and then I know not what impulse possessed me, but, forgetful of all except the delight of this meeting, I clasped the dear girl in my arms. "My love, my darling!" I cried, "this hateful marriage must not be."

"No, Robert," she murmured, gently withdrawing herself from my embrace, "it shall not be. I have been very weak and cowardly; but when the time drew near despair made me bold, and I cast myself upon Lady Barbara's mercy. Dearest aunt! she is all goodness, and she will not suffer me to be wretched for life, as I should be if I married one I can not love, whom I can not even respect."

"Yes, Robert," said my lady, "we must save this dear girl. I knew not her heart till the night before last, when some fearful words she let fall tempted me to question her. We must save her—but how? I can not openly oppose the will of her guardian, my husband; and I know nothing against my step-son. It is a faithful lover must save her, Robert."

My lady and Dora had both removed their masks. The sweet girl stood before me, one moment pale as a lily, and in the next blushing crimson.

"There is one, Madam, who would shrink from no dangerous service if he might be permitted to save her, and who would take her for his wife penniless more proudly than as heiress to a great fortune. But he is obscure, dependent, almost nameless. Would you not despise such a one, Dora?"

"Despise you!" faltered my angel tenderly; and she gave me a divine look from her blue eyes.

"I begin to think I am not wanted here," cried my lady, laughing; "I will go and pay my respects to Neptune. Ah, Dora, will you hang your pearl necklace on the sea-god's trident if you escape shipwreck on life's troubled ocean?"

She was gone. I led my darling to a bench, and we sat down side by side. She put on her mask again. Was it to hide those maiden blushes? And then, emboldened by sudden joy, I spoke to her of my love, and implored her to consent to a speedy clandestine marriage.

"I would not offer you a name so obscure, Dora," said I, when I had pleaded in swift passionate words that came from the very depth of my heart; "I would rather wait and work patiently till I was worthier so dear a partner. But by this way only, or by a resolute refusal on your part, which would expose you to all the tortures of domestic persecution, can your union with Everard Lestrangé be avoided; and oh, my darling, I think I would sooner see you dead than united to that man, for I know he is a villain. Who else should have forged the vile letter that banished and disgraced me? Who else should be privy to poor Margery's flight? Ah, Dora, you know how little of my time was spent at the warren's lodge after one dear person came to Hauteville. I was but too forgetful of my old humble friends. No, darling, you must not marry Everard Lestrangé; but can you consent to share a lot so lowly as mine?"

"Yes, Robert," she whispered; and for a few blessed moments we sat silent, with clasped hands. This was our betrothal.

A faint rustling of the bushes behind startled us. I sprang to my feet.

"Who is there?" I cried, with my hand on my sword-hilt, for I was inclined to suspect an eaves-dropper.

Again I heard a stealthy rustling, and swift footsteps in the next walk. I examined the hedge, which grew thick and high; but the listener, if there had been one, was gone. Those rapid retreating footsteps were his, no doubt.

Lady Barbara came hurrying toward us.

"Come, children," she cried, "is all settled?"

"There is nothing settled, dear Madam, except that Miss Hemsley has blessed a most unworthy creature with her love."

"Oh, Robert, if I can read you aright, she will have no cause to repent her confidence. Dear children! But there is not time for another word. We are here with a party, you know, Robert, and have stolen away from them. Our friends will be looking for us. Am I to arrange every thing? Yes, I suppose mine is the only cool head among us. I will write to you, Robert."

"Lady Barbara!" called a gentleman, running toward us.

"See, here comes Mr. Dolford, one of our beaux! Away with you, cousin, away!"

I pressed Dora's hand, murmured a blessing upon my cousin and my love, and vanished as my lady's cavalier approached her, complaining bitterly of her absence.

"We have all been hunting you, ladies. Cal-cavanti, the conjuror, is just beginning his wonderful performance. It is the best thing to be seen this year, and I would not have you miss it. Lestrangé has been positively distracted, I protest, Miss Hemsley."

I felt like a creature in a dream after leaving Dora. My head swam with the sweet intoxication of so much happiness. I could not tear myself from the garden, but hung about the darker walks in the faint hope of seeing her again. It was not till after midnight that I left the pleasure-haunt and walked eastward under the pale April stars.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE old proverb that "truth is stranger than fiction" seems verified in the curious history of a diamond pin, which an ingenious writer might take as the basis of a novel. The facts, in brief, are as follows: In 1861 the wife of a Hartford merchant purchased at a prominent jeweler's a cluster diamond pin, as a birthday present for her husband. Last May, wearing it, as was his custom, he went by steamer to New York; and on the passage he either lost it, or it was stolen from him. No traces of it could be found; and a short time ago the gentleman's wife, desirous of replacing the lost gift, went to the same jeweler, and from the diamond pins shown her, selected one resembling the lost jewel. The resemblance was so striking that she finally called her husband's attention to it. On examination, he became convinced that it was the identical pin he had lost. Further investigation revealed the number of the pin, which corresponded with the number of the pin sold by the jeweler in 1861. The jeweler had purchased the pin from a New Haven merchant, and it was traced through several hands, one being a diamond-setter, and another a pawnbroker. The jeweler promptly surrendered the pin upon its identification. A few days later the owner embarked again on the same steamer upon which he had lost the pin months before. Some casual remark made to an employé on board resulted in the strange discovery that the employé once owned the pin himself—he had bought it of a watchman on the boat, who said he found it. Preferring a ring to a pin, he took it to a diamond-setter in New Haven, who engaged to reset the diamonds in a ring, and, as he supposed, did so. At any rate, he returned him a cluster ring. An examination of the recovered pin, however, showed that the original setting has never been disturbed. The sharp diamond-setter palmed off the ring upon his customer, kept the pin, charged for resetting, sold the pin to a pawnbroker, and finally, after many wanderings, it found its way back to the same store from which it was purchased seven years before, and a second time selected by a lady as a birthday gift to her husband. Such a chain of circumstances is very remarkable.

During a game of base-ball on Boston Common the other day, a young lady who was passing by was struck by a ball in the temple, and fell insensible. She was taken into the police officer's room, but it was some time before she was sufficiently recovered to be conveyed home.

The Scientific American recommends onions as a specific against epidemics. If sliced and kept in a sick-room they will absorb all atmospheric poison. A fresh one should be used every hour. It is noticed that in the room of a small-pox patient they blister and decompose with great rapidity, but will prevent the spread of the disease.

A novel appointment of officers was recently made in a Philadelphia church. Five ladies were ordained as deaconesses. A sermon was preached on the occasion, in which it was stated that the office of deaconess was common in the primitive church, and recognized in the Scriptures; that such an office was needful, since there were many duties in a church which ladies were specially fitted to perform, but which should be done with the authority of the church. The ladies, who received a solemn charge from the pastor, were all well-known residents of the city.

An importation of velocipedes from Paris is threatened. But the great question which is being discussed in that city is, whether ladies shall adopt the novel vehicle. Be that as it may, the project is on foot to supply all the rural letter-carriers with these simple and useful machines. The rounds of distribution which are now finished on foot at six o'clock in the evening may be finished at two o'clock in the afternoon with velocipedes, and there is, besides, a great saving of fatigue. A velocipede journey has been arranged by some amateurs of Marseilles. They are to go from that city by way of Corniche, Geneva, Turin, and Susa, over Mont Cenis, and return by the valley of the Rhone.

The latest novelties are trembling flowers covered with ants (artificial ones, we hope), which are used in Paris for bonnet-trimmings. This is nearly equal to the "spider" ear-rings announced a short time since.

It is said that any honest business is respectable; but we should think the man at Lake George who makes his own and his wife's living by catching rattlesnakes, and selling the oil obtained from them, would like a change of employment.

A few years hence, when the country through which the Pacific Railroad runs is settled, we may expect Rocky Mountain fruit will be among the novelties of our markets. It is said to be a fine orchard country.

An English lady, having been informed that the Medical School of the University of Paris was open to women, applied to the Minister of Public Instruction for official confirmation of the report. The Minister replied that English ladies who desired to follow the profession of medicine would be authorized to pursue their studies under the Faculty of Paris and to present themselves for examination. They must be provided with the diplomas required for admission.

Ladies—American ladies we mean, of course—should be thankful they do not live in Warsaw. There black dresses have been forbidden for some time, but now the interdiction extends to gray and other colors. Policemen are stationed at the church doors in order to assure themselves that the ladies do not even wear skirts of the forbidden colors.

Burglaries have been frequent at many of the fashionable watering-places during the past season. The following instance has some novel features: A lady of timid disposition was suddenly waked from sleep by a slight noise in her room. Giving her husband, who was slumbering soundly at her side, a tremendous pinch, she whispered, "Charles, Charles, wake up, there's a burglar standing right by my bedside." Charles did wake up, and seeing the outline of a dark figure bending over toward him, dealt it a sudden backhanded blow, with such effect that it landed backward with a crash on the chamber floor, while the room resounded with his wife's shrieks of "Thieves! help! murder! the burglar; he's killed me!" The husband sprang to his feet and grasped a chair, when his chamber door was burst in by a porter, with a candle, and two gentlemen whom he was escorting to their rooms. There lay the lady prostrate, with the blood streaming from her nose, and the husband stood fiercely brandishing a chair. He was unceremoniously disarmed by the newcomers.

"Ain't you ashamed to be fightin with your wife, you ruffin?"

"Fighting with my wife; what do you mean? I knocked over a burglar, just now, who was leaning over my bed, trying to steal my watch."

"Oh dear! no, Charles, that was me sitting up in bed," sobbed the lady; "and I thought it was the burglar that struck me with a club." The intruders retired.

A very simple dish is often relished by an invalid whose stomach rejects more elaborately prepared articles of food. Pudding or gruel made of corn, roasted brown like coffee, and ground in a coffee-mill, is agreeable and wholesome. It is often a decidedly remedial agent in cases of diarrhea and dysentery.

We hope the Boston cigar-dealer who makes the startling statement that he sells an average of three hundred cigars a day for the use of ladies in that city, has reliable data to establish his statement. Such a report should be investigated before it is taken for granted to be true.

A NEW THEORY IN VOCALIZATION.

ABUNDANT evidence is found by practical anatomists to prove that the ability to sing depends far more on some undiscovered condition of some part of the brain, than in the muscular tissues of the larynx or vocal box at the upper part of the windpipe.

All the singing birds have their musical box just at the root of the lungs, whereas in man it is at the top, making a projecting prominence in front of the throat below the chin. The tracheal tube is an elastic pipe with the lungs at the lower extremity, acting as bellows, and the air which they force up through it, in passing through the larynx, rushes by the thin edges of some tense horizontal membranes that vibrate, and sound is the result. Every terrestrial animal, therefore, can make some kind of vocal sound, which is varied in character and intensity as it rises in the scale of organic life. The serpent hisses; so does the goose also, but it can do more, and squawk. Additional power or ability to modify the original tone depends on additional muscular developments which invariably bear a certain correspondence to a further cerebral development.

Notwithstanding these well understood facts, Sir Duncan Gibbs, a new writer on physiological subjects, has published the results of a series of observations on a certain part of the vocal box called epiglottis, or cover of the box, on the essential condition of which, according to his theory, the ability to sing, that is, in the highest sense of artistic vocalization, depends, and consequently laryngeal muscles or brain influence is quite ignored. With a laryngoscope—an instrument for looking into the back part and far down

Consequently when the voice is thus defective the cause of it is apparent. Lastly, to show how many epiglottises are out of place in Great Britain he puts the unfortunate down in round numbers at over 3,000,000. In other words, they either can not sing or have no music in their souls.

Now let us look a little further into this matter. To the closest anatomical critic the difference between the vocal mechanism of an orang-outang and that of a man, singer or no singer, could not be demonstrated very satisfactorily if at all. With a brain which can only receive and transmit, a knowledge of music would be an ut-the varying tension of all the muscles on both sides and front of the neck, together with the elongation or shortening of the windpipe.

The first and essential office of the epiglottis in animals where it exists is to fall over the top of the air-tube leading to the lungs, acting as a valve to prevent any foreign matter from falling into it. Thus, in swallowing a morsel it slides over the top of the epiglottis and drops into the esophagus, or tube leading to the stomach. If, by accident, a crumb or a drop of fluid gets under the edge of the air-pipe cover, or glottis, into the air duct, a sudden paroxysm of coughing instantly ensues, which is nature's readiest method

Promenade, Dinner, and Carriage Dresses.

Fig. 1.—Promenade dress of foulard écarlate, with a deep flounce, bordered with a band of foulard of a darker shade, and surmounted by a double ruche. Low corsage with long sleeves. Mantelet with crossed ends, of the same material as the dress, edged with bouffette trimming of foulard of a darker shade, and with black guipure two inches wide. The sleeves are trimmed in the same manner. Black lace bonnet with pomegranate blossoms.

the throat—in the examination of 4600 healthy persons of all ages and both sexes, varying positions in life, he found the epiglottis in 513 to be quite pendent, and not in a vertical position. He ascertained also, that it was hereditary in many instances, for he found it thus in a mother and child. He makes the percentage in this condition 11 among Europeans, but much greater in the natives of Asia and Africa, 280 of whom he examined.

Next this epiglottic philosopher believes the compass of the voice in female singers very much depends on the canting or out of place aspect of the valve. Young girls, he says, with a pendency of the glottis, can never expect to become singers of any note, unless the epiglottis can be readjusted. The voice is not clear and silvery either in them or boys when thus displaced, as it were.

ter impossibility. Birds never make any progress although year after year they are subjected to the full influence of musical instruments. The canary repeats the same notes while it lives, and so do other song birds, and simply because the brain has not the susceptibility for appreciating a sound beyond the range of its own voice.

This imagined varying position of the epiglottis is simply absurd. It has nothing to do with the voice, except in rising or falling in the slightest degree for varying the air current; but the vibration of the edges of the vocal chords gives the sound, and the widening or narrowing of the chink—a mere slit between two little cartilages, controlled by exquisitely developed muscles—gives the voice its whole character as a simple tone. Its modifications into singing are wholly due to the mouth, nasal cavities, lips, teeth, and of dislodging it, because, should it fall still lower down the bronchial tube into or among the air-cells of the lungs, suffocation is almost sure to follow.

If the learned throat inspector, who imagines he has discovered why some persons can not become opera-singers on account of some awry position of the epiglottis, were to inspect that organ in cattle, horses, and dogs, he would unquestionably find it out of place or canting in the wrong direction as frequently as he has in man. And if his theory were correct, it would be equally philosophical to say that some of them could not bellow, others could not neigh, and many dogs must necessarily bark out of time, or perhaps not at all. Voice and a musical ear depend on the anatomical conditions of the controlling organ of the system—the brain.

YACHTING.—[See Page 778.]

YACHTING.

See illustration on page 777.

Our yacht flies free o'er the foaming sea,
Where green lawns slope to the tide—
Or we sail her away to some far bright bay
Over the ocean wide:
A merry breeze blows, while the cutter goes
Gayly before its breath;
And the fair hours flit amid wine and wit
To which music answereth.

Our yacht hath a crew such as never knew
Ulysses, wanderer wild;
When at morn they emerge in their suits of serge.
'Tis as if the stern sea smiled:
'Tis as if once more, far from any shore,
Came a marvelous gift to earth,
And Cythera's pride was multiplied
In these darlings of love and mirth.

Our yacht can race at a wondrous pace,
And many a cup has won;
And we hear the tale under easy sail
By the light of the setting sun.
Then there's naught to check our lounge on the deck—
For we've left all cares at home;
And the Skipper (why not?) declares our yacht
Is the queen of the flashing foam.

THE GOLDEN WEDDING.

"I SAY, Ruth!"

"Well?"

The first tone was sharp, eager, significant, and masculine.

The response was mild, languid, indifferent, and feminine.

"Whose wagon tracks are these?"

A farmer past middle age, sunbrowned and muscular, pointed to fresh tracks that described a circle on the moist earth and stretched away in long, parallel lines.

The feminine face, pretty and girlish, grew crimson as the answer was hesitatingly given: "Mr. Olcott's carriage was here this afternoon."

"It's only fair to suppose the carriage had a horse before it, and a driver in it," remarked the farmer, dryly. "Who drove?"

"Mr. Olcott," answered the young girl, with deepening blushes.

"What does the old covey want to come here so often for?" inquired the farmer, testily.

"Jacob," called a shrill female voice from the window, "have you taken the wheat to the mill?"

"No; but Ruth is taking her eggs to a very poor market," answered the farmer, shortly.

"Don't tease the child," said the woman, rebukingly. "And you'd better hurry up, or Mr. Jones will be gone from the mill before you get the grist there."

"Ruth," exclaimed the man, stepping to the girl's side and speaking in a low tone, "if I see Jerome Anderson coming here I shall put him on another track. He is too good a fellow to be trifled with, and Olcott isn't a circumstance—"

"Jacob, are you ever going to get off with that grist?" was the shrill interruption to the man's remark.

"Yes, I'm going in two jerks," was the prompt reply. His voice sunk to a whisper: "Ruth, don't make work for repentance," he said, impressively. "It's a dreadful thing."

"Ruth," called the shrill-voiced woman, "come in the house. You'll catch your death-cold sitting out there in the dew; and last night you was traipsing over the wet grass as if you wasn't subject to the quinsy and rheumatiz in your shoulder. It must be a thousand times nicer to ride in a handsome carriage like Mr. Olcott's."

"Yes, ma'am."

Ruth said it humbly; but the affirmation would have provoked a score of queries had she been testifying on the witness-stand, for there was that in it that suggested mental reservation.

Mrs. Beebe, the practical, sharp-sighted, clear-headed woman, as she was called, noted the manner with displeasure. "Of course," she said, "it stands to reason that it's better to ride than to walk, and it's better to wear silk gowns than calico, and you'd be standing in your own light to give Jerome Anderson any encouragement when a man like Mr. Olcott worships the very ground you walk on."

Ruth made no reply. The question was debatable, judging from the indecision in her face. She sat down at the window and looked out until her mother called her.

"Whatever upon earth ails the child! Why, Ruth, you're sitting in the draught, and there'll be a sore throat or something worse to pay!"

Ruth arose with a smothered sigh and looked at the clock. "Half past eight!" she said to herself. "Father has put Jerome Anderson on another track. He won't come to-night."

She took a work-basket from the closet and drew up to the table where her mother sewed by the light of a tallow-candle. Ruth snuffed the candle, and took from her work-basket some muslin and a bit of lace.

Her mother watched her closely. "Is that all the lace you bought?" she asked, in a tone that was full of calculation.

"Yes, ma'am; it is real," explained Ruth.

"But it didn't take all the money?" asked Mrs. Beebe, in the same calculating tone.

"Yes, ma'am. It takes a great deal of money to buy a very little real lace. Aunt Catharine used to say a person was better dressed with a very little real lace than a great many yards of imitation," answered Ruth, in justification of her purchase.

"Humph!" ejaculated Mrs. Beebe, somewhat disdainfully. "Your aunt Catharine has some very high notions. She ain't a bit like your father. She can afford to buy real lace, if she wants it. If I'd been in your place, I'd rather had more lace for the same money. You've got some very extravagant notions for a poor girl, Ruth Ann."

When Mrs. Beebe meant to be very impressive, she addressed her daughter as Ruth Ann.

Ruth blushed guiltily. She was conscious of her failing in that direction. She remembered how that very morning she had stood at the counter of the little village store, trying to reconcile those very condemned notions with her limited ability. It had not been an easy task. The notions were so extravagant, and the ability so very small. Then the ability was so uncompromising. The shillings could not by any possibility expand themselves to meet her tastes, and there had been no alternative but for the tastes to succumb entirely to the shillings.

A very trifling thing this balancing of lace and filthy lucre in a young girl's mind, say you? Perhaps so to men who never look at lace with reference to their own toilettes, and to women who have lost their love of dress with their youth; but to a young girl who knows that the firm around her throat has much to do with the tone of her complexion, and that a web of delicate threads softens the beauty of plump, round arms, this question of lace is an all-absorbing one.

Ruth Beebe had other thoughts, standing at the little counter, comparing the lace she wanted with the lace she did not want, trying to reconcile quantity, and quality, and price. From tangled thoughts of lace it was a step to tangled thoughts of life, for Ruth's life was somewhat tangled now. It had been a very smooth life until Mrs. Beebe's ambition had changed it. Ruth Beebe, only a year younger than she was now, standing under the apple-trees, with pink and white blossoms falling on her chestnut hair, looked up beyond the brown hands that sifted the apple-blossoms through his fingers, into Jerome Anderson's honest, love-lit eyes, and there was no entanglement in her life then.

Mrs. Beebe, from the farm-house window, looked into the orchard with a brow piled full of frowning wrinkles.

"Jacob!" she called, in a loud, decided tone.

Jacob did not hear. He was either asleep or dreaming just in sight of the pretty picture in the apple orchard.

"Jacob!" exclaimed Mrs. Beebe, this time touching the man on his shoulder.

Jacob Beebe came to consciousness with a start. "What's the matter, Rachel?" he asked.

"Are the cows in the corn, or—?"

"No, no!" answered his wife, impatiently. "It's about Ruth."

"What's about Ruth?" inquired the man, subsiding into a seat.

"What I've got to say," answered Mrs. Beebe.

"Oh, I thought it was young Anderson's arm," said Jacob Beebe, with a low, chuckling laugh.

Mrs. Beebe rose up in her wrath. "Jacob," she said, "you're a—"

The angry woman changed her mind, and modified her remark. "You're enough to try the patience of a saint," she said.

Jacob Beebe laughed. The laugh, interpreted, said, "That is not you."

"Ruth is a woman," continued Mrs. Beebe, emphatically.

"Hardly," answered her husband, meditatively. "It's only a few years since she was a baby."

"Eighteen—just eighteen, the tenth of last month," corrected Mrs. Beebe. "But that's neither here nor there. She is a woman and is thinking of beaux, and the next thing she will be getting married."

"Married!" echoed Jacob Beebe, sadly. "Yes, of course; but it's a pity."

"Now the question is, who shall she marry?" continued Mrs. Beebe, as if she were stating a problem in algebra or a proposition in geometry.

"It ain't for you nor me to say," was the calm reply of her husband.

"She is pretty enough and good enough for the Governor," exclaimed Mrs. Beebe.

"Or the President," added Jacob Beebe, with a proud smile.

"She ain't likely to marry any body that will be a credit to her family, staying around here and going on with that young Anderson," said Mrs. Beebe, indignantly.

"Jerome is a likely lad," answered Jacob, in a kindly tone.

"He isn't the man for our Ruth; only an Anderson, and his father in debt when he died, and all the family hanging on to Jerome," remonstrated Mrs. Beebe. "If you haven't ambition enough to want to settle your daughter better in life than that I have, and I've been thinking it would be a good thing to send Ruth to her aunt Catharine's in the city, and let her see a little of the world."

At last Mrs. Beebe had said what she intended to say when she aroused her husband from his nap or dream with that shrill cry of "Jacob."

There had been remonstrance on Farmer Beebe's part. It was hard to give up his daughter for a few months even. He did not see her danger in staying home as her mother did, and he did see her danger in going away as her mother did not. But Mrs. Beebe carried her point. It was her way to overcome all obstacles that Jacob Beebe could interpose.

From this visit had come the entanglement of Ruth Beebe's life. It was easy to engraft on a young mind like hers a taste for the luxuries that surrounded her in her aunt's home, and Mrs. Beebe, ambitious and scheming, was gratified on Ruth's return to see that she did not settle down quite content with the old simple ways of living. The discontent might have worn away but for Mrs. Beebe's fostering, and the attentions of Humphrey Olcott, the rich man on the hill. These attentions in their ultimate meaning settled so satisfactorily the troublesome questions of taste and ability that Ruth was tempted to make the most of them. But there was Jerome Anderson, the honest young farmer, who looked tenderly on Ruth and askance at the rich man on the hill; and with thoughts of him all of Ruth's life, with its opposing claims and counter forces, twisted itself into a tangle as perplexing as the Gordian knot.

She was working away mentally at the tangled web that night, as she sat at the little work-table, with the poor candle-light falling on the white muslin and bit of lace.

Mrs. Beebe looked at the clock. It would soon be time for Jacob's return, and she had something to say to Ruth in her husband's absence.

"I don't know what you're thinking of to encourage a poor man like Jerome Anderson," she said, at length, biting off her thread with a jerk. "If I was you I'd give him his walking-papers."

Ruth recognized that as a bold advance movement to draw her into a wordy combat. She had been there before, and knew the ground well. She snuffed the candle without a word of comment. Silence was the only intrenchment into which she could retire.

Mrs. Beebe changed her tactics. "These candles are miserable," she remarked, in infinite disgust. "That last tallow wick I tried right; and if there wasn't water in these dips they wouldn't splutter like all-possessed. I expect it comes tough for you to see by these feeble lights after enjoying your aunt's gas."

"The gas-light was very pleasant," answered Ruth, meditatively.

Humphrey Olcott's new house is going to have gas in it," remarked Mrs. Beebe, glancing at her daughter to note the effect of her words. "He is building a fine cage. Almost any bird might be contented in it."

"Olcott's house is pretty sure to have gas in it," commented Jacob Beebe, who had returned from the mill in time to hear his wife's last remark concerning Mr. Olcott. "It's pretty sure to have gas in it when its master is home; and if I was a bird I'd rather have the poorest, homeliest nest an honest bird could build me than Olcott's cage with its golden bars. That's my opinion!"

"Oh, Jacob, you are so set in your notions!" exclaimed Mrs. Beebe. "And here is Ruth sighing and longing for things every day that you can't afford to buy her. Just look, Jacob, at that little piece of lace! Ruth would buy the real stuff. She don't approve of imitations. There's a pretty girl for a poor man's wife! I tell you, Jacob, men don't understand these things."

Jacob Beebe sighed. "Lace is not the worst want in the world," he said, in an under-tone. "And I hope Ruth will remember that the love of a married woman ought to be the real stuff, and no imitation. Wives can get along better without lace than love. Are you going to your cousin's wedding?" he asked, turning to Ruth.

"Yes, Sir," answered Ruth. "Mother thinks I had better, and I am trimming my dress."

"And you want more lace?" asked the farmer, gravely, as the colored servant called Mrs. Beebe into the kitchen.

"It's a little scant, but I don't mind much," answered Ruth, looking up with a feeble smile.

"I wish I could afford—" began the farmer.

Ruth stopped him. "I don't mind a bit," she said; and her smile was brave now as she put her arms around her father's neck. "Don't think of it again. I don't care."

Farmer Beebe smoothed his child's hair tenderly. "You're a good girl, Ruth," he said, with a trembling voice. "Don't let them spoil you."

Mrs. Beebe came in, and Ruth took her candle and went up stairs.

"Jacob," said Mrs. Beebe, sharply, when they were alone, "you're enough to try the patience of a saint, as I've told you before. Here I am trying to do all I can for Ruth Ann, and you just upset all I do by your unreasonable talk against Mr. Olcott. It isn't doing justice by your child nor me. If Ruth Ann ever makes any body she won't have her father to thank."

Jacob snuffed the candle and picked up the Bible. The act was strangely like his daughter's an hour before. Experience had taught them both to avoid unequal warfare with this woman.

Mrs. Beebe, frowning, went into the kitchen to look after affairs for the night. She knew better than to hope to draw him out of the silence wherein he had intrenched himself.

And Jacob read his Bible, his eyes fixed on one verse on the open page. When his wife was gone he read aloud: "Visiting the iniquities of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation—" He stopped there with a groan. "Yes," he commented; "I suffer for my father's wrong, and my child suffers for mine. God help us!"

Ruth Beebe stood in crowded city parlors watching the throng around her. There was much to please Ruth's fancy. The shimmer of the silks, the glitter of the jewels, the fragrance of the flowers, the music, and the brilliant lights were very beautiful in her estimate. There was a stir at the door, and ushers cleared the way for the bridal party. For a moment Ruth saw nothing but the trailing satin and flowing lace, the orange blossoms and the pearls. Then her eyes sought the bridegroom, a little, hard-faced, and wrinkled man. She started visibly, and glanced to the corner where stood a young man with a look of intense scorn on his handsome features. Ruth remembered her cousin Nellie's words in a confidential mood: "I shall never love a man as I love Walter Dwight." The young, scornful face in the corner was Walter Dwight's; and Nellie was vowing love, honor, and obedience to this dark-faced and wrinkled man. Ruth shuddered as her father's words came to mind: "The love of a married woman ought to be the real stuff, and no imitation." She looked around and listened. Congratulations had commenced in the centre of the room and rippled into gossip waves in the corners. Ruth gathered that the groom was rich as a Jew; that the bride's silks would stand alone; that her laces were fine as cobwebs and rare as guinea gold; that the groom's past life would not bear close scrutiny; that the bride was listless and indifferent; that—

She heard no more, watching her cousin's white face as Walter Dwight approached. "How could she do it?" was her involuntary thought—and then she checked herself in self-condemnation. Suppose she married Humphrey Olcott what better was she?

Ruth never lost sight of that white face in the supper and dancing and merriment that followed. Even when the bride and guests and caterers and musicians were gone, and all the house was still, as she sat upon the floor with her chestnut hair falling in unbound beauty, and the simple white dress laid off, the bride's pale face haunted her still. She closed her eyes to shut out the sight, and stopped her ears to drown the words of the Service: "Until death do us part." A lifetime! She had hardly thought so far. A girl's thoughts go so little beyond the wedding-day, the bridal trousseau, the gifts, and first establishment as mistress of a home. She ignores so totally the plain common days that follow—days, like those in the past, full of vexations and trials—days when the sun is hidden and the wind blows from the east, when the nerves are all unstrung and trifles become tests of temper, when men and women lay off their social armor, and stand revealed to each other with all their weakness and littleness and blemishes uncovered. Ruth's thoughts grew personal. Humphrey Olcott and a lifetime! Years of fading and growing old! Years of pain and grief, perhaps! She began to have faith in her father's words: "Wives can get along better without lace than love." She almost resolved to make sure of the love if she missed the lace; and, girl-like, fell asleep before the question was quite settled.

There was a golden wedding in the neighborhood of farmer Beebe's. It was not much of an affair; the couple were too simple and unpretending for that.

"There will be very little gold and a great deal of wedding," farmer Beebe remarked on their way.

Ruth, just returned from the city wedding, looked up with a smile. She understood her father's meaning. She had gathered some facts from her aunt Catharine concerning her father's marriage. It had been the result of his father's ambitious scheming that he had wedded Rachel Crane; and he had not married her without a haunting memory of a mild-eyed, gentle-voiced woman.

That golden wedding settled Ruth Beebe's fate. Her eyes scarcely left the old couple. She had always known them and pronounced their devotion beautiful years before. No bride and groom with the vows of marriage fresh upon them had interested her like this aged man and woman. Here was love whose genuineness fifty years had proved—trust half a century old, and confidence that time and trial had not shaken.

"Fifty years!" Ruth Beebe kept saying, looking at Humphrey Olcott. "Fifty years with lace and jewels, and a modern house!"

She came out of that reverie with a start. The old couple were singing:

"John Anderson my jo, John,
When Nature first began
To try her canny hand, John,
Her master-work was man;
And ye amang them a', John,
Sae trig frae top to toe,
She proved to be no journey work,
John Anderson my jo."

John Anderson my jo, John,
Ye were my first conceit—"

There was a movement at Ruth's side. She glanced up and saw Jerome Anderson standing there. Her eyes dropped, and she did not raise them till the song was finished. It was a simple song, and poorly sung; but the band of skillful musicians at the city wedding had failed to make such melody for Ruth's ears. Her eyes filled with tears as the old people tremblingly sang the last verse:

"John Anderson my jo, John,
We've climbed the hill together,
And mony a canty day, John,
We've had wi' aye anither;
Now we maun totter down, John,
But hand in hand we'll go,
And sleep thegither at the foot,
John Anderson my jo."

She could never sing that with Humphrey Olcott, never. She took Jerome Anderson's offered arm, and went out on the porch.

Mrs. Beebe, laying off her bonnet, said to Ruth, "I expect this golden wedding was a very poor affair by the side of your cousin's wedding."

Ruth shook her head gravely. "No," she answered; "it was a thousand times richer in the essential elements of a wedding."

"Essential elements!" echoed Mrs. Beebe, in a frightened tone; "what's that?" She remembered seeing Ruth go out on the porch with Jerome Anderson. "You don't mean to say—" she began.

"But I do," answered Ruth. She was smiling. All the tangled life was straightened out. She had cut the Gordian knot that night.

Mrs. Beebe gasped, "Not Jerome Anderson!"

"Yes, Jerome Anderson," answered Ruth, bravely.

Mrs. Beebe poured out the vials of her wrath. They were very bitter. She always knew it would be so. Ruth Ann was just like her father for all the world. It was all his work. She had never done any thing for Ruth Ann but he had spoiled it with his folly.

She ceased after a time. Ruth and her father had retired into the old intrenchment of silence. Ruth was humming to herself "John Anderson my jo," and Jacob Beebe was thanking God that his child had missed the rock on which his happiness had split.

LOVE OF THE PERIOD.

By FRANK DASHMORE.

I've just left the ball-room, dear Harry,
To drop you this bit of a note,
Which the Captain has promised to carry
Direct by the four o'clock boat.

The season is certainly over—
Sue Summers refused Colonel Chute—
Don't swear like a savage sea rover,
Because our affair follows suit.

We only engaged for this season—
You're prince of all partners, I vow—
I'll tell you, directly, the reason
I'm writing so hastily now.

Please send me at once, by Tom Tinberne—
His whiskers are simply divine!—
My picture, that copy of Swinburne,
And every thing else that is mine.

My letters, my notes, and that poem—
The one signed "Anonyma," dear—
I know that you never would show 'em;
I want to look over them here.

Please send me my pink satin slipper—
I think I can cover the stain—
You pulled off and used as a dipper,
To pledge me in Clicquot Champagne.

And, Harry, don't fail to see Barker—
You would cut my curls off you know—
Should you send some a half a shade darker,
The difference never will show.

Send ribbons and ring; I think this is
The last of the things I must ask.
I'm sure that to send back my kisses
You'll vote an impossible task!

Now, Harry, don't rage and be horrid,
Don't bluster and swear and abuse;
Our love was deliciously torrid—
To drop it quite gives me the blues!

I've viewed it in every direction,
And find in its limitless range,
A pure, Pantheistic perfection,
Progressive, electrical, strange!

I know that its bliss unalloyed—
If once I were bound as your wife—
Would fade in a fortnight, destroyed
By dullness of everyday life!

And so I've determined, dear Harry—
As girls of the period do—
Although I must certainly marry,
'Twill not be, my lover, to you!

We winter next session at Willard's;
Dear Hal, you must surely be there,
I shall be Mrs. Daniel Dillards—
He's a hideous, humpbacked millionaire!

A BASKET OF STRAWBERRIES.

By BARRY GRAY.

"IT is a good many years, my dear," I said to my wife, as together we walked down the lane in the twilight, "since, in the lush days of my youth, I went a strawberrying. The little girl I went with is lying under the violets, and the fingers that picked the berries, the stains of which were so deep I could not kiss them off, long ago mouldered into dust. The basket she used, empty, and discolored with the juices of the berries it contained, is carefully put away and kept as a slight, though sufficient, memorial of that happy day. What that young maiden, had she lived to be a woman, might, in after-years, have been to me I can not tell; I only know that she was very, very dear to me in those early summer days, and that I have never been a berrying with any one since then."

My wife leaned softly on my arm, and for a few moments we walked on in silence.

"Strawberries, my dear," I said, "are as old as the hills. I don't believe there was ever a hill made whereon the strawberry did not grow."

"I don't know about that," my wife said.

"Of course you don't," I replied, "and, consequently, you can not deny it. The fact is that strawberries have strayed from the Garden of Eden all over the world; and it is from this very circumstance that they derive their name. The best authorities say that it comes from the straying, spreading nature of its growth, and we find that the word straw, an active verb, means to strew, to scatter. Others, however, declare that they owe their name to the practice of placing straw under the stems of the plants to keep the fruit from being soiled by contact with the earth. But that in my opinion is sheer nonsense, and to accept it one must admit that the strawberry had no name until the gardeners undertook its cultivation."

"Which would be preposterous," said my wife.

"Most certainly," I replied. "But a Mr. Phillips, whoever he may be, thinks that the name came from a still older practice, viz.: 'that among children, of threading the wild berries upon straws of grass.' He says, declares our authority, 'that this is still a custom in parts of England where strawberries abound, and that so many straws of berries are sold for a penny.'"

"That, certainly," said my wife, "is a much prettier, as well as a more primitive and rustic interpretation of its derivation."

"The botanical name," I continued, "is Fragaria, and the Italians call it Fragola—fragrant."

"Than which," chimed in my wife, "nothing can be better; for they are as fragrant as a bunch of posies, and as beautiful to look at."

"Yes," I added, "and they are delicious to eat. I scarcely know whether I like them best, when I gather them fresh from the vines, and eat them one by one—for then each berry yields its individual flavor; and let me tell you that there is as much character in a strawberry as there is in a human being—"

"Oh!" exclaimed my wife.

"Or," I went on, paying no attention to her interruption, "when heaped together in a saucer, with sugar sprinkled over them, and, if you like, smothered in cream—"

My wife said she did like.

"They remind me of a lovely maiden on her bridal couch."

"My dear!" said my wife, reprovingly.

"Well," I replied, "one can't admire or praise the strawberry too highly. And there was an Italian poet—I get my information from Leigh Hunt—a Jesuit, and a very honest man, too, who wrote a poem in two cantos, containing upward of nine hundred lines, ending in the following bridal climax—he has been apostrophizing two young friends of his, newly married—and this is the blessing with which he concludes:

'Around this loving pair may joy serene
On wings of balm forever wind and play;
And laughing Health her roses shake between,
Making their life one long, sweet, flowery way!
May bliss, true bliss, pure, self-possessed of mien,
Be absent from their side, no, not a day!
In short, to sum up all that earth can prize,
May they have sugar to their strawberries!'

"Many a young couple," said my wife, looking thoughtfully upon the ground, "who embarked on the sea of matrimony, expecting to have sugar, and even cream, with their strawberries, have been grievously disappointed."

"Yes," I said, "their strawberries have been sour, their peaches have been bitter, and their cherries have mouldered in the mouth."

"I never heard before," said my wife, "of cherries, or indeed any fruit, mouldering in the mouth."

"There are probably, my dear," I said, "a great many other things of which you have never heard, and, for that matter, never will hear. But what says this Italian poet further: 'They must hide themselves,' he declares—'put on their veils; to wit, of sugar.' 'Strawberries and sugar were to him,' as our genial gossip has it, 'what sack and sugar was to Falstaff—the indispensable companions, the sovereign remedy for all evil, the climax of good.' Throwing physic to the dogs, he says:

'For my part, I confess I fairly swill and stuff myself with strawberries; and abuse
The doctors all the while, draught, powder, pill:
Give me a glut of strawberries; and, lo!
Sweet through my blood, and very bones, they go.'

All authorities speak of strawberries as healthful and medicinal. Fontenelle attributed his longevity to them, in consequence of their having regularly cooled a fever which he had every spring, and he used to say: 'If I can but reach the season of strawberries.' Hoffman says they 'cured even consumptions; and Linnaeus declares that, by eating plentifully of them, he kept himself free from the gout, which strikes me as being a capital remedy."

"And one," said my wife, "which I would not object to follow myself."

"I was not aware before that you were troubled with that complaint," I said.

"Nor am I," she replied; "but can't I take the remedy without having the disease?"

"Yes, if you wish to ward it off," I said, "of course. Even their leaves are wholesome, and we read in Sir John Suckling's tragedy of Brennora of their preciousness. In his portrait of a beautiful girl he says:

'Eyes full and quick,
With breath as sweet as double violets,
And wholesome as dying leaves of strawberries.'

When I brought home, not long since, a pottle of strawberries—"

"Why," my wife interrupted me, "you never brought home a bottle of strawberries in your life."

"I said pottle not bottle," I replied.

"What in the world is a pottle?"

"A pottle," I answered, willing to display my little learning, "is a small, cone-shaped basket, made especially for holding berries. The word is not in common use here, but it is well known in England, and Leigh Hunt employs it familiarly in his writings. He thinks, too, that 'no other sort of basket would do as well for them,' and gives as a reason that 'it carries well; it lies on your arm like a length of freshness; then there is the covering of leaves, and beneath them, fresh, and fragrant, and red, lie the berries—the best, it is to be feared, at the top.' We see from this that the Yankee vendors of berries are not alone in their attempts at cheating; but that the English hucksters are equally tricky. Well, as I was about to say, if you had not interrupted me, when I brought home that pottle of strawberries you were not very well—indeed you were quite ill; but after eating of them, you immediately grew better. Ah, there is undoubtedly a virtue in strawberries greater than what dwells in blue-pills."

"I hope so," said my wife.

"One of the best things, too, about a strawberry is," I said, "that it is never necessary to make two bites at it; though, to be sure, if that gentleman of Newark, who declares that he can, with cultivation, raise strawberries as large as pine-apples, should succeed in his attempts, we might make one berry go round a tea-table. He wants twenty years to do it in, however, and as he may die in the mean while, it is hardly worth our while to count as yet on his success. I confess I would rather not see the feat accomplished; for where then would be the 'little red mouthful of strawberry' of which the poet speaks? No, there is a grossness in the idea which the lovers of strawberries should not tolerate. The smallest berries, as a rule, are the highest in flavor; nothing in the way of deliciousness can exceed that of the small berry that grows wild on the hill-sides, and you will find, almost invariably, that the cultivated berry loses in flavor as it gains in size. Who, too, with strawberries so large, would think of sending a dish of them, or even one, as a gift to his lady-love? One might as well send a cabbage, or a pumpkin—at least if size has any thing to do with it. And do you for a moment think that Sir Philip Sydney, the knight sans peur, sans reproche, would, as he has in his Arcadia, have made Amphilus send to Philoclea strawberries, if they were otherwise than they are? He says: 'Thus the first strawberries he could find were ever, in a clean-washed dish, sent to Philoclea.'"

"And it was most proper," my wife said, "that the dish should be washed clean."

"It was so," I answered; "but let me remark that strawberries themselves should never be washed. Water carries off their best juices, and robs them of their finest flavor. If you have no confidence in the cleanliness of the hands of the picker, you had better leave the strawberries untasted. Picking strawberries is not an arduous task, especially if you are young, and have one you love beside you. Three together are often one too many; and Spenser, in 'The Fairy Queen,' seems to have been aware of this when he wrote:

'One day, as they all three together went To the greene wood to gather strawberries
There chaunst to them a dangerous accident.'

Of course no accident would have chanced to them if there had been but two in company."

"I don't see that," said my wife, inquiringly.

"Of course you don't," I replied; "I didn't think you would. Other poets, though, than Spenser have written about picking berries. Our friend Stedman, in his 'Battle of Monmouth,' has sung charmingly about it. Harkken:

'The strawberry vines lie in the sun,
Their myriad tendrils twined as one;
Spread like a carpet of richest dyes,
The strawberry field in sunshine lies.
Each timorous berry blushing red
Has folded the leaves above her head,
The dark, green curtains genned with dew;
But each blushing berry, peering through,
Shows like a flock of the underthread—
The crimson woof of a downy cloth
Where the elves may kneel and plight their troth,
Run through the rustling vines, to show
Each picker an even space to go,
Leaders of twinkling cord dividing
The field in lanes from side to side:
And here and there, with patient care,
Lifting the leafage every where,
Rural maidens and mothers dot
The velvet of the strawberry-plot:
Fair and freckled, old and young,
With baskets at their girdles hung,
Searching the plants with no rude haste—
Lest berries should hang unpicked, and waste,
Of the pulpy, odorous, hidden quest,
First gift of the fruity months, and best.'

From the workers a maiden parts:
The baskets at her waistband shine
With berries that look like bleeding hearts
Of a hundred lovers at her shrine:
No Eastern girl was girdled so well
With silken belt and silvery bell.'

But on, with a sister's smile, she moves
Into the darkness of the groves,
And deftly, daintily, one by one,
Shelters her baskets from the sun
Under the net-work, fresh and cool,
Of lily-leaves from the crystal pool.'

I wish, my dear, that for your sake I could remember it all; but you will gather, even from these detached passages, something approaching to the charming picture of the strawberry-pickers which the poet has drawn, and in the song they sing while at labor, he says:

'Here, where the whitest blossoms blow,
The reddest and ripest berries grow.'

"It is, indeed," said my wife, "a charming picture, and almost makes me wish that I were a 'fair' and 'young' berry-picker."

"It is better as it is, my dear," I answered, "although, like Halleck's Fanny, 'you were younger once than you are now,' but never fairer in my eyes than you are at present."

"Flatterer!" my wife exclaimed.

"Indeed, my dear, not so. I am sure I could, as Fletcher, in the 'Faithful Shepherdess,' when he makes his hero, in speaking of strawberries, pay a compliment to his love, address you thus:

'See how well the lusty time
Hath decked their rising cheeks in red,
Such as on your lips is spread:
These are berries for a queen.'

And now, my dear, tell me something about strawberries; how to preserve them; how to make strawberry short-cake."

My wife being very willing to inform me, spoke as follows: "To preserve strawberries, to one pound of fruit put a pound of white sugar; boil them five minutes, skim them and put them into your jars, and seal."

"Simple and sweet," I said. "Now for your short-cake."

"First make your short-cake," she said, "cutting it as large as a dining-plate; then bake it; open it while hot, and butter each half well; spread strawberries upon the lower half, sprinkling them thickly with sugar; lay the upper half on, and butter the upper side; cover it with strawberries, finishing it nicely with white sugar, and eat it while warm."

"Capital!" I said. "I think I'll have one when we go home."

"There are no strawberries," said my wife, plaintively.

"I am sorry for it," I answered; "but we will plant some—it is just coming on September—and then next season we shall have plenty. Let me recall to mind what old Tusser says in his September's 'Husbandry':

'Wife, into thy garden and set me a plot
Of strawberry roots, of the best to be got:
Such growing abroad, among thorns in the wood,
Well chosen and picked, prove excellent good.'

And again:

'The barberry, respis, and gooseberry too,
Look now to be planted as other things do:
The gooseberry, respis, and roses, all three,
With strawberries under them, truly agree.'

Further on he gives this advice in his verses for December:

'If frost do continue, take this for a law,
The strawberries look to be covered with straw,
Laid over, trim, upon crotchets and bows,
And after uncovered, as weather allows.'

And now, wife, let us turn our steps homeward, for the twilight is fading, and it will be dark before we reach the house."

"Do you know," asked my wife, "that with all your talk about strawberries, you have said nothing concerning the white strawberry?"

"I had forgotten it," I answered; "and though it is fair to look at, it lacks the flavor and juiciness of the red. I regard it as an anomaly among strawberries, and think it bears very much the relation to its red kindred that white crows, white mice, and albinos do to their kind."

"In my eyes," said my wife, "it is the bride of the strawberries; fair and delicate as a young maiden among matrons, a lily among roses, a morning in May as compared to a noontide in August. Any one can realize the lusciousness of a red strawberry; but only the most sensitive and cultivated taste can understand and appreciate the superior flavor of the white berry."

"You may be correct in what you say," I replied, "but I doubt if I shall live long enough to enable me to cultivate my taste up to the standard requisite for such appreciation. And when I die, my love, and am buried, I hope there will grow upon my grave only red strawberries; so that children, as they gather them, will say: 'He must have been a good man, or else so nice a fruit as the strawberry would not have grown so freely above him.' And I would like, too, to have a raspberry bush planted at my grave's head, and a blackberry at its foot."

My wife answered only by a little sigh, as she pressed closer to my side, and we walked on in silence.

I broke it at last by saying, in the words of simple-hearted old Izaak Walton: "Doubtless God could have made a better berry [than the strawberry], but doubtless God never did."

THOUGHTFULNESS IN DRESS.

WOMEN no doubt care enough, talk enough, dream enough, and spend enough (both of time and money) about dress, but they do not generally put enough thought into it; and the result appears in the wretchedly meaningless and inharmonious toilettes which fill our houses and streets. The defect is common to all classes, from the maid-of-all-work, whose imitation of her betters is as unreasoning as that of a monkey, to the lady of fashion who spends hundreds a year in producing a result which suggests nothing but a fashionable jeweler's.

A perfect dress would be one in which every part was harmoniously combined so as to produce a whole perfectly adapted to the wearer's personal appearance, character, and circumstances, due regard being at the same time had to time, place, fashion, convenience, and economy.

The harmonious and tasteful combination of parts is one of the great difficulties of dress in all cases where expense is not a matter of indifference. A woman's outdoor attire, for instance, must be considered as consisting of at least three parts—bonnet or hat, mantle (using the word as a generic term for all outdoor garments), and gown. If these were bought in equal numbers, so as to be bound together in life-long alliances, things would be comparatively easy; but it is not so. Their average longevity is different. That of bonnets is by far the shortest, while the extraordinary variations in the duration of shawls introduce a disturbing element into our calculations in respect of outdoor garments; and in the case of gowns, the question of their probable duration is complicated by the necessity of providing for all sorts of contingencies; so that no one can count upon reserving any one of these articles as the inseparable companion of any other, and the difficulty, therefore, of securing that each of the three outdoor costume shall bear witness of intentional adaptation to the other two is considerable. Some precautions may be suggested for the prevention of the most glaring inconsistencies. For instance, with respect to color, there are two ways of lessening the danger: either the wearer may choose some one color, with which every separate article of dress she buys shall harmonize, or she may decide in which of the three parts of her costume variation of color shall be allowed, restricting herself in the other two parts sternly to neutral tints. Colors which harmonize with the same color do not necessarily harmonize with each other. Besides this, regard must be had to the quantity and situation of each color. Two colors which, if combined in very unequal proportions, are perfectly harmonious, may even as mere color be intolerable in equal quantities. Again, the rule that two of these principal divisions of the outdoor costume shall be of neutral tint would, if severely followed, produce an unduly sombre effect, and would afford no further security against the very dangers just described. These rules, as I have said, only aim at preventing some of the worst catastrophes in mere color, and leave many other very important questions—that of light and shade among others—quite untouched. Another point in which harmony is to be observed is that of texture. A very common error is to put on a mantle of more delicate or richer texture than is suitable to the gown, as, for instance, lace over woolen stuff; the opposite error is less offensive, because it may always be supposed that the mantle is thrown on by way of bona fide protection to the gown, and is related to it in some degree as the husk is to the kernel. Discrepancies between the bonnet and mantle are obviously more inexcusable than discrepancies between these and the gown, because the two former are understood to be assumed or laid aside together, whereas the gown may have to be worn for a greater number of hours, and under different circumstances.

THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD.

A Story.

By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "Aunt Margaret's Troubles," etc.

CHAPTER IX.

"NO SPONGE WIPES OUT SPOKEN WORDS."

THAT excellent housewife, Frau Hanne Lehmann, sat by the warm broad hearth in her kitchen on the evening following that on which the Justizrath von Schleppers had slept at the Pied Lamb in Horn. The hour was about six o'clock. It was nearly dark, and the fitful fire-light played on the heavy rafters and the polished metal dishes. Black cavernous shadows rested in distant angles of the room, and every now and then a pale quick flame leaped up, shedding a yellow glare over the darkness, and then sank again, and left only the hot core of the wood-fire glowing red and steady. Tick, tick, went the old clock over the dresser. Tick, tick, tick, tick. Drop by drop the waters of life, grain by grain the sands of time, one by one the hopes and fears, the joys and griefs, the loves and angers of humanity, flowing, flowing, falling, falling, ebbing—whither?

That twilight hour is a melancholy time. Sweet in its sadness to the young and hopeful; cruel in its voiceless memories to those whose life is on the wane. Melancholy, dreamy, pathetic to all. Even to Hanne Lehmann, in spite of the hard, dauntless front she shows to the world; even to Hanne Lehmann—sitting with the eternal knitting-needles, glancing rose-tinted by the fire, and her head bent down upon her breast—the twilight brings a softening influence. Tick, tick, goes the old clock over the dresser, tick, tick, tick, tick. But that is not the sound she hears. Redder and redder glow the embers through the gathering dark, but that is not the sight she sees. In her ears little baby-feet patter over the floor, and a sweet small voice lisps garulously, or an infant's plaintive wail breaks the silence. A tiny white face—the face of a week-old babe—shines out of the shadowy corner, still and solemn, with shut violet-tinged eyelids; or older now, a prattling little one, with flushed round cheeks, smiling, as that lost babe had never smiled, upon its parents.

"Poor little baby! poor little pretty baby! And it had blue, blue eyes like its father's!" One, two, three bright tears drop and glitter on the knitting; presently the work falls from the busy sunburnt hands, and Hanne's head droops yet lower on her breast. There goes out a low sound of sobs through the dim room, the cry of a bereaved mother mourning for her little one—Rachel, who will not be comforted. Ah, mother, mother, does no thought that such twilight hours as this might have awaited that small human creature in after-years—does no remembrance of pain and sorrow and toil and carking care and self-reproach and bitterness come to tell you that it is better so; that the tiny head is at rest, and the tiny heart at peace beneath the daisies? No, no, no; only this cry out of the depths of the ignorant woman's nature—at one here with the most cultured lady in the land—only this cry, "My little baby, my poor pretty little baby! And it had blue, blue eyes like its father's!" Tick, tick, still says the old clock over the dresser. Tick, tick, tick, tick! Counting these moments, too, with steady pulseless finger, dropping them, too, one by one, into the dread gulf of the irrevocable Nevermore!

"Wife," said a voice at Hanne's ear. "All alone, old woman?"

She bent her head almost to her knees searching for a knitting-needle on her lap. "Yes, Franz, all alone. Martha and Lotte are getting their supper with the farm-people in the great room on the other side of the barn."

There was an unusual softness in Hanne's voice. Her husband did not see the tears on her cheek, for she kept her face in shadow, and the kitchen was very dark; but he knew that she had been crying. He knew, too, that her thoughts had gone back to the early days of her wifehood, and that she had been mourning for the baby whose coming she had looked for with such passionate joy, and whose death had struck so heavy a blow to her heart.

He sat down beside her, putting his broad rough palm on the back of her hand, and gently stroking it. Franz Lehmann was an ignorant, rustic, uncultured man, but no eloquence could have spoken more plainly to his wife's apprehension than that silent action.

"I wasn't idle, Franz," said Frau Lehmann, after a pause. "I was finishing your stocking. But I never want any light to knit by, and what's the good of wasting oil or candles? Sometimes I think that if I was to go blind I shouldn't be quite a burden. I could knit—I know I could."

"Tut, tut, old woman, don't talk about being a burden, and going blind! And as to being idle—well, if no housewife in Germany was more idle than my Hanne, there'd be full barns and empty poor-houses all over the land." Still the rough, broad palm was stroking the wife's hand caressingly.

"I wanted to say a word to you, wife," resumed Franz presently, "about that old lawyer that was here yesterday. But somehow we don't get much time to talk together, do we?"

Had Franz Lehmann spoken out fully the thought that was in him, he would have said that it was not so much opportunity for confidential talk that was rare, but rather such a disposition on the part of his hearer as might give any hope of a peaceable and amicable discussion; and that he seized on the present moment, encouraged by finding his old woman in a softer mood than was usual with her.

"What about the old lawyer, Franz?"

"Well, you know, we've got a new land-steward for the Prince's property here—one Major von Groll, I think they call him. The post has been vacant ever since old Bopp died."

Hanne nodded.

"This Herr Justizrath von Schleppers," resumed Lehmann, mousing out the full style and title with a true German enjoyment of long-winded appellations, "this same Herr Justizrath was lawyer in Bopp's time, and is lawyer still, for all the Prince's legal business in Detmold. Now it seemed to me yesterday that he was getting a step beyond just minding his own part of the business, and was poking his nose into things that don't concern him."

"I suppose he came here in the land-steward's place? The land-steward is quite a noble gentleman, and has been in the Austrian army, I've heard say, and of course he won't be of any real use to the Prince. How should he? It will fall on the Justizrath to do the work. And all right enough. The Von Schleppers are well-born, too; I don't say but what they are; but then you see the Justizrath is a lawyer, and that makes all the difference."

"You don't understand, wife," began Franz, incautiously.

"Don't understand? Why, what will you say next, Franz Lehmann? If I don't understand, things are in a bad way with us, for it's little other understanding than my own that's to be found under this roof."

"I know you've a head upon your shoulders, though, and praised the look of the place, and all that. But, somehow—I can't tell why, exactly—I didn't much take to him. I didn't altogether like the way he spoke of Lieschen."

"I hope they're not dissatisfied with her. I hope he had no fault to find?"

"Fault! Why no; it would be hard to find fault with my little Liese, I'm thinking."

Hanne sharply withdrew her hand from her husband's, and the softness that her solitary musings had left behind them disappeared from her voice and her face and her manner. "Stuff and nonsense!" said she, angrily. "Hard to find fault with Liese? Hard enough not to find fault sometimes—as you'd know, if you had the house to manage instead of mooning about the farm all day! But so it is with you men. If you are pinched in a soft place yourselves, though, you roar out to be heard on the top of the Grotenberg. What a long face would you pull if I was to declare it was hard to find a fault in Claus, your wagoner! And yet I don't know that he gives me much bother."

"Why, old woman! you don't liken our Lieschen to drunken old Claus, do ye?"

Franz tried to force a laugh by way of turning the matter into a joke, but his hilarity was received with supreme and chilling disdain. Presently he resumed, gravely: "When I said I didn't quite like the way Lawyer von Schleppers talked about Lieschen, I meant that he old woman—none better in the Principality—and I know too, well enough, that my own is apt to get a bit muddled at times, when I set off thinking" (it may be observed that Franz Lehmann here spoke in perfect sincerity); "but what I mean is, that you wasn't with us, you know, when we were going over the farm yesterday, and you didn't hear all the old fellow said, and the questions he kept asking, nor see the way his eyes were upon every thing, peering and prying and poking out his bald head."

THEN, FIXING HIS EYES ON HERS, HE REPEATED IN A LOW, STERN VOICE, "YOU, HANNE?"

Hanne began to bridle. The picture presented to her mind of a stranger—Justizrath and Von Schleppers though he might be—peering, prying, and asking questions on her homestead, was not agreeable to her.

"Dear Heaven!" she cried, "I suppose he didn't find much amiss! He might have gone into every hole and corner of the place for all I should have cared. I'm not afraid for folks to see how I manage. But, all the same, he'd no right to set his foot on a sod of the ground, barring the hill-side meadows that you rent of his highness. As to the house and the rest of the land, they're yours, and were your father's and grandfather's before you."

"Just so, old woman; just so," returned the farmer, putting the hand on which his palm still rested, and congratulating himself on the accord between his feelings on the subject and his wife's. "The old gentleman was smooth-spoken enough, seemed so prying and eager—all in a sly, quiet way, though—to learn all about the child's story, and about—her poor mother. I can't think who had been putting it into his head to ask the questions he did. No one here, except you and me and Peters, knows aught of that sad tale."

Hanne flushed a deep crimson to the roots of her hair, but the fire-light did not suffice to reveal the flush to her husband's eyes.

"Ah, Franz, that's so like you!" she made answer. "You fancy folks don't know things just because you never told 'em. But, Lord! don't you go to believe that there's so much kept secret in this world."

"Well, but who told the Justizrath that Liese's name wasn't Lehmann?"

"Who told him?" retorted Hanne, with an unnecessary assumption of being injured. "Why, who should tell him but me?"

"You, Hanne?" Franz rose up from his seat, and, taking up a dry pine-log from the corner of the hearth, threw it on to the smouldering fire, where it presently blazed up into a bright flame, by the light of which he could distinctly see his wife's countenance. Then, fixing his eyes on hers, he repeated in a low, stern voice, "You, Hanne?"

Either the sullen glare, or something menacing in her husband's tone, made Frau Lehmann nervous; for she began to speak in a fluttered manner, very unlike her usual one.

"Yes, me, to be sure. Who else? And what matter? We were chatting—and—you were away with the plow, and I had sent for you, and the lawyer was mighty civil-spoken—and—I suppose you don't think I ought to sit with a guest in my own house quite mum-chance, do you, Franz?"

"No," said Franz, slowly, still keeping his eyes on hers.

"Very well, then. And I suppose it was natural to get talking about Liese, since she lives in the lawyer's house, wasn't it?"

"Yes," said Franz, in the same manner.

"Very well again, then. The old gentleman spoke with a great deal of interest about the child. I'm sure I thought you'd have been pleased."

"Did you?"

"Yes, of course. Pleased to know that the child was with folks who—who—cared about her."

"And was it to make them care about her the more that you told—"

"I told nothing, Franz, but that her name was not Lehmann. Nothing else. We were speaking of how old Liese was, and how long it was since you had fetched her here from Hanover, and such like. And—and—it slipped out."

"Slipped out! You're not one to let things slip out against your will, unless so be you're in a temper. But that was it—you were in a temper. You had got one of your cursed spiteful fits on you, when you hate the innocent lass and think of naught but how to run her down and belittle her. The lawyer, mayhap, said a word in her praise, and that was enough to set you off against her."

"Franz, Franz! I declare, solemnly—"

But Hanne's attempt to arrest the torrent of her husband's wrath was an utterly vain one. Like many men who are constitutionally slow to anger, when once aroused his rage overbore all bounds until it had thoroughly spent itself. His deep voice rolled out thunderous German oaths that seemed to shake the low-raftered ceiling, and his dull blue eyes were lighted up with that peculiarly sinister and savage sparkle which a blue eye is capable of giving forth.

"I wonder you are not ashamed—you who say you have a mother's heart in your breast, and are so soft and pitiful over a little dead babe that needs nothing from any of us any more. I wonder, for very shame, that you can be so hard and sharp and spiteful to the poor, gentle, motherless thing!"

"Franz, Franz!"

"You are hard and sharp and spiteful and jealous—deadly jealous of her in your heart. I never give the child a kiss but you look as though it was poison to you. I never stroke her hair, nor say a soft word to her, but you find some fault or pick some hole in her coat, poor maiden! And then you must needs blab what you think will hurt her with other folks. Not that it can hurt her with any honest man or woman, either—the poor, innocent, helpless lamb. As for him—as for you prying, meddling old lawyer—if he comes here prowling and sniffing like Reinecke Fuchs, he shall have a dose on't. I'll make his crafty old carcass acquainted with my cudgel."

"Franz, Franz! In Gotte's namen, don't talk like a madman!"

"I'm none so mad but I've sense to take care of my own, and none so meek but I'll do it against any lawyers or land-stewards in Detmold. Potztausend! What is it to him who Liese came of, or where she came from? I've a half mind to take her away from his house. And to-morrow morning, as sure as the sun rises, I'll go to Detmold and see the lass for myself; and if so be she is not happy, nor comfortable, nor well treated, home she comes without more ado. And let me see the man, woman, or child that will ill-treat her under my roof!"

With that Franz stormed out of the kitchen, and his heavy step was heard stamping across the barn and splashing through the wet mire outside in the farm-yard.

Hanne sat by the fire and cried—cried hot scalding tears of vexation, not such soft weeping as she had indulged in before. Franz was very, very seldom roused to such a manifestation of anger, and the indefeasible masterhood of his sex. Not more than half a dozen times, perhaps, in the whole course of her wedded life, had Hanne Lehmann seen her husband thus moved. And now it was not so much the fact of his being in a passion that hurt her as the cause of it. She had neither delicate nerves nor fine-spun sensibilities, but she had a very deep, though narrow and jealous, affection for Franz. "I wonder what Liese could have said of me that would have put him out so?" thought she, bitterly. And thus she went on tormenting herself and nursing her wrath against Liese. But she had no fears that her unlucky confidence to the Justizrath would lead to any further serious consequences. And she was right. Franz's habitual mild inertness resumed its sway as strongly as ever after his storm of rage had subsided. That next morning, which has such a marvelous power to modify the resolves and calm the emotions of most of us, witnessed no journey to Detmold on the part of the farmer. "I will go and have a peep at the dear little maid before long," said he to himself. "But to-day is corn-market at Lemgo. Liese must wait. Aufgeschoben, ist nicht aufgehoben. What's put off, isn't finished. So."

Then things fell into their old track at the farm. The housewife bustled and toiled, and scolded her maids as usual, and Franz smoked and mused, and lounged about his fields. But Hanne felt in her heart a secret accession of jealous bitterness toward the orphan girl. For she mentally credited Liese with all the suffering and mortification consequent upon her husband's outburst of anger. It never occurred to her to blame her own tongue and temper for the mischief.

Which clearly proves Frau Hanne Lehmann to have been a very singular woman indeed.

THE HAPPY CONFESSION.

"WRITTEN in sand!" it sounds mournful to many—
The dirge of bright hopes that might never expand!
But I count that one day far the dearest of any
That showed me my name had been written in sand—
Written in sand!
But then understand
'Twas the girl that I loved wrote my name in the sand.

Ah! I had wooed her and worshiped her daily—
Yet ever lacked courage to ask for her hand.
Had my love won her heart? She smiled ever so gayly,
I fear the impression was written in sand.
Written in sand!
How vainly I scanned
Her face for an answer, not written in sand.

Time passed away, my brief holiday speeding
Too soon to an end; when at duty's demand
I must go with a heart that was wounded and bleeding,
And leave but a memory written in sand—
Written in sand!
But a meeting I planned
To learn if my love was but written in sand.

I sought her at eve where she sat by the ocean,
When slowly the tide ebb'd away from the land,
She sat like a statue—so still, without motion—
Yet, no! She was writing a name in the sand!
Written in sand!
I stole to her—and—
Oh, joy!—'twas my name that was written in sand.

She turned in surprise—as I leaned o'er her shoulder,
Her cheek my warm breath so audaciously fanned.
Oh, she blushed like a rose when she saw the beholder
Was he whose loved name she had written in sand.
Written in sand!
As her sweet waist I spanned
I whispered, "My fate you have written in sand!"

PAULINE, PRINCESS OF METTERNICH.

AT no great distance from the village of Neuburg, and about sixteen leagues from the imperial city of Vienna, there rises on a knoll overhanging the wooded banks of the majestic Danube the ancient castle of the Counts of Sandor, in a region famous for its wild and romantic scenery.

At this castle, which in times of yore was strongly fortified, and of very considerable extent, and which, having partially been allowed to sink in ruins, combines in its appearance the charms of a picturesque medieval ruin with the imposing grandeur of a modern palace, there was born, on the 26th of February, 1836, the Countess Pauline Sandor, who was afterward, as the wife of Richard, Prince of Metternich, to play so distinguished a part at the imperial court of France.

Already in her earliest childhood little Pauline displayed many of those characteristics which were to distinguish her in after-life. She was tenderly attached to her parents, Count Maurice and Countess Estelle of Sandor, whose only child she was; but her independent and self-asserting spirit often brought her in conflict with their wishes. She was wonderfully bright, and learned with amazing rapidity whatever pleased her fancy, but she proved the dullest of pupils whenever the subject of a lesson seemed uninteresting to her. Generous and kind-hearted to a fault, but petted as she was by her parents, she was exceedingly impulsive, would rarely brook restraint and contradiction, and was no less quick to resent insults than to beg pardon of those whom she had offended.

Among the children of the noble families residing at the neighboring country seats there happened to be very few girls; hence her intercourse with other children was principally confined to boys, in whose outdoor sports she gladly took part, with whom she romped about the fields, angled in the river, hunted butterflies in the park, and rode on the pony, which her father had presented to her on her seventh birthday, all over the environs of Sandor Castle. The boys treated the bright-eyed girl with that deference which she was not slow to exact, and the villagers and their children, who looked up to her as if she were a much superior being, yielded to her an obedience the more willing and submissive as she always treated them with the utmost kindness. — Whenever her parents gave her money she was certain to present it to the first person who seemed to be in distress. On Christmas-eve she would insist on having a number of the children from the village with her, that they might enjoy with her the magnificent Christmas-tree which her parents always presented to her on that festive occasion. Once — she was scarcely seven years old — she ran away from home, and performed a walk of five leagues on a sultry day in midsummer, in order to visit her former nurse, who was lying very sick at the house of her mother, and brought her some jars filled with preserves, and all the money her little purse contained. Upon reaching the distant village she was so tired that the village priest had to send her back in a carriage to her parents, to whom her unaccountable disappearance had caused the most intense anxiety.

When she was ten years old a Parisian governess and a music-teacher were engaged for her. Pauline threw the former into an ecstasy of delight by the rapidity with which she learned to speak French, and drove her to despair by the contempt with which she treated her lessons in grammar, history, and geography. Good Mademoiselle L — also praised her young pupil for the readiness with which she adopted her advice concerning certain questions of tournure, dress, and manners; but one day, on entering the servants' room, she was shocked beyond measure to find there little Pauline with the bonnet of her governess on her head, and her shawl wrapped around her shoulders, mimicking Mademoiselle L — to perfection, and convulsing the assembled servants by her indescribably droll performance. As regards the music-teacher, she met with no better success. Pauline would sit for hours and hear the teacher play; she could sing every melody she heard; but the piano exercises of Czerny and Hüntén filled her with no less aversion than the grammars of Debonale and Meidinger.

Her mother, when told of a new freak which her daughter had committed, would often say to her husband, half in despair, "What is to become of Pauline?" Count Maurice, smiling, replied, "I believe I shall have to get her a cornet in a regiment of hussars; and then, my dear, you know that the old gipsy predicted Pauline would one day rule over an empire!"

However, he did neither the one nor trusted in the other, but sent her in her thirteenth year to the Neubrunner Stift, where Pauline perfected her somewhat neglected education. Two years afterward she accompanied her parents on a journey through Italy and Western Europe; and on their return to Austria she was presented at court. She was then a young lady of sixteen, neither beautiful nor even pretty; her features bore too strongly the somewhat coarse Austrian type; her mouth was a little too large, and her nose à la Roxelane did not add to the attractiveness of her face. Nevertheless she created a decided sensation in the aristocratic world of the imperial city, and she was soon surrounded by a much larger circle of admirers than the most beautiful ladies could boast of; she was so vivacious, so bright, her smile was so sunny, her impulsive temper was curbed by so much amiability and tact, she was so witty and arch, so clever and fascinating, that most of the young princes, dukes, counts, and barons at the court of Vienna, despite her rather plain face, were soon at her feet.

The Archduchess Sophia, the Emperor's mother, who had long been an intimate friend of Pauline's mother, selected the young Countess Sandor, as soon as the union between Francis Joseph and the gentle and beautiful Elizabeth of Bavaria had been decided upon, as one of the ladies of honor to the young Empress. The Archduchess, however, was not long in regretting the choice she had made, not on account of any misconduct on the part of Pauline Sandor, who performed the duties of her new position to the great satisfaction of the young Empress, but because of the impression which the Countess made on the susceptible heart of the young Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian, who met her every day in the apartments of his sister-in-law, and was soon head over ears in love with Pauline Sandor. There was now a prospect of the gipsy's prophecy being realized; for the young Archduke, despite the remonstrances of his mother, who wished to marry him to a sovereign princess, made formal proposals to Pauline, who, to the astonishment of nearly every body, and to the great relief of the Archduchess Sophia, informed him that she could never become his wife, her heart belonging already to another man. The reply drove the young Archduke, who was afterward to play so prominent a part in one of the gloomiest episodes of contemporary history, well-nigh to despair; and, to drown his sorrow and disappointment, he set out on that long voyage which he himself has so well described in his writings, and which kindled in his mind that predilection for life in the tropics which contributed not a little toward leading him afterward to the distant shores of Mexico.

The man to whom Pauline Sandor had given her heart was Richard, Prince of Metternich-Winneburg, son of the celebrated old Chancellor of State and the beautiful Baroness von Leykam. Born on the 27th of January, 1829, he had entered the diplomatic service of his country already in his twentieth year, and displayed so much tact and ability that he was promoted with great rapidity, and sent already in his twenty-seventh year as minister-plenipotentiary of Austria to the court of Dresden. Already in 1850 he had made the acquaintance of the young Countess Sandor, and, although she was still a child, she made so favorable an impression on him that, as he afterward confessed to her, he then already resolved to make her his wife. Pauline, on her part, was likewise most favorably impressed with the handsome, dashing, and courteous young diplomatist. During the following years they met repeatedly, and after Pauline's return from the extended journey which she had made with her parents, the Prince proposed to her, and she gladly laid her hand in his. The wedding took place on the 30th of June, 1856, and the young couple immediately afterward set out for Dresden.

Pauline loved her young husband with all the tenderness of her fervent heart, and Prince Richard, who found in her not only a devoted wife, but an invaluable assistant in the career in which he was soon to achieve so much distinction, has always treated her with the chivalrous fondness of an ardent young lover. The birth of a daughter, which took place on the 17th of May, 1857, added to the happiness of the young couple.

No sooner had the young Countess Sandor become the wife of Prince Metternich than she began to take the liveliest interest in diplomacy and public affairs, to which she had hitherto devoted little or no attention. Early in 1866, when Count Bismarck was maturing his great plans against Austria, he dictated some of his most important dispatches to his wife, who, whenever he was sick officiated as his secretary; but few persons are aware that the Princess of Metternich, whom her enemies have often pronounced a vain and shallow butterfly of fashion, not only has been her husband's secretary ever since the year 1857, but has for a number of years past been consulted by him at every important diplomatic step which he took; and it is a well-known fact that on several critical occasions he adopted her views in preference to his own, and even, when suddenly compelled to leave his post, as, for instance, in June, 1866, he intrusted the management of the affairs of the legation to the hands of his young wife. It is true, her impulsive and imperious temper often carried her too far; but her remarkable presence of mind, her ardent desire to promote the interests of her fatherland and to add to the lustre of her husband's name, her ambition, her energy, her tact and adroitness generally enabled her to retrace her steps without damaging the cause which she advocated.

Meanwhile the star of Prince Metternich was constantly in the ascendant. A memoir which he presented to his imperial master in January, 1859, when the relations between France and Austria had already assumed a critical aspect, and in which he advised a conciliatory course toward France, made so deep an impression upon the mind of Francis Joseph that, although he did not adopt the views advocated by Prince Metternich, he took him as his diplomatic adviser to the seat of war. The Princess accompanied her husband to Verona, and remained there till the peace of Villafranca, shortly after which Prince Metternich was intrusted with a diplomatic mission to the court of the Tulleries. After the conclusion of the treaty of Zurich he was appointed Minister Plenipotentiary and Ambassador Extraordinary to the same court—a position which he has held ever since, and filled with consummate tact and ability.

The Princess hailed this change in the fortunes of her husband with unbounded enthusiasm. Now both he and she were to have a field of labor worthy of their talents, and holding out to them brilliant prospects of fame, distinction, and success. A view of her whole career in Paris, from her arrival there in December, 1859, down to the present day, can not but lead to the conviction that the course she pursued was the execution of a plan, carefully matured and rigidly adhered to, ever since she reached the French capital. To establish the most friendly relations between Austria and France; to render the Austrian legation, which her husband was to make politically the most influential, as well as socially the most brilliant one; to ingratiate herself with the Emperor and Empress, and render them such important services in enhancing the splendor and attractiveness of their court that they could absolutely no longer do without her and her husband, which would render the latter's position at the French court perfectly proof against the intrigues of his enemies in Vienna; and to popularize the cause of Austria in France: such were the ends which she, in conjunction with her husband, strove to accomplish.

If we keep this in view, and bear in mind the peculiarities of her nature, we are able to harmonize the various aspects in which this distinguished lady, whom Sainte-Beuve called a "female Proteus," appears before us, and which, when viewed separately, would seem to justify the charges which her enemies have so often and persistently preferred against her. Whatever may be thought of some of the means by which she sought to attain her objects, it is undeniable that her efforts, in the main, were perfectly successful. Not only have the harmonious relations prevailing between France and Austria not been disturbed, and even outlived such terrible trials as the war of 1866, and the disastrous failure of the Mexican expedition, but the Prince and Princess of Metternich are personæ gratissimæ at the Imperial Court, and all attempts to displace the Prince have been thwarted by the emphatic and often-repeated declaration of the Emperor Napoleon, that he preferred Prince Metternich to any other Austrian ambassador. Not only is the Princess, as Prince Napoleon, who never liked her, once sneeringly remarked, "the second lady in the empire," and, next to the Empress, the leader of the fashionable world of France, but also, no matter what her enemies may say, exceedingly popular in nearly all classes of Parisian society.

Her influence over the Emperor is so great that, whenever the ladies at court desire to obtain his consent to any measure to which they know him to be averse, the Princess is requested to persuade him to it; and, having always carefully abstained from troubling the Emperor about political affairs, she has seldom asked of him a favor but which he has almost granted already in advance. Perhaps his Majesty treats the vivacious little Princess with such marked favor and distinction because, in 1862, she saved his life. It was at Fontainebleau, where the favorite exercise of the Emperor was rowing in a little nut-shell of a boat on the beautiful lake in the vicinity of the palace. One day he and the Princess of Metternich were seated in one boat, and the Empress and the Prince in another. The Emperor, trying to turn his boat, suddenly lost his balance and fell into the lake. The Empress uttered a piercing shriek and fainted; but the Princess of Metternich, even before her husband was able to come to the Emperor's assistance, with admirable self-possession, stretched out an oar to him, and as soon as he had grasped it, drew him with a firm hand toward the boat, and helped him to re-enter it.

The Princess is a great admirer of Richard Wagner's music, and she considers Tannhäuser the greatest opera of the age. She was exceedingly anxious to have it performed at the Grand Opéra; but both the Manager and the Minister of State would not hear of it. So she appealed to the Emperor. She gave a soirée, at which their Majesties were present. In the course of the evening she said to Napoleon III.: "Sire, will you permit me to propose a rebus to you, and, if you are unable to solve it, will you grant me a favor?" The Emperor, smiling, replied in the affirmative. The Princess then caused a servant to place a roast pheasant in a silver dish (un mets) on the table. When the dish had been removed, she went to the piano, and played the beginning of the Tannhäuser overture three times (ter); and finally, she stealthily approached the Emperor on tip-toe, and boldly pulled his Majesty's ear a little (faire une niche—play a little practical joke). The Emperor reflected a while, but said then he was unable to solve the rebus, and wanted to hear the favor which the Princess wished to ask of him. "Sire," she said, "order the Minister of State to have Wagner's Tannhäuser performed at the Grand Opéra." "Granted," replied the Emperor, and the order was issued next day. At the request of the Princess, Richard Wagner came to Paris, and conducted the rehearsals of his opera. His kind patroness rendered him the most valuable and energetic assistance during all the trials through which he had to pass before his great work was performed; and when the Parisians finally hissed Tannhäuser, as, in 1825, they had hissed Weber's Freischütz, she burst into tears in her box at the Opéra, but immediately seized the hand of the composer, who, deeply mortified and dejected, was standing by her side, and told him to cheer up; the Parisians would do him justice at no distant day.

It has often been asked if the Empress Eugénie is not jealous of the great influence of the Princess over her imperial husband? This question must be answered in the negative. Eugénie is on as good terms with Madame de Metternich as the Emperor himself. She is, in the first place, well aware that the Princess is the best and most affectionate of wives and mothers. She has often been at the house of the Metternichs, and seen how happily they live together. To be jealous of a lady who loves her husband and children so dearly would be worse than absurd. And, then, the Empress can not well afford to quarrel with the little Austrian Princess, who renders her invaluable services in adding to the splendor and attractiveness of French Court life. It was the Princess who suggested, among a great many other things, those parlor theatricals which, for six or seven years past, have formed so charming a feature among the amusements of the Imperial Court, and in which she has always played a leading rôle.

It was on one of these occasions that she appeared as vivandière, and sung Theresa's famous song, "Le Sapeur," for which she was severely censured by a great many who did not know that she had done so only in order to win a bet which she had made with the Emperor. She had told Napoleon about the rôle which she was going to play, and he had laughingly said that, in that event, she ought to sing "Le Sapeur." "I am going to do so," replied the Princess, although she did not know the song. The Emperor jocularly offered to bet that she could not sing it, and the Princess immediately accepted the bet. The same evening her husband went with her to the Alhambra, whither Theresa at that time attracted large crowds night after night, and the musical ear and good memory of the Princess enabled her to remember the air and text of "Le Sapeur," after hearing it once or twice.

We have repeatedly alluded to the enemies of the Princess. Notwithstanding her popularity, she has a great many of them, and, considering the prominent rôle she has played so long at the Court of the Second Empire, it is surprising that her enemies should not be more numerous than they really are. They consist of the Legitimists and some of the Orleanists, who think the Prince and Princess degrade themselves by lending the lustre of their name to the parvenu Court of the Second Empire; of the Democrats, who hate her because she is the friend of Napoleon and Eugénie; of the friends of Italy, whose hostility, though, is fast dying away; of the advocates of a close alliance between France and Prussia; of some of the austere mortals who look upon her as a vain, giddy priestess of fashion, and even charge her with frivolity and heartlessness. A great many stories are told to substantiate these charges. The Princess, we are assured by her enemies, is dreadfully extravagant; her milliner's bill never is less than a hundred thousand francs a year. But what of it? She is enormously wealthy; and if she spends so much for this purpose, and dresses so well, it is not so much because she likes to display a fine, showy toilette, as because the exigencies of her position in the capital of Fashion render it also incumbent on her to be a leader of fashion. Her admirable taste in this respect never misleads her. No matter what changes fashion may bring with it, her costume always fits well on her, and at the balls in the Tuileries and the hôtels of the Ministers and foreign Ambassadors, her toilette is almost always pronounced the most becoming and tasteful.

As regards the stories destined to prove the charges of frivolity and heartlessness against her, they will mostly be found to rest on innocent manifestations of that gay and impulsive spirit which made her father say that "he would get her a cornetcy in a regiment of hussars." We have room for but one of these anecdotes. The last court ball in 1863 was at an end. It was past one o'clock, and the weather was so fine that the Princess of Metternich and several other ladies dismissed their carriages, and, escorted by some gentlemen, preferred walking home. When they were close to the Maison Doré the Princess said, "I am so hungry: suppose we go to the Maison Doré and eat some oysters?" The other ladies and the gentlemen readily consented, and the oysters were ordered and consumed. When the party prepared to leave, the Duke de Grammont-Caderousse said to the Princess, "It is two o'clock: what would you do if you had no one to escort you home?" "Bah!" she replied, "I should go alone. Une honnête femme can walk along the whole length of the Boulevards without needing to fear any insults." The other ladies differed with her, and the Princess then offered to walk two hundred yards in advance, in order to prove the truth of her assertion. She did so; but, unfortunately, already after she had walked a few steps, an impudent stranger commenced molesting her. The Duke de Grammont-Caderousse immediately hastened to her assistance, and rebuked the stranger, who drew a card from his pocket, presented it to the Duke, and asked for his name. The idea that a duel was to be fought in consequence of her whim immediately restored full self-possession to the Princess, who, in her mortification and confusion, had clung to the Duke's arm. Turning to the stranger, she said to him imperiously, "Take back your card, Sir, and apologize to Monsieur; you have deserved every word he has addressed to you!" The stranger, muttering an apology, bowed and slunk away.

One of the greatest blunders which the Princess ever committed, and which largely increased the number of her enemies, was the libel suit which she instituted against the Courrier Français. Always quick to resent insults, and as quick to forgive, she afterward generously paid the fine imposed upon the offending editor; but the prosecution was generally disapproved, and but few persons heard of her magnanimous conduct toward M. Vermorel, so that the Liberal press still treats her with extreme coldness.

She might have entirely overlooked the insulting article, inasmuch as she herself has likewise, on several occasions, written newspaper articles calculated to wound the feelings of her adversaries. It is well known that the Mémorial Diplomatique, nominally edited by the Chevalier Debrauz, was in reality edited by Prince Metternich and his accomplished wife. The latter contributed, especially shortly after the war of 1866, a number of spicy articles, in which she pretended to expose certain outrages committed by the King and Princes of Prussia in Bohemia, and which were written in a very spicy but exceedingly malicious style. The nominal editor was prosecuted for one of these articles, and sentenced to pay a small fine.

Her nature, as Sainte-Beuve truly said, is Protean. In order to form a correct idea of her character we must bear in mind that she is a clever diplomatist, and yet often as light-hearted and impulsive as a child; a friend of the Second Empire, and an ardent lover of her country; a leader of fashion, and an excellent wife and mother; often haughty and imperious, but still oftener extremely generous and kind-hearted; equally at home in the ball-room and in the nursery; no less skilled in getting up parlor theatricals and tableaux vivants than in directing a political intrigue; loved and respected by those who know her best, and decried most by those who know her least.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

NYAOK.—If you prefer silk for your walking suit get one of the frog greens, a dark garnet, or a blue and brown chameleon. Black silk is most serviceable, because it is always fashionable. The striped satin skirts worn beneath it this season make it very gay. In woolen goods get a changeable poplin or an all-wool serge. You will find full descriptions of the new dress goods in last week's Fashion Article. Make two skirts, the under one plainly gored, trimmed with a bias flounce; the upper skirt plain in front and caught up almost to the waist at the back and sides. Many upper skirts have no front width, being attached to the side seams of the under-skirt. If you like a sacque, make it short and almost tight fitting, with revers front and coat sleeves, but scarf capes are newer, crossed under the belt in front, and looped in the back by rosettes.

MARIA LOUISE.—Gore the skirt of your black alpaca suit similarly to those worn last winter, that is, with the front and two side widths gored flat, and the back width left full. Trim with a bias ruffle eight inches wide, or ten if you are tall. It is a matter of fancy whether the ruffle is gathered or pleated. If gathered one-third extra fullness is required. The polonaise is worn larger this season, reaching almost to the top of the ruffle on the skirt. It is almost tight, is fitted into the figure and worn with a belt, the skirt looped by four deep pleats on the hips, high up in the side seams. A newer polonaise has wide spreading puffs at the back but is too complicated for you to attempt to make without seeing it. A small cape like a bertha in front with pelerine ends, forming a sash behind, gives an air of style to the plainest polonaise. Trim this garment with two narrow bias ruffles on the skirt and sleeves. We can answer questions concerning fashions only through our columns; to send details and patterns to individuals by private letter would be an endless task. Correspondents need never expect an answer in the next paper, which is usually made up, if not printed, when their letter arrives. Your suggestion relative to this is altogether impracticable. We exercise our full discretion in our answers to correspondents, who must not expect replies to questions which are irrelevant, have already been answered, or would involve too much time and trouble. Thanks for your kind appreciation.

HISTORIOUS.—The ordinary story is that Louis Philippe, visiting Talleyrand on his death-bed, asked him: "Do you suffer?" Talleyrand replied: "The torments of the damned." The King rejoined: "Already!" Louis Blanc, the historian, accepts this story, and adds that the dying statesman hearing it, took immediate vengeance by giving to one of his attendants some secret directions, full of danger to Louis Philippe. It is stated, however, on good authority, that the King never uttered the cruel remark, which, moreover, has been traced to a much earlier source.

LOUNGE.—Work is undoubtedly favorable to health. "No instance," says Hufeland, "can be found of an idler having attained to a remarkably great age."

X. Y.—A quarter of an hour is quite long enough to remain in the cold water. A longer time is apt to fatigue or chill, and disposes to colds and cramps.

MRS. A. M. J.—In altering a full skirt the shape depends on the number of breadths you have. A sloped front width, three gored side widths, and a full width behind, is the popular style for trained dresses. Only two gored side widths are sometimes used, but they are as broad as the three widths when finished. Trim your wine-colored silk with satin or faille of the same shade, cut in bias strips five or six inches wide, caught in puffs at intervals by bands of velvet. Place this around the skirt, ten inches from the edge, and up each side of the front to the belt. A row of handsome fringe falls from beneath the satin around the skirt, but does not extend up the front. With the same trimming design a bertha on the waist, and deep cuffs on the sleeves. The bias velvet bands you mention will trim your poplin stylishly. Put pleated ruffles of double silk on each side of the band, sewn in with the velvet. The pleats all run the same way. The ruffle is an inch wide when completed. Make your merino house dress with short gored skirt, with one flounce, and a short jaunty jacket, rounding in front to disclose a white linen waist, tucked and embroidered. Striped cambric waists, with turned-over collars and wide cuffs, are worn for morning. Directions for making an alpaca suit will be found in answer to Maria Louise. Large bows of ribbon four or five inches wide are used instead of a breast-pin on the collar. The ribbon is either striped, changeable, or a solid color, to match the trimming of the bonnet. It is a regular bow, or four or five loops, or merely a knot with ends.

MISS TAYLOR.—Our reply to Maria Louise answers several of your questions. New cassimere wrappers are made with a shallow yoke, into which the body and skirt, all in one, are pleated. The long part of the wrapper is sloped like the sacque wrappers of last summer, and produces the effect of gores. The Empress cloth dress, if made with a train, may have a dressy addition of a short over-skirt in lengthwise puffs behind; or if you understand making panier puffs, add them as part of the long skirt.

L. M. J.—A high round bonnet of corded silk of the bear's-ear garnet will enliven your black suit. Black crinoline straw is seasonable, with glowing carnations, or cactus. Black lace, with a shirred coronet of scarlet or capucine satin, and cock's feathers of the hue of the satin, is very stylish. Shaded velvet leaves of the yellow-greens, bird's heads, four short ostrich tufts of varied shades, and large satin rosettes, adorn fall bonnets. The most exclusive ladies in New York attend the Jockey Club races, attired in short dresses, very jaunty and gay, or stylishly plain, as the fancy of the wearer may dictate.

JOSEPHINE.—We think you will find answers to your questions embodied in those of other correspondents, and we have no space for repetition. Get a changeable poplin, gray and blue. If you are fair trim it with blue satin and fringe. If you do not object to expense get a silk of the exquisite combination of colors called moonlight-gray, which is very delicate, but nothing could be handsomer for a bride. One skirt and a polonaise is most suitable for traveling, as the polonaise may be lined with flannel, but as you will want your wedding suit to be very dressy you can have two skirts, the under one plain. The other in paniers, and a scarf mantilla. Trim with an inch-wide bias band of velvet with fringe beneath it or pleated ruffle of satin. A Watteau bonnet of satin of the same shade with long flowing plumes and veil.

MRS. BRAINARD.—Make a steel-gray beaver-cloth sacque, long and loose, and bind with silk braid of the same shade. Pockets with wide flaps. A closer fitting garment with a large cape is shown in heavy brown and dark green cloth for winter over-coats.

NEW YORKER.—The stone slab in Trinity Church yard with this simple record: Charlotte Temple, covers the grave of the heroine of the romance "Charlotte Temple," a favorite book with our grandmothers. It was written by Susanna Rawson, and "is the story," say the authors of the Cyclopedia of American Literature, "of a young girl brought over to America by a British officer and deserted." The ground about the tomb, kept constantly bare of grass by frequent steps, shows that the pathetic story of Charlotte Temple has still its readers and her fate its sympathizers.

S. P. HOBART.—Skeleton bouquets are prepared by macerating the leaves in soft water till skeletonized, and then bleaching them in a solution of chloride of lime or of soda; the latter is preferable; after which they are washed and dried and arranged to suit the taste. Great care, skill, and patience are needed for this delicate process. The cleansing of the vascular or green matter from the vein-work requires from six weeks to two months, according to the kind of leaves used. From six to twelve hours is required for bleaching.

WITH Dyspeptics every thing is wrong. Food does not digest; sleep does not refresh; wine does not cheer; smiles do not gladden; music does not charm, nor can any other joy enter the breast of the miserable dyspeptic. You must get rid of it, or it will become seated and confirmed, and life will be a burden and existence a curse. PLANTATION BITTERS will do away with all this. New life, strength, and energy will take possession of you. The damask will again bloom upon your cheek, and the lustre in your eye will again be as bright as in your healthiest, happiest, and most joyous days.—World.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

FACETIÆ.

A SEA-CAPTAIN, trading to the African coast, was invited to meet a committee of a society for the evangelization of Africa. Among numerous questions touching the habits and religion of the African races, he was asked, "Do the subjects of King Dahomey keep Sunday?" "Keep Sunday!" he replied. "Yes, and every other darned thing they can lay their hands on."

A little five-year-old, who was hungry one night recently just at bedtime, but didn't wish to ask directly for something more to eat, put it in this way: "Mother, are little children who starve to death happy after they die?" A good big slice of bread-and-butter was the answer.

THE MOST APPROPRIATE WOOD FOR WOODEN SHOES—Sandal-wood.

A lady speaking of the gathering of lawyers to dedicate a new court-house said she supposed they had gone "to view the ground where they must shortly lie."

THE FLOWER OF THE FIELD—Wheat.

Squib thinks the dearest eyes he knows of just now are those of potatoes.

A LOVE-LETTER.—"Dear—I send u bi the buoy a bucket of flowers—They is like mi luv for u. The niteshaid menses kepe dark. The dog feuil menses I am ure slauv. "Rocks red and ponds full My love for u shall never phule."

A gentleman traveling on a steamer one day at dinner was making way with a large pudding close by, when he was told by a servant that it was dessert. "It matters not to me," said he, "I would eat it if it were a wilderness."

OCCASIONS WHEN I AM SUSPICIOUS.

When, in a public billiard-room, a gentleman wearing a white hat with black band, massive jewelry, and leaky boots, asks me to have a quiet game at pyramids.

When a young lady writes to say she is too unwell to keep an engagement, and I meet her the same day on the staircase at the Sletson House with my bosom friend, whom I introduced to her the day before yesterday.

When the intelligent rustic declares "he arn't seed a partridge that morn'n," and you distinctly detect two brace of those birds peeping from a pocket in the region of his spine.

When a widow told my rich uncle (a widower) that he was the very image of her dear first.

When a spinster asked my father (a widower) "if that dear interesting boy of his wore flannel next his skin."

When a lady, the instant she gets in front of me in the street, draws up her dress, disclosing a clean petticoat with a deep frill.

When a picture-dealer says business is awfully flat, and that he is the only man who is doing any.

When an individual, apparently of sound mind, reads any other paper than ours.

WHAT THE SIGNS ARE.—For the benefit of the superstitious we give the following translations of signs, all of which are true, and hold good at any time: If you break a looking-glass, it is a sign that you will have to get another one. If you help yourself to a piece of butter when you have already a piece on your plate, it is a certain sign you will have two pieces. Never start to go any where or to do any thing on Friday, because you can't get a great way before Sunday. If you drop a fork, and it sticks in the floor, it is a sign it is a good fork. If you spill salt, it is a sure sign that you have a salt-room. If you spill the dish-cloth on the floor, it is a sure sign you will have to pick it up again.

"William, thee knows I never call any body names; but, William, if the Mayor of the city were to come to me, and say, 'Joshua, I want thee to flud me the biggest liar in all Philadelphia,' I would come to thee and put my hand on thy shoulder, and say to thee, 'William, the Mayor wants to see you.'"

THE FOURTH OF A MAN—A quarter-master.

A rather fast youth was relating the experience of his voyage across the ocean to a sympathizing friend. Said he: "I tell you what, old fellow, there's one good thing about it, though. You can get as tight as you please every day, and every body thinks you're only sea-sick!"

If mankind are animals, can fashionable ladies be called "trained" animals?

The apple Eve longed for and ate at last must have been a pine-apple.

Never waste your time; waste somebody else's.

It is a curious fact in the grammar of politics that, when statesmen get into place, they often become oblivious of their antecedents, but are seldom forgetful of their relatives.

"How are you getting along at Newport?"—"Oh, swimmingly!"

CONUNDRUM PROPAGATED BY THE DOG-DAY HEAT.—Why is a paper collar like a railway ticket?—Because it's good for one day only.

Women are generally in quest of something. Conquest seems to suit them about as well as any thing.

A girl with a "ringing laugh" caused an alarm of fire the other day. They took her for a belle.

"Three-and-sixpence per gal!" exclaimed Mrs. Partington, looking over the price-current. "Why, bless me, what is the world coming to, when the gals are valued at only three-and-sixpence?"

THE "AID" THAT IS BY NO MEANS DISAGREEABLE NOWADAYS—Lemon-ade.

OF COURSE SHE WOULD.

YOUNG LADY. "It was rather bold of Captain Blazer to kiss my Hand, wasn't it Aunty?"
AUNTY. "Bold! I should think so. I should like to catch him kissing Mine!"

A CROSS-LOOKING ULTRA RITUALIST.

DIFFERENT VIEWS OF ONE AND THE SAME THING.

YOUNG MAMMA. "I trust you Slept well, Mr. Mountfidget, and were not Disturbed too Early. Did you hear the dear Children pattering overhead?"
OLD BACHELOR. "No, Madam, I did not hear any 'Pattering!' What I heard was POUNDING!"

"I am burning to be at the enemy again," as the man whose physician had advised him to give up smoking remarked, when he lit a fresh cigar.

A FAVORITE AMERICAN LETTER—An X.

THE VOICE OF NATURE—The blowing of flowers.

What is the most dangerous ship to embark in?—Authorship.

SEA-SIDE SENTIMENT—The Atlantic Ocean; long may it wave!

PIN-MONEY—What is expended in bowling-alleys.

THE GREATEST BET EVER MADE—The alpha-bet.

COLORED PREACHERS—Blue Presbyterians.

Who is the fastest woman mentioned in the Bible?—Herodias—when she got a head of John the Baptist on a charger.

What two sciences are employed by teamsters in driving oxen?—Haw-ticulture and gee-o-logy.

DRAWING-ROOMS—One of the regular apartments of a dentist.

While crossing a ferry a little three-year-old was heard to exclaim, as she saw a sail-boat, "Oh, mamma! there's a boat with a bonnet on!"

NATURAL COOKING—Boiling of the blood.

The clerk of a cockney church recently made the following announcement to the congregation: "You are desired to attend a meeting in the vestry at four o'clock, to consider on the best means of 'eating the church, and to digest other matters.'"

WEATHER WISDOM OF OUR ANCESTORS.

If Candlemas Day be bright and fair,
It will sooner or later rain here or there.
If Candlemas Day be dark and foul,
Expect fine weather, at times, ere Yule.

If the storm-cock sing on Lady Day,
Some showers will fall 'twixt then and May.
On Lady Day if the tom-cat mew,
Fine days will follow—many or few.

On Easter Eve, if skies do frown,
The sheep will graze on the southern down;
If fair upon Easter Eve it hold,
The sheep will graze on the northern wold.

At Whitsuntide when the hawthorn's white,
Ere Midsummer dew will fall at night.
At Whitsuntide when the hawthorn's green,
Ere Midsummer dew will at morn be seen.

At Lammas, an it ever hail,
At Martinmas beware a gale.

At Michaelmas if the wind be high,
Look for thunder and lightning in July.
At Michaelmas if the wind be low,
Look out for frost, if not for snow.

When the moon at Yule doth shine,
An' wet do come not 'twill be fine;
When the moon you can not see,
Then, thereafter, as may be.

A Mr. Hen has started a paper in Iowa. He says he hopes by hard scratching to make a living for himself and his little chickens.

A debating society had under consideration the question—"Is it wrong to cheat a lawyer?" The decision arrived at was, "No; but impossible."

An Irish dragoon, on hearing that his widowed mother had married since he quitted Ireland, exclaimed, "I hope she won't have a son older than me; for if she does I shall lose the estate."

Mrs. Poyser don't deny that women are foolish enough, for she thinks they were made to match the men.

Many people at the seashore are said to be waiving the question of a return to their homes. They are "tide" they say, for the present, to the fascinating delights of the "long shore" life, and therefore want to "see" a little more.

What two animals took the least baggage into the ark?—The rooster and the fox.

How do we know that Noah had beer in the ark?—We read that he had a bruin there.

How did he get the hops with which to make the beer?—The kangaroo made them.

Why was Noah never hungry?—Because he always carried his Ham with him.

Men are like bugles; the more brass they contain the more noise they make, and the farther you can hear them.

A thief of funny tastes lately entered a house in Springfield and carried off two sets of false teeth and a pair of gold-bowed spectacles.

It is a good thing to be above-board, but generally a bad thing to be overboard.

CHEAP LIVING—Living on excitement.

Ironing Mat.

THIS mat will be found very convenient in ironing to rub off the starch which collects on the iron from damp starched clothing. It is made of twine, and consists of single strips worked in point de reprise and joined by a kind of cross stitch. The outer edge is ornamented with a threefold row of picots crocheted of twine. For making the point de reprise strips take a wooden frame corresponding in size to the length desired for the mat, drive four small tacks a sixth of an inch apart on two opposite sides, and stretch around these tacks a double thread of twine, so that four rows of twine shall lie parallel, two threads of twine in each row. These rows are worked in point de reprise, as shown by the illustration on page 788. Having

THE NEED FOR TRAINING WOMEN.

TRAINED women—whatever may be the occupation which they follow—possess a value which their untrained sisters, however great their willingness to do well, can never equal. Moreover, a trained woman can always obtain remunerative occupation. Miss Nightingale says, "People cry out and deplore the unremunerative employment for women. The true want is the other way. Women, really trained, and capable for good work, can command any wages or salaries." This is about the employment of nursing; and it is true about all other occupations. Even the overcrowded ranks of teachers bear distinct witness to the fact that the trained governesses (of completed the requisite number of strips join them with single twine in the manner shown by the illustration. For the trimming of the outer edge crochet, next, a double picot row, each picot composed of six chain and one single crochet in the first of the six. The picots must alternate, one turning inward and the next outward. On this row crochet another row of picots, each separated by one chain, so that the upper picots of the former row form the middle row of the edge.

Another illustration on page 788 shows a different kind of mat designed for the same purpose. This is worked in single crochet, always putting the needle through both the upper veins of the stitches of the former row, and in raised double crochet. These double stitches are worked in the manner described for crochet fringe for tidies, Fig. 2, Harper's Bazar, No. 46.

whom there are so few) are in a demand which far exceeds the supply.

The apathy of parents, and of women themselves, in this matter is astonishing. They must see daily the miseries which beset women thrown on their own resources, when, in fact, they have nothing to meet the demand; and yet they do nothing, or almost nothing, to prevent the occurrence of such evils in their own cases. Let it once be understood that women desire training, it will soon follow that the training will be regarded as a matter of course. Let them take advantage of work which is offered, and more will follow.

But, at the same time, women ought to recollect that if they desire training, and undertake the work necessary for its accomplishment, it must be with no half will or intention. They must be serious about their work. They must not expect that they can have all the pleasures to be enjoyed by idle people and all the advantages that accrue to busy ones. It is not possible to be butterflies and bees at one and the same moment. Life is too serious to be wasted in frivolities. But to many women hardly any opportunity is afforded for serious occupation. When it is granted, or when they have the power to attain or to command it, let them take heed that they use it well. As they become capable of doing work they will find a pleasure and an interest in it which will make up for the difficulties encountered in acquiring the power of performing it. They will be saved from the blank ennui of the lives which idle women endure, and will become members of society of value to themselves and others. But let them remember that for all this training is essential.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1868.

The first of a series of Elegant Colored Plates of the FALL AND WINTER FASHIONS, prepared in Paris by the proprietors of the MODE ILLUSTRÉE expressly for HARPER'S BAZAR, will be presented to our readers in an early Number.

PRESUMING ON AFFECTION.

IT certainly will not do to rely altogether upon the force of natural affection, if in fact there is any such thing. Benjamin Franklin, as we all recollect, tested its existence in his mother, by presenting himself to her, after a long separation, as a stranger. She failed to recognize him, and he came to the conclusion, contrary to his previous belief, that there was no natural affection.

Though we may not all be disposed to accept the result of Franklin's test as an ultimate decision of the question, we can not deny, whether the origin of family attachment be instinctive or not, that its force depends greatly upon cultivation. This it would be well never to forget, taking care not to presume too much upon the mere natural ties of relationship. There is more family happiness destroyed by this presumption than by any other single cause whatsoever. There is unquestionably a strong coherency given to the family bond by the pressure of social obligation, and to this may be added whatever tenacity may inhere from the natural affection supposed by many to exist. But with all this, it is not prudent to rely upon either the duty or the instinct of conjugal, parental, or filial love.

Rousseau has said that it is never safe to place our affections, however strong, in opposition to our selfish interests, however weak; and he illustrates the danger and the fatal consequences by an incident in his own life. His father showed every mark of paternal love to him, until, by the death of his mother, Rousseau became heir to a small property. He now showed an apparent dislike of his son, and allowed him to leave his home forever without a protest, and without a settlement, as Rousseau avows, of the maternal legacy.

There are some—we hope there are many—who have such a high sense of duty that they will perform it for its own sake, and without regard to personal inclinations or interests. Still it is not wise to separate duty from pleasure, as is often forcibly done. There are parents who seem to think that the disagreeable is an essential element of domestic virtue. They assume relatively to their children a constant air of severity, and never impose a duty without the threat of a penalty. Their household gods are cruel deities, only to be appeased by the sacrifice of the young and tender, by the tears, lamentations, and painful contortions of childhood. Home thus associated with pains and penalties may still retain a strong hold upon the heart of youth, for it is home withal; but it is preposterous to suppose that its good influence has been strengthened and not weakened by the remembered pangs of suffering.

Wives and husbands are apt also to presume too much upon their mutual obligation. In their case it will be hardly pretended that there is a resource of natural affection wherewith to prop the heart in every shock of violence, or repair each damage of neglect. Marriage surely is a conventional affair, originating in a mutual agreeableness, and depending entirely for its continued happiness upon the ability of each to administer to the other's pleasure. Yet husbands and wives not seldom are seen galling each other's neck by pulling, like two ill-matched hounds, as hard and contrariwise upon the common chain as if they believed it incapable of giving way. Married people should recollect that the obligation to be mutually agreeable in its widest sense, in small as well as in great things, does not end with the last day of the honey-moon. It is more particularly in matters which may be deemed petty, though they are never so considered before marriage, that married people are apt to disregard their mutual obligations. A man and wife are proverbially less courteous to each other than an unmarried pair. The secret marriage of a couple was disclosed by the fact that on the dame dropping her handkerchief the cavalier made no effort to pick it up. His want of politeness proved beyond a doubt that he was that uncourteous creature—a husband. In dress and verbal courtesy married people are wont to be exceedingly careless. The surperine miss becomes the slouchy madame, and the nice-spoken young man the boisterous master of the house. If they desire to remain together we commend them not to limit their mutual agreeableness, as regards the smallest matters, to the first six weeks of their marriage, but to continue perpetually sweet in manner and neat in dress.

THE WEAKER SEX.

THERE are a great many women who seem disposed to accept the title of weaker sex, and conform their characters to it in every respect. This term, however, like softer, gentler, or tamer as is meant, and other expressions of the same sort, were first applied by man to woman to indicate his own affected superiority. They are words of pity which scantily cover a meaning of scorn. They were never intended as compliments, and should not be accepted as such.

Women are in no sense—physically, morally, or intellectually—less strong by nature than man. They have as large a sum of strength in each respect as he, although the particulars of which it is composed are different. The threading of a needle is as great a proof of physical superiority as the wielding of a crow-bar. If man has the broader grasp and stouter muscle, the woman has the greater delicacy of touch and precision of movement. There may be as much strength in the one as in the other, though its nature is totally different.

Many women have, however, unfortunately we repeat, accepted weakness as an essential of their nature. We thus find them doing their best to enfeeble, and reduce themselves to attenuated ghosts of humanity hardly to be seen or felt. They have been impressed with such an artificial horror of the substantial that they will make any sacrifice of health and comfort to avoid it. Thus they tighten their waists, they squeeze their toes, they starve their stomachs, they blanch their faces, and shut themselves up indoors without light and exercise until they become almost disembodied.

They have such an aversion to the least indication of the ruddy hue of health that they conceal it with chalk and paint, and to the activity of vigor that they affect a languor when they have it not. They reach their ideal of a perfect woman when they have reduced themselves to the fewest possible pounds avoirdupois, diminished their power of locomotion to the minimum necessary to getting in and out of a carriage with the aid of a helping arm, whitened their faces to the pallor of disease, and accomplished the feat of a daily headache in the morning and a fainting fit at night.

A claim to the title of the weaker sex may thus be made good, but at a fearful sacrifice of health, happiness, and—according to all unperverted taste—loveliness too. Women should scorn all such enfeebling appellatives as insults to their nature, and strive, in accordance with their original organization, to become robust physically, morally, and intellectually.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

On Keeping Dogs.

DEAR READER,—I was driving on Friday afternoon with my friend Peter Paul Pry, and we were enjoying the soft air and the lovely view near the beautiful village of Assyria, in Westchester County. The clouds were very heavy, sweeping across the heavens in magnificent folds, and our view of the landscape was panoramic, for the road lay across the famous spur of the Andes which extends into the pleasant county watered by the Amazonian Bronx. Peter Paul Pry is peculiarly susceptible to fine scenery, which is always finer under striking atmospheric effects; and he was, so to speak, wholly abandoned to his enjoyment of the scene, so that I was obliged more than once to remind him that he held the reins, and was responsible for our necks.

"Do you see," said Pry to me, "that cloud in the west fringed with sunlight, and just touching the top of Chimborazo? I remember precisely such an effect among the Alps. We had left the Weissenstein in the morning, and went cheerily along the valley of the Aar—Excuse me, Bachelor, if I pause to pay a tribute to the most charming of traveling companions. Oh Juliet, how far away and unreal are the days in which thou seemedst to me more beautiful than Helen of Troy, more an angel of mercy than Mrs. Fry or Miss Dix! How the morning breeze of blank years ago—for why should I obtrude needless details?—lifted those golden locks, while those 'sweetest eyes were ever seen' turned not unkindly upon the most unworthy—"

"Hi! hi! Hold on! Pry! Take care! What the deuce is it?" exclaimed I, as the horse shied and our carriage seemed to be lurching sideways.

"Bow-wow-wow! Bow-wow-wow!"

Pry's hat flew off, and he pulled violently at the reins, and ejaculated something which sounded to me like d—mn—tion, or words to that effect; while I clung manfully to the seat, and, gradually collecting myself, saw a huge dog standing in the road in front of a farmhouse and barking at us furiously, while our horse was thoroughly alarmed and tried desperately to run. After a short struggle Mr. Pry was victorious, and we resumed our drive peacefully. But he was in no humor to finish the little romance of his youth upon which he had entered, and the story of which had had rather a ridiculous interruption.

But during all the time that the dog was barking at us and frightening the horse, the owner, a hulking clothopper, stood in his door staring at us and not even speaking to the dog.

"Why don't you call your beast off, you stupid oaf?" shouted Pry as soon as he could command the situation.

The oaf grinned and stared, with his hands in his pockets, and said nothing. Of course every body who passes is exposed to the assault of that cur. Some day a high-spirited horse will go by, drawing or perhaps bearing some incomparable Juliet. He will be maddened by the snarling brute; he will run, leap, rear; and the neck, slim as Anne Boleyn's, will be—No, I can not contain myself. I repeat what I have before said, that it is the duty of the grand inquest of the neighborhood to present people who keep wild beasts at large and liable to fall upon innocent passengers as the most unmitigated nuisance, to be abated without delay.

I was speaking of this little incident at Tom Touchy's, where I happened in to tea the next evening. Tom is a good fellow, who married Patience Jones a few years ago. They have a little rural box in Westchester, less than ten thousand miles from the banks of the Bronx, where they pass every summer. My story was heard with the utmost sympathy. Mrs. Touchy agreed that it was horrible to think of; and oh! if poor Mr. Pry had had his neck broken, or his arm, or his limb—for so the ingenious Mrs. Touchy chooses to call leg. "And indeed, yes, to be sure," said she, suddenly remembering that I had also been in the same peril with Mr. Pry; "ah, yes, Mr. Bachelor, how sorry I should have been if any thing had happened to you!"

I don't know why it was, but something in her tone or manner, or in his own humor, irritated my friend Tom, and he made a series of half sneering, contemptuous remarks at his wife who sat silent and coloring and drooping, until the tears came into her eyes. But I saw that she was determined not to seem conscious of ill-treatment before me. I must say that Tom was surly and snappish toward his wife to an abominable degree. The word "limb" had evidently offended him, and he rung an endless sarcastic change upon it. "My dear Bachelor, don't spill your tea upon your limb, and don't strike against the limb of the table. You had better spread your handkerchief upon your limb; don't you think so, Patience, my dear? By-the-by, Bachelor, the new fashion in trousers, I observe, is to have them fit close to the limb. But very few men of our acquaintance have handsome limbs, have they, Patience, my dear?"

So he snapped and snarled at her in the most petulant tone—not with good-natured railery, but with the most offensive air of contempt. His conduct not only suddenly stopped my little story as effectually as the dog's barking stopped the romance of Peter Paul Pry, but it put an end to all conversation whatever. Indeed it presently began to seem to me very much the same thing. I felt as uncomfortable at Tom Touchy's tea-table as I had felt insecure in the carriage; and when I took leave, which I did very soon, and felt very glad too to be clear of that gloomy and ill-tempered head of a family, I asked myself as I walked home what essential difference there was between the oaf standing at his door and suffering his dog to attack a passenger and Tom Touchy sitting at his own table and allowing his bad manners to attack a friend and drive him out of his house? Bachelor, said I to myself, there are many kinds of barking dogs, and the worst is not the four-legged species.

Must I, alas! call the fashionable Aurea an oaf also? Is it possible that a lady who prides herself upon being the very queen of society; who goes to England and passes weeks at the country seats of noblemen; who speaks French and Italian so nimbly, and reads so many of the new books; who gives such dinners and knows the most comme il faut shade in gloves; is it, I say, possible that this paragon keeps dogs to snarl and bark at quiet travelers? Even so. She does it. There is in this respect a very striking resemblance between the superb Aurea and the bumptin of whom we were speaking.

I say that she keeps dogs; and you think that it is a very proper and pretty thing to behold a gracious lady proceeding to the Park attended by a King Charles with a broad blue ribbon, as if he were, excepting the ribbon, a dukeling incognito; or by an Italian greyhound with a neat blanket, bound with blue or red as the case may be, and a magnificent letter A embroidered in the corner. But I do not speak of such animals. Why any woman should wish to play at dolls in that manner I can not imagine. Yet I see that some women, and often very charming ones, do, and I am silent. I am silent, but I reserve my rights. If, upon entering the drawing-room, one of these animals advances to the assault of my heels or my calves, I do not hesitate to defend myself with the weapons that nature has provided. I kick lustily and leave consequences to Heaven. If I also leave the enemy upon the field I am resigned. If the mistress darkens her face and refuses me at the door forever after, I am equal to that fortune. I am willing to be the Curtius to leap into this horrible canine gulf to save decent society.

But the dogs of which I speak are more ferocious than the King Charleses and the greyhounds; and the passengers upon whom they fall are not people in the parlor, but in the kitchen. To drop metaphor, the manners of Aurea rend her domestics as blood-hounds tear slaves. So hard, so cold, so contemptuous to them, as if they were caterpillars or spiders; so taking for granted that they intend to lie, and cheat, and steal; her conduct is derogatory to human nature. Her domestics have a much more deadly feeling of enmity for Aurea than Pry and I had for our oaf of the Andes in Westchester. And when I hear her denounce the treatment of the Hindoos and the Irish by the English a hundred years ago, I think of the poor, friendless, consumptive chamber-maid to whom she gives no quarter, whom she never consoles with the proofs of warm human and sisterly sympathy, and I am tempted to cry aloud, "Thou art the woman!" I would rather Aurea had a body-guard of Italian greyhounds, and a drawing-room full of wretched little pug-nosed King Charleses, than that she should keep such a pack of hounds to hunt innocent travelers; and should she chance to read these words, I will not equivocate, I say frankly—Yes, Madame, I do mean you. It is you who stand by unconcerned while your fierce dogs fall upon strangers, but fellow-beings.

And would you believe that Jeffreys—yes, even Jeffreys—keeps a whole pack? He is apparently the mildest of men. He stoops a little in a scholarly way, and he can no longer conceal that he is the editor of the new Review. He keeps his dogs for service in its pages, and tremendous service they do. I am very glad that I am not an author. If I were, I should always hear the baying of those hounds of Jeffreys in the distance, and feel like a frightened fawn whenever I sat composing poetry, or philosophy, or history. Some placid poet passes—call him poetaster, if you choose—and when you have gratified yourself sufficiently in that way, tell me if every body who is not Shakespeare, or Dante, or Homer, is to be snuffed out? Because of Etna and Vesuvius, shall there be no pretty bonfire in our garden? Some placid poet passes, and Jeffreys stands at his door with his hands plunged into his pockets, and out rush his great dogs, and bark, and growl, and bite the luckless passenger. "Do you call this stuff poetry?" cries Jeffreys, and he pours out all kinds of sarcasm and ridicule upon the luckless poet, like a chamber-maid in old Edinburgh emptying slops from a window upon the passer-by. Criticism is a noble art, but sympathy is a nobler. Let the one elevate the other. Justice is divine, but mercy is diviner. If justice were done—good lack, brother Jeffreys!

No; I do not ask you to say that naught is every thing and every thing is naught. I do not ask you to praise Martin Farquhar Tupper's poetry; I do not say that you shall not make fun of it—how can you help it? It makes fun of itself. But, for Heaven's sake, good farmer at your door, remember that even tramps have calves to their legs, and that the ankles of beggars are sensitive. Bear always in mind that the traveler is a man—think of him, not of yourself, good master of the hounds, and no damage will be done. When I read the early Blackwood and its various modern imitations I merely go to a bull-fight. Here are animals teased and tortured for the amusement of the populace—for no other purpose under heaven. The criticisms are written to show how smart the writers are, and to make the readers laugh. That is the manner of Jeffreys, master of the critical hounds. He keeps dogs not to preserve his sheep but to bark at travelers and bite their legs—or limbs, if Mrs. Touchy prefers. And, upon the whole, I think that I had rather be driving with Peter Paul Pry and attacked by the Westchester mastiff, than a writer of books and articles, and bitten by the blood-hounds of Jeffreys.

My dear reader, life is short. Let me beg you to reflect. Do not put off the inquiry by thinking of Tom Touchy, of Aurea, and of Jeffreys; but ah! remembering how many canine breeds there are, ask yourself the solemn, the momentous question: Do I keep dogs, and do I stand idly by while they bite my neighbor's legs?

Your anxious friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FALL MANTLES.

OUR readers at a distance are asking for instructions about fall mantles. We tell them in reply that the universal adoption of short costumes for the street is rapidly doing away with extra over-garments. A lady no longer finds it necessary to provide herself each season with a separate wrapping, since her suits are complete in themselves, each with its own wrapping, made of heavy or light material, as the weather requires. The cloak stores find their occupation gone, and have become costume stores, devoting their best work-women to making suits. Instead of the variety of silk and faille wrappings usually imported at this season only a few new patterns are brought out. These are scarf-shaped with baschlik hoods, Watteau casques with a broad pleat in the back, or the long polonaise with capes. The trimming is pleatings of the material in frills, or the flat marquise ruche sewed at top and bottom. Cashmere is more stylish than silk. It is made in baschlik mantles and in large circulars with capes, trimmed with lace or fringe. Braiding embroidery, and a little jet may be used on cashmere.

PLUSH JACKETS.

Some very dressy plush jackets are made in the bright Alexandra blue, garnet, and French gray. They are short and jaunty, fitting the figure closely, are slightly wadded, and trimmed with satin piping or silk cord. A hood cut in two points from which long tassels are pendent is a stylish addition. White buttons of velvet or pearl. The cost varies from $30 to $40.

CLOTH CLOAKS.

Cloth cloaks are gored pelisses or tight-fitting basquines with capes or a hood, and are to be used as the upper garment of suits. As the prices are high, often reaching $200 for what appears to be a very simple garment, but few persons will care to buy more than one during the season. It is therefore best to be content with a black cloak that may be worn with petticoats of every color. The gay, warm-looking garnet cloth, a novelty this winter, the rich Humboldt purple, the dead-leaf brown, and the soft violet-gray are very alluring in their beauty, but will neither combine nor contrast well with other colors, and are too conspicuous to be worn all winter.

TRIMMINGS.

Scarcely a cloak is shown without fringe on some part of it. A new fringe has slender, pear-shaped pendants. The wide netted heading is suitable for velvet, and is in favor with old ladies. Bullion cords and tassel fringe are more dressy. Faille and satin are pleated in a variety of ways for frills and ruches, and as a heading for fringe. Six or eight bands of satin the color of the cloth, cross-cut, half an inch wide, are stitched on at both edges. Wider bands have several rows of stitching, done with accuracy, in straight lines. Flat satin braid of different widths is newer than folds. Buttons, both small and large, are used in profusion. The wide serge or military braid is serviceable on plain garments. Velvet bands cut bias from the piece are piped with faille or satin. Tassels of unusual length and gretots of passementerie adorn the hoods and capes. Rosettes and triple bows of satin or faille, or both together, are features of the Watteau casaque.

MODELS.

The handsomest model in cloth is a polonaise of heavy purple beaver, fitting the waist as closely as a dress. Pleats are introduced in the back of the skirt to give sufficient fullness of tournure. The skirt reaches just below the knee, and is looped at the sides by passementerie ornaments with long pendants. The trimming, of black Russian lamb-skin, forms a collar that does away with the necessity of furs. It is bertha shaped, covering the shoulders. Fringe at the edge. The belt is also of the wavy black fur, and a three-inch band surrounds the garment. The price is $200.

A stylish casaque of bear's-ear garnet beaver is short, tight-fitting, and double-breasted. Two groups of satin bands, six in a group and each band half an inch wide, are stitched around this garment. Large square pockets at the side. Narrow coat-sleeves. Price $75.

A black basquine has velvet fronts and back of satin. Guipure lace and satin ruches trim this unique garment. Price $150. A black ribbed cloth is a gored circular with large cape. Price $75. Another is a polonaise with cape and pointed hood. Trimming of knots of faille and fringe. Price $60.

CARRIAGE WRAPS AND SHAWLS.

Heavy plaid flannels, a yard and a half wide at $2 a yard, are made up into extra carriage cloaks. These are serviceable for traveling, and are worn over suits on cool mornings on the promenade. The royal Stuart plaid, the M'Gregor, M'Farlane, Rob Roy, and plaids of every clan are in favor. Ladies of quiet tastes choose large blocks of black and white, or the irregular blue and green plaid. Gay young misses wear the bright colors in which Highlanders delight. The shape is a gored circular, pointed behind and at the sides, with arm-holes concealed by a large cape with pointed fold forming a hood. Folds of satin and fringe of the several colors of the plaid form the trimming. The price asked is from $16 to $35.

Woolen shawls, soft as merino but very heavy, are in stripes and plaid. The stripes are wide and regular bars of black, scarlet, and gold together, or the broken Roman stripe with all the hues of the rainbow. $18. The chlamys, of which we have already spoken, a cashmere circular laden with colored embroidery and appliqué, is a gorgeous opera cloak to be worn later in the winter. Shawl-shaped garments with an Arab fold are trimmed with fringe and black lace. White plush with pink or blue stripes, having the effect of fringe, is sold for evening wraps at $10 a yard, double width.

PLAIDS.

For several seasons large invoices of plaid goods have been thrown upon the market here, and merchants anxious to sell have declared plaids would prevail; but they were never seen except in the shop windows or on school-girls, and it became a problem to know what was done with the plaids. Again it is affirmed we are to be arrayed like Scotchmen; and as our Parisian sisters have conceived a fancy for northern fashions, it is probable we will have at least a short reign of this gay attire for demi-toilette. It can never be full dress. The modistes just returned from Paris report as among their importations Highland costumes for morning promenades and traveling, which we describe below. They are also using plaid poplins, silk, and velvet, as trimming, "but very carefully," say the modistes; "not broad bands of plaid, but narrow cords, piping, and binding."

The heavy poplin reps, with thick raised cords, silk and wool together, are the handsomest plaids. They are a yard wide at $2. Smooth poplins in plaids of all the clans are from $1 10 to $1 50 double fold. All-wool flannels in large plaids for cloaks, and in smaller checks for children, are from $2 to $3 a yard.

A traveling costume of Parisian make is of large plaid, irregular, blue and green together. It has two skirts, a ten-inch flounce bias, and pleated on the lower skirt, three folds of the material piped with black silk on the upper skirt. Short full sacque with belt, caught up with rosettes at the sides and back. A scarf of the material, half a yard wide, is knotted on the right shoulder, and tied loosely under the left arm.

Another French suit, marked $200, has a skirt of royal Stuart plaid, narrow, only four widths, bordered with a pleating half a yard deep, cut in saw teeth at the bottom edge. A corsage of plaid is tight-fitting in the back, with four deep pleats on each side of the front from belt to shoulder, lapping toward the right. This much of the suit may be used as a breakfast dress. A long polonaise of black ottoman reps, square in front, round at the back, trimmed with bias bands piped with plaid, and variegated fringe, completes it for the street. Rosettes of passementerie, in which plaid is introduced, loop the skirt. An elbow cape has a hood lined with plaid.

Among other costumes were two of a new garnet and leaf-brown velours, checkered instead of in straight reps. Wide marquise ruches of satin on the skirt extend above the knee. Short polonaise, tight in the waist, with added fullness in the skirt to form a panier puff. The lower edge of the puff was formed by gathering the end of the polonaise beneath the trimming.

STRIPED DRESSES AND PETTICOATS.

The zebra-striped dresses are growing into favor. Handsome striped poplins, woolen and satin together, blue, gold, green, and garnet, with black, are a yard wide, at $2 50. A good material not so heavy is $1 65 a yard. Excellent all-wool poplins are shown at $1 a yard in inch-wide stripes for skirts, and narrower stripes of the same color and material for the over-dress. Modistes announce among their expected novelties striped velvets as the climax of extravagance in petticoats. The velvet skirts are trimmed with bias folds of the silk of the over-dress, and the dress with folds of the velvet petticoat.

The seamless boulevard skirts are in new colors, softer material, with new borders like appliqué, and are from a dollar to a dollar and a half cheaper than last year's prices. Balmorals have broad Roman stripes, and a new pattern in imitation of the borders on camel-hair shawls.

PERFUMED CORSETS.

New corsets of good shape and make are of strong yet thin coutil, less clumsy than the thick corset jeans. The whalebones are in cases stitched on the outside, leaving a smooth surface next the body, a great comfort to corset wearers. A novel feature in these new stays is a perfume in the whalebone cases that counteracts the disagreeable odor emitted by whalebone when warmed by the natural heat of the body. This perfume remains permanently, and is said to be applied to these corsets under the superintendence of Eugene Rimmel, perfumer to Queen Victoria. The price ranges from $2 50 to $5. Another novelty is the crinoline corset for dancing. It is of crinoline or canvas, manufactured for the purpose, thin, cool, and comfortable for crowded receptions. It is made in three horizontal pieces, clasping the waist tightly, with graceful slope on the hips and bust. They are sold at the low price of $3. There has been a marked reduction in the price of corsets lately. Handsomely embroidered corsets are sold at $4.

NEW CRINOLINE AND PANIERS.

A new crinoline called the "Elite Petite" has a well-arranged panier produced by a stout, curved spring of combination metal in the back, with a straight tongue resting on the corset to hold the panier in place. This is much better than the ordinary steel spring panier, which loses its elasticity and gets out of shape. It is also a protection to the spine, as it supports the entire weight of the skirts. The trail to this skirt is very slight. Price $2 50. A panier of this shape detached from the skirt is sold separately.

SWISS APRONS.

The imported Swiss aprons at $5 are trimmed with tiny tucks or appliqué folds, stitched or in braid patterns, medallions of Valenciennes, and lace borders. Bands and pockets are lined with ribbon to display the work on them. Bretelles of lace and ribbon pass over the shoulder. Infants' bibs, shaped like large round collars, are made of diagonal tucks of Swiss muslin, separated by insertion and lace. These are more ornamental than useful, and are sold at $3.

TORTOISE SHELL AND JET.

Instead of tawdry French gilt and wooden jewelry for morning toilette we have a return of plain jet and tortoise shell in massive blocks, cubical pendants, bars, and crescent shapes. Combs, brooch, ear-rings, buttons, and bracelets are made en suite, and engraved with gold in Greek patterns, initials, or monograms. Sets of plain tortoise shell, of very fine quality, are sold for $16. These are only the pin and ear-rings. Tuck combs having broad straight bands of shell are from $6 to $12.

PORTEMONNAIES, ETC.

Pale blue leather is a novelty more fashionable for pocket-books than the buff or russet color. Chatelaines for needle-work of this new blue are $5. A treasure to ladies when shopping or traveling alone is a leather belt with a small bag attached, divided into separate compartments furnished with pencil and tablets for memoranda, a portemonnaie, and sewing utensils. Price $8.

PERSONAL.

THE late Governor THOMAS H. SEYMOUR, of Connecticut, was in many respects one of the best specimens of New England character. Well educated, modest, liberal, simple in his habits (six hundred dollars a year he used to say was sufficient for his wants), and discharging with marked ability the various high offices he was called upon to fill, it was no wonder that as Minister to Russia he at once became one of the prime personal favorites of NICHOLAS and ALEXANDER, and that after six years of service he returned home laden with presents from them such as no foreign minister of this government had received before, or has received since. In his modest parlor stood the famous table given to him by NICHOLAS, the top of which is of solid malachite, about six feet long by three feet wide, and worth, under the hammer, thirty thousand dollars—the only such table on this continent. On the table lay that magnificent volume, about three feet square, containing a pictorial history of the coronation of ALEXANDER, each face a portrait, the whole colored and bound in a style of unsurpassed skill and elegance. Of this work only fifty copies were printed, after which the plates were destroyed by order of the Emperor. One of his first acts on reaching St. Petersburg was to seek out impecunious Americans detained in that city, some in prison, pay their debts, and provide for their passage home. When Colonel RANSOM, of the New England Ninth, was shot down, SEYMOUR led the charge against Chapultepec, and pulled down with his own hand the flag that floated on the Mexican fortress. A massive monument is to be erected to his memory.

Colonel FITZGERALD, editor of the Philadelphia City Item, has another new play, "Wolves at Bay," nearly ready for production. Within a year past Colonel F. has written five plays, and bids fair to become one of the most prolific as he is one of the most successful of American dramatists.

Mrs. MYRA BRADWELL, of Chicago, proposes to publish in that city a paper to be devoted entirely to law intelligence, to be called the Legal News. Her husband is County Judge.

Mr. LESTER WALLACE is biographer in the October Galaxy. He was born in Hudson Street in this city, and is therefore a sort of English Knickerbocker. His wife, a lady of much beauty and gentleness, is a sister of JOHN MILLAIS, the celebrated painter; she has four children—ARTHUR, FLORENCE, CHARLES, and HAROLD—charming boughs of the parent tree. His youngest brother, CHARLES, who was in the First Madras, Indian Army, died in New York. His second brother, HARRY, is a captain in the British Army, having served with much distinction in the Ninth and Seventy-seventh regiments. He fought through the Sikh campaign, and wears a medal and three clasps for Sobraon. He is now Governor of Millbank Prison, and attached to the royal household in the Queen's body-guard, composed of picked officers, who must all have won decorations.

The old LONGFELLOW house still stands in Portland, Maine, overshadowed on one side by the Preble House, and on the other by a block of stores. It seems like some lingering relic of the past shrinking from public gaze. It is now and has always been, in the occupancy of the LONGFELLOW family, and still preserves its old-fashioned interior arrangements. Some of the furniture dates back nearly seventy years to the time when the poet's father first went to house-keeping. On the walls hang a picture of the poet as he appeared in his college days, and also of his uncle Wadsworth. The poet's great-grandfather came to Portland in 1745 to open a grammar-school at the invitation of the town, and was the ancestor of all of that name that now reside in or have gone out of Portland.

At his own request General HOOKER has been ordered before the Retiring Board, now in session in this city, for examination as to the propriety of his being placed on the Retired List. The General has been quite infirm for two years past, and the recent death of his excellent and accomplished wife must have tended to aggravate his ailments.

The editorship of the London Saturday Review has been conferred upon Mr. PHILIP HARWOOD, formerly a Unitarian preacher and assistant to Mr. W. J. Fox. He was long assistant to the late editor, Mr. Cook (who, curiously enough, is said to have never written a line for the paper he edited). The chief proprietor of the Review is Mr. BERSFORD HOPE, known for his opulence, aristocratic connections, and that sort of thing.

—Mr. EMERSON, Mrs. JULIA WARD HOWE, HENRY JAMES, and other prominent people of similar tastes, are to read articles of interest to the Boston "New England Women's Club," during the coming winter. These entertainments are to be social as well as intellectual; talk-y and tea-y; a pleasant mixture of food, fancy, and fun.

—It is proposed that Sir RODERICK MURCHISON, Sir JOHN HERSCHEL, and Sir HENRY JAMES be constituted a Board of Trustees for a fund to survey the peninsula of Mount Sinai, to determine the true line of march of the Jews, and the true mountain of the law.

—The Marquise DE CAUX (PATTI) has just bought, for $10,000 currency, a lot on the Boulevard Alma, on which she proposes to build herself a house. This is a street answering, in the character of its residents, to Fifth or Madison avenues.

—An American writer in the German Kirchenblatt says that if HENRY WARD BEECHER could speak the German language, and be prevailed upon to preach for a year in one of the capitals of Germany, he would succeed in stemming the tide of infidelity in the old country. He says it is but the plain, unvarnished truth when he asserts that there is on the whole continent no pulpit orator that could be compared with him.

—The little difficulty that lay in the way of the marriage of the KING OF BAVARIA with the daughter of the EMPEROR OF RUSSIA is said to have been removed, and the marriage will be solemnized in a few weeks.

—A grandson of Madame DE STAEL has quitted the French navy and entered the monastery of St. Sulpice—became weary of the worry of the worldlings, and now proposes to be good.

—It turns out that Miss KELLOGG's return to New York was not for the purpose of appearing in opera with Mr. MAPLESON's company. She has been engaged by MAX STRAKOSCH for four years, one of which is to be passed in a professional tour through the United States, and the other three in Europe. Nor is TIETJENS coming this fall. What the eminent MAPLESON proposes to do is among the great unsettled problems of the future. It is quite sure, however, that Mr. KINGSLAND, the managing gentleman of the Academy of Music, has MAPLESON's contract to occupy the same this autumn.

—Ambitious young ladies need no longer think about Mr. COLFAX. That gentleman has "popped" to Miss NELLIE WADE, a niece of Senator WADE, and it is all arranged. She is represented to be a sweet, sensible, accomplished lady of thirty years, an Ohio farmer's daughter, quite worthy the place she has won in the heart of the second man in public life in the nation, and of the position by his side in home and in society she is destined soon to take. Her father, the brother of the Ohio Senator, died several years ago, and she spent part of a winter in Washington with her uncle two years since, when the acquaintance began with Mr. COLFAX and his family, which has ripened into this interesting relationship.

—Since Madame VICTOR HUGO's death we learn through the Paris papers that, although married for forty years, never was there a wife, unless it was, perhaps, the wife of EDMUND BURKE, so wrapped in her husband as Mme. Hugo was in Victor Hugo; she idolized him; lived for him. He was "the ocean to the river" of her thoughts. The annals of love scarcely contain a more blissful history than the narrative of their love. Neither could remember a period of time when they did not love one another. Their families were intimate before their birth, and it is said their fathers on their, the latter's, wedding-day exchanged wishes: "If I have a daughter, may she marry your son." Brought up together, they were companions in childhood's sports, and had exchanged troth long before fame had circled the poet's brow with its halo. So he knew (how few men do know it!) she loved him for himself; so he knew she must love him better than any man on earth, for he was indeed bone of her bone, flesh of her flesh, herself. Was not his whole life hers?

No wonder that the Parisian journalists make much of the memory of so admirable a woman.

—Another rich Bostonian has "gathered the drapery of his couch about him, as one who lieth down to pleasant dreams"—Mr. AUGUSTINE HEARD, who accumulated large wealth in the China trade. He was born in Ipswich, in which town he took great interest. A large library and building, fitted up at a cost of $50,000, given by him to the town, was to have been dedicated last week.

—There are to be great times at Princeton on the 1st of October, at the inauguration of Dr. M'COSH as President of the College. Ex-Governor POLLOCK, of Pennsylvania, JOHN P. STOCKTON, and Rev. Dr. HODGE are the orators selected from the Alumni to deliver the principal addresses.

—Mr. THOMAS DONOHO, for many years cashier of the Washington National Intelligencer, just before he died requested that the old sign-board, that for half a century had hung over the door of that establishment, might be used as a part of his coffin. The request was complied with.

—Madame METHUA SCHELLER, who has some reputation as an actress, writes to a German paper a letter in which she speaks in the highest terms of the theatre at Salt Lake City and its management. She says that the stage is one of the largest in America, but that the people, being deficient in greenbacks, pay for admission with orders for wood, potatoes, or corn.

—NAPOLEON III. rewards right regally those who have filled faithfully confidential relations in his household. He has just promoted to be a Senator of France the Abbé DE GUEVY, a most excellent man, who has, up to the present time, had charge of the religious education of the PRINCE IMPERIAL. He has done many good and useful works, such as establishing schools for apprentices, funds for sick workmen, etc. He is Curé of the Madeleine, but happens to possess a splendid house in the Rue de la Ville l'Évêque. This he has fitted up for the accommodation of any of his clergy who may be in want of lodging, who are his guests as long as they please.

Hortense Collar.

This collar is made of Valenciennes insertion half an inch wide, bordered on each side with embroidered insertion a fifth of an inch wide, and trimmed with an embroidered figure on the ends. The under edge is bound with a strip of muslin a third of an inch in width, and the upper one is bordered with Valenciennes lace half an inch wide. For the jabot, which is arranged on the front, prepare a strip of double muslin ten inches long and one inch wide, and trim this with Valenciennes lace an inch in width in the manner shown by the illustration. Between the rows of the lace set loops of green satin ribbon half an inch wide. The same ribbon is also laid under the collar.

Marquise Collar.

This collar is arranged in the same manner as the Hortense collar just described. For the foundation of the jabot prepare two pieces of double muslin eight inches long and an inch wide, sew them together at the upper ends, and finish with gathered lace two inches wide in the manner shown by the illustration.

Two Corners of Pocket-Handkerchief Borders.

BOTH these borders are worked above the hem of the pocket-handkerchiefs. The open-work stripe on Fig. 1 is formed of Valenciennes lace, which is worked fast to the muslin on each side with satin stitch points. At regular distances work flower twigs in satin and straight half-polka stitch; the centre of the flower is composed of lace stitch. Having completed the embroidery, cut away the material from under the insertion.

The border, Fig. 2, consists of insertion of netted guipure and single embroidered twigs of flowers. Work the gether in the middle, the seam being covered with a very narrow bias strip of muslin stitched down twice. Join the two ends in the manner shown by the illustration, and finish with a rosette edged with the lace. The cuffs may be made corresponding to the collar by referring to the illustration.

Linen Standing Collar with Percale Trimming.

This collar is of double linen bound with a narrow binding and trimmed with a straight strip of blue percale half an inch wide. Cuffs to match may be made from the pattern, Fig. 22 of the Supplement.

insertion with fine thread over a fine steel knitting-needle, and then work the strip in point de toile with the aid of the illustration. Having done this button-hole stitch the strip on the muslin (see the pattern), work the embroidered figures, and cut away the muslin under the insertion. The embroidered twigs may also be in application.

upper and lower edges, bound with red worsted braid, and trimmed with red worsted fringe and point russe embroidery of red split wool. Single pockets made in the form of slippers serve for the reception of the shoes. Fig. 46 of Supplement gives the shape of the pocket. Cut of linen from this pattern five equal pieces, then for the back two pieces each eighteen inches in width (the width of the pocket) and eleven inches deep, and a piece of pasteboard of the same size; finally, cut the outside piece also of linen, twenty-two inches wide by eleven inches deep. Now embroider the outside according to the design given by Fig. 2 in point russe with red worsted, scallop the under edge as shown by the pattern, bind it and the sides with the braid, and work three button-holes on each side. Having scalloped the upper edge of the back, join the material over the pasteboard with the exception of the under edge, and bind the back with the braid. Sew on the outside piece just under the scallops. Lay a pleat at each side in the upper material. Bind the under edges separately, and join them only here and there over the pasteboard, so that it can be taken out every time the case is washed. Next arrange the five pocket pieces at regular distances on the back. Each pocket is bound with the braid and laid in two pleats on the under edge, bringing \times on \bullet . Trim the edge of the back, with the exception of the upper edge, with red worsted fringe two inches wide. Lastly, sew three buttons on each side, corresponding to the button-holes of the upper part, and finish the top with two loops of braid, which serve for hanging up the case.

row strip of linen, and overseam both pieces closely together, six inches on each side of the corners unsewed. This forms the opening of the bag. Finish each of these corners with a linen strap eight inches long. On the under part of the upper side work the word "Starch" in cross stitch with red worsted.

purpose of rubbing flat-irons, in order to cleanse them from the starch that may have collected thereon. The bag is made of a circular piece of muslin about seven inches in diameter. Hem the upper edge and border with crochet insertion and lace. Run narrow linen tape through the insertion whereby to draw the bag together.

The second bag is designed for indigo. It is made of the same size as the Laundry Bag.

This bag is designed to hold the different articles used in starching and ironing, such as gloves, wax, sponge, etc., and is therefore provided with several inside pockets. The model is of red and white striped drilling, worked in point russe with black silk twist and white embroidery cotton. For making the bag take a strip of drilling twenty inches long and twelve (the height of the bag) wide, embroider this as shown by the illustration, button-hole stitch the upper edge, and line the under part six inches deep with muslin. On the lower edge, and also on the upper edge of the lining, back stitch the outside and lining together with two rows of stitching, so as to form a sheath for a whalebone or reed. Next prepare a strip of drilling six inches wide, which must be lined and bordered on the upper edge with a black and white cord. Lay this inside the under part of the bag, and tack them together lengthwise at irregular distances apart, so that several pockets of different sizes may be formed. Now sew together the sides of the bag, and set in a bottom of linen stiffened with pasteboard, run in the reeds, and sew on the black and white cord. The top is drawn together by means of cords and tas-

See illustration on page 789.

THESE borders may be used in various ways. They are well adapted to covers or curtains, the ground of which may be ornamented with the small figures which are seen between the larger figures of the borders. The border, Fig. 1, is worked on nanook in French and English embroidery. The white parts are of nanook in application. The scallops on the outer edge must be worked in button-hole stitch. The border shown by Fig. 2 is worked on mull with tulle application. The four wheels in each leaf are worked in fine thread, and the scallops on the outer edge in button-hole stitch.

VERSES IN MY OLD AGE.

By BARRY CORNWALL.

COME, from the Ends of the World,
Wind of the air or sky,
Wherever the Thunder is hurled,
Wherever the Lightnings fly!
Come, with the bird on your bosom
(Linnet or lark that soars),
Come with the sweet Spring blossom,
And the Sun from Southern shores.

I hate the snake Winter that creepeth,
And poisons the buds of May;
I shout to the Sun who sleepeth,
And pray him awake to day.
For the world is in want of his power,
To vanquish the rebel storm:
All wait for his golden hour,
Man, and beast, and worm.

Not only the seasons, failing,
Forsake their natural tone,
But Age droops onward, sailing,
And is lost in the seas unknown.
No wisdom redeemeth his sorrow,
For thought and strength are fled:
No hope enlightens to-morrow,
And the Past (so loved) is dead!
Dead!—Dead!

CHAPTER XII.

I AM CHEATED INTO RUIN BY A TRAITOR.

AFTER that too happy meeting at Vauxhall my spirits were too much distracted for the common business of life, and I found the society of Mr. Hay far from agreeable. I longed to be alone with my hopes and anxieties, but knew not how to get rid of a companion who cost me nothing, and took pains to make himself useful and necessary to me. In telling him what I had told him of my secrets I had given him some right to be interested in my affairs, and this privilege he used with much freedom, and to my extreme annoyance, until I lost my temper one day, and informed him that I preferred to manage my own business without his advice or interference.

If I had hoped to rid myself of him by this means I was doomed to disappointment. Mr. Hay was blessed with an imperturbable temper, and an easy impudence not to be disconcerted by any rebuff.

"That's wrong, Bob," he replied; "the advice of a man of the world is always worth having; and I'll wager I could help you to a wife and a fortune if you'd let me."

"I have no doubt of your genius for intrigue," I answered, coldly, "but how is it you have not found those blessings for yourself?"

"How do you know that I have not had and lost them? A man of my stamp runs through a fortune, and quarrels and parts company from a wife, while a fellow of your icy nature is deliberating a love-letter."

During this period of anxious expectation I found it impossible to rid myself of my companion's observation. If I went out after dark to watch the house that held my treasure, as I did every evening, he guessed my errand, and upbraided me for my pusillanimity. I tried to quarrel with him; but, as it did not suit the gentleman's purpose that we should part, I found this impossible.

It was a week after my meeting with Dora, and it seemed an age, when a visitor came to my chambers, and the door being opened by Mr. Hay, that person appeared before me in high spirits to announce that a young woman wanted to speak to me.

"She is dressed like a milliner's girl or a lady's-maid," he said; "but I'll wager it is thy innamorata in disguise."

I flew to the door and found Miss Hemsley's maid, a young Frenchwoman, whom I had seen often at Hauteville, and who was no especial favorite of mine. She had a pinched, sallow countenance, with small piercing black eyes. She spoke English very tolerably, but with an unpleasant nasal twang, and I had heard Lady Barbara extol her as a model of industry and fidelity. I felt, therefore, that my own dislike of the girl was an unworthy prejudice of the masculine mind, which is ever apt to associate an unpleasant face with an inferior nature. To-day I could have hugged Ma'am'selle Adolphe, so delighted was I to welcome any one who brought me tidings of Dora. I led her into my sitting-room, where Mr. Hay was lounging over a newspaper.

"As this young woman has come to speak of private business I should be very glad to have the room to ourselves for half an hour, Hay," said I.

"With all my heart, Bob; I can read the news at a coffee-house as well as here.—Your servant, madam."

Mr. Hay saluted my visitor with a profound bow, and favored her with a significant glance which I at the moment took for a simple fashionable leer, much affected at a time when your spurious fine gentleman's language to women was always spiced with double meaning, and his every look a declaration. I saw Mr. Hay safe outside my door, and then turned eagerly to the Frenchwoman.

"Now, Adolphe, what news from your mistress?" I cried. "Have you brought me a letter?"

"Ah, but no, monsieur!" shrieked the girl; "mademoiselle is too well watched for that. She can not run the hazard of writing. It is nothing but drums, and dinners, and masquerades, and picture-sales, and parties to Ranelagh all the day and all the night, and he, Monsieur Everard, is always there—always upon her steps. It is my Lady Barbara who sends me to-day. The marriage that you know of is to take place at once at the Fleet, at May Fair, any where that they will ask no questions. And if you have a friend who can help you to arrange the things, my Lady Barbara says—ah, let me not forget what it is she has said—since you know not the town, you are to confide in your friend, pourvu that you care to trust him."

A friend? What friend had I? There was my companion, Mr. Philip Hay, clever, unscrupulous, practiced in intrigue, and only too eager to be useful. But could I venture to trust my happiness to him?

"What next, Adolphe?" I cried.

"The marriage must be immediately, see you, Monsieur Robert. This day week is fixed for the wedding with Monsieur Everard. To-night there is a masquerade at Ranelagh. Mademoiselle will be there, with my Lady Barbara and Monsieur Everard. At half past twelve o'clock, when the rooms are most crowded, she will complain of the heat, and will retire to the cloak-room with her aunt, where she will slip a black silk domino over her dress and will come out to the portico, always with her aunt. You must be upon the spot with a hackney-coach ready to carry her away. It must all be done quick like the lightning, for Monsieur Everard will not be slow to take alarm; and then you will drive at once to your parson and he will marry you sur-le-champ. And after, you had best to leave the country with your bride, says my Lady Barbara, if you would not have bloodshed between you and Monsieur Everard."

"I can protect my wife and my honor in England or elsewhere," I answered, proudly; and then with a throbbing heart I sat down to write to my dear girl, assuring her of my gratitude and love, and thanking her a thousand times for her confidence; a long, wild, rambling epistle I doubt not. I had not time to read it over, for the Frenchwoman was in haste to be gone, so I crammed the letter and a couple of guineas into her hand and dismissed her.

When she was gone I paced my chamber thoughtfully for some time, debating the prudence of confiding in Philip Hay. After serious reflection I decided in his favor. True that I knew him to be a rascal, yet if well paid for his fidelity he would surely be faithful. And what interest could he have in betraying me? Some help in this matter I must assuredly have. I knew nothing myself of Fleet marriages or the law relating to them; and there was no time for me to obtain such knowledge from strangers. I had often enough been hustled in Holborn and on Ludgate Hill by the low wretches who touted for those reprobate parsons who made a living by such clandestine unions; but I could at least trust Philip Hay rather than one of these vulgar adventurers. To arrange a marriage between midnight and sunrise might be, nay, no doubt would be, a matter of some difficulty; and for this I needed just such help as my companion could give me; while in the event of any pursuit on the part of Everard Lestrangle, the assistance of such a sturdy henchman would be of no small service. It was already late in the afternoon, and there was little time for indecision; so I decided on trusting Mr. Hay with this precious secret, and on his return hastened to make him my confidant.

"It is just such an adventure as I love!" he cried, gayly. "Leave all to me, and I will engage that the soberest parson in the purlieus of the Fleet prison shall be in waiting with book and gown to unite you to your heiress at the unearthly hour of one to-morrow morning. He will ask an extra fee for the unusual hour, though it is scarcely so uncommon as you may think; but of course you'll not object to that."

"And will such a marriage be strictly legal?" I asked.

"Faith yes, Bob; the Gordian knot shall be as tight as if an archbishop had the tying of it—unless, indeed, you give special notice to the parson beforehand, when these ecclesiastics have a way of forgetting some essential bit of the service, which omission enables Signor Sposo to bid Signora Sposa good-morning some fine day when she grows troublesome. Oh, they are rare obliging fellows, I assure you, these parsons; but though these marriages are legal enough, it is a felony on their part to perform them, for which they are liable to prosecution. But they snap their fingers at Mr. Justice, and contrive to live a jolly life. There was Dr. Gainham, for instance, playfully entitled Bishop of Hell, a rare impudent dog; and the famous Keith, who made a handsome fortune by his chapel in Mayfair; and when there was some talk of his brother ecclesiastics putting down his traffic, vowed if they did he would buy a piece of ground and outbury them."

While my companion rattled on thus, I was meditating my plans for the night. Yes, Lady Barbara was right. It would be best to carry my bride from England, and place her where she would be safe from Everard Lestrangle's persecution. I could come back to my native shores to fight him, if my honor should demand such an act; but my first thought must be of Dora.

I had luckily upward of a hundred pounds in hand; and this, after seeing Mr. Hay with a twenty-pound note, would leave me plenty for a journey to France, and a month or two's living in some pleasant rustic retreat, which Dora, who knew the Continent, should choose. "And I will be her slave, and lie at her feet, during the brief happy holiday of our honey-moon," I thought; "and then I will come back to London and work for a position at the Bar, and redeem my name from the stigma of the fortune-hunter, and every penny of the income from her five-and-twenty thousand pounds shall be spent on herself, so that she may forget she is married to a poor man."

My fancy flew to a pretty rural cottage I had seen to let in one of the lanes beyond Kensington, during a recent pedestrian jaunt to that quarter, and which I imagined just such a simple paradise as my love would like.

"I will send Hay to secure it to-morrow," I said to myself, "while Dora and I are posting toward Dover, and I will ask Lady Barbara to furnish it for us."

Mr. Hay departed in search of a sober parson, and to order the post-horses and chariot to convey us to Dover; while I busied myself with the packing of a trunk to take with me on my journey. Never had I been so particular about my toilette. I deliberated solemnly between a blue suit and a chocolate one, and no elegant trifle of Pall Mall could have been more particular than I in my selection of cravat and ruffles.

By the time I had made my arrangements and counted my money, Mr. Hay returned. He had settled every thing most pleasantly—found an exemplary parson, a real Oxford man, without a fault except a capacity for losing money at faro, at the tavern of the Two Sawyers, Fleet Lane. The chaise and horses were ordered, and would be in waiting close to this place of entertainment.

"And by to-morrow noon you will be in Dover," said my coadjutor, "in time for the packet that sails at four in the afternoon, wind and weather permitting. And now let us go and dine together. What, man alive!" he cried, in answer to a dissentient look of mine, "will you refuse to crack a bottle with a faithful friend at parting? By—, Mr. Bob, unless I am used as a friend I will have no hand in this business. I am no dirty tool, too base to touch but not too vile to use!"

"It was no want of friendship that made me hesitate, Phil," I replied; "but I am in too anxious a mood for pleasure, and shall be poor company. We'll have a bottle together, notwithstanding."

I looked at my watch, a bulky Tompion with a clumsy outer-case of leather, that had belonged to my grandfather the Colonel, and had been flung aside as old-fashioned by my father when he went to Cambridge, and left in a drawer at Hauteville, where Lady Barbara found it, and gave it to me. It was early yet, and indeed, but for Mr. Hay's invitation to dine, I know not how I should have got rid of the hours that must pass before my appointment at Ranelagh.

My officious friend took me to a tavern that was strange to me, a house in Chelsea, where he ordered an excellent dinner, and so much wine that I remonstrated with him for his folly. But he informed me that we were not going to dine alone, and presently arrived a person of military aspect, in a uniform which I had never seen before, whom Mr. Hay introduced as Sergeant O'Blagg of the East India Company's service, a gentleman who thought no more of storming a Mahratta fortress than of cracking a bottle of Burgundy, and who stood high in the estimation of Major Lawrence.

This brave warrior, whose Hibernian accent was in nowise modified by long service in the East, favored us during dinner with many wonderful stories of his adventures in those distant lands, and dilated with a somewhat florid eloquence upon the wealth and glory to be won there.

"You gentlemen who know no more of war than those petty European skirmishes about which you kick up such a row, with firing of big guns and ringing of big bells, bedad, for a victory that you're neither better nor worse for, except in the matter of a new tax on your boots, or your wig, or your tay, ye've no notion of our conquests out yonder, where, at the sack of a town, there's diamonds as big as beans to be picked up in the streets, and the pearls fly as thick as hail-stones about our soldiers' heads; and there's big brazen idols in the temples, with their stomachs full of rubies, and emeralds, and such-like, just as you stuff a Michaelmas goose, Sir; and him as splits the haythen image asunder with the butt-end of his bayonet gets the stuffing for his pains. Why, the Great Mogul has seven golden thrones—or maybe some of 'em's silver—covered with jewels—the sergeant called them 'jools'—'every one of 'em handsomer than t'other, except the one that's called the paycock throne, and that whups the lot, and is valued at forty millions of rupees."

So he ran on, to the apparent delight of my companion, but to my own unutterable weariness. What were the jeweled thrones of the Great Mogul to me, who knew but one treasure, and sighed but for one dear prize? The sergeant's company vexed me; but Philip Hay explained to me in an under-tone that he had met this old friend by accident in the street, and could not well avoid asking him to join us at dinner. I observed that the soldier drank ferociously, and both he and Hay pressed the wine on me; but this kindness I resolutely declined. I would have given much to have been away from these boisterous boon-companions, and heartily repented my confidence in Mr. Hay, which had placed me in such an unwelcome position.

I gave but little attention to the sergeant's stories, which he told in a noisy, uproarious manner peculiar to the lower orders of his countrymen, and garnished with military oaths. My thoughts were far away from that boisterous table. When the bottle was pushed toward me, with clamorous protestations against my abstinence, I filled my glass mechanically, and in this manner, when the night grew late, I had drunk some three or four glasses of a claret which seemed to me a thin, poor wine, ill-adapted to steal a man's brains. Yet by ten o'clock I felt a kind of stupor creeping over me—a confusion of the brain, in which the strident voice of the Irish soldier, roaring his florid stories of Indian conquest and loot, of Duplex and the Great Mogul, peacock thrones, and royal elephants in jeweled harness, seemed strange and distant to my ears.

In this condition of my mind I was perpetually troubled by the idea that I had no right to be here. It was in vain that I looked at my watch, which showed me that I had nearly three hours to wait before my presence would be required at the gates of Ranelagh. At last I started up from the table in haste, telling Philip Hay that I could stay no longer, and if he was not ready to accompany me, would go alone.

He pointed to an eight-day clock in a corner of the room.

"Art thou mad, Bob?" he cried; "it has not yet gone the half hour after ten. Drink a glass of this rare old Hollands, and take things easy."

He forced a glass of spirit upon me, which I drank unwillingly enough. It had a strange, burning taste, and I had reason afterward to know that it was no such simple liquor as Hollands I was thus made to drink, but a dram doctored with an Indian spirit that maddens the brain.

"We can get rid of the sergeant in half an hour, and then go out and get our hackney-coach," whispered Hay close in my ear. "There is no need for him to know our business."

I acknowledged the wisdom of this, and tried to listen with some degree of patience to the soldier's long-winded stories, and my friend's comments upon them; but before I had listened long, the voices of the two mingled confusedly, then grew to a buzzing sound, and at last died away into a low murmur, like the pleasant rustling of trees on a summer afternoon, as my head sank forward on the table, and I slept.

I was awakened suddenly by a violent slap on the shoulder, and a loud voice crying:

"Twelve o'clock, Bob; the landlord is shutting his doors, and 'tis time we went in search of our coach. Why, what a dull companion thou hast been!"

I staggered to my feet. My eyeballs burned, and my head ached to splitting; for a moment I scarce remembered where I was, or the events of the day.

"Heavens, I have slept!" I exclaimed at last; "and Dora waiting for me, perhaps. Why, in perdition's name, did you make me drink?"

"You must have the weakest head in Christendom, child, if three glasses of French wine can muddle it. Come, the reckoning is paid, and a long one, for that Irishman drinks like a fish; we can settle that between us by-and-by. Allons!"

He slipped his arm through mine, and led me from the house. The feeble street-lamps swam before my eyes, and I could hardly have walked without my companion's support. Not far from the tavern we found a hackney-coach that had just brought a family-party from the theatre, and this carried us at a good pace to Ranelagh, before the doors of which pleasure-place we alighted.

Here all was confusion and riot—torches blazing, chairmen bawling, footmen squabbling, ducal chariots stopping the way, and a crowd of finely-dressed people going in and out of the lighted doors.

My companion held me tightly by the arm, and it was as much as we could do to keep our places in the crowd. Standing thus, hustled and pushed on every side, we waited for a time that seemed to me very long, but no black-robed mask approached us. Maskers in red, and blue, and yellow, Great Moguls and Turkish princesses, shepherds and shepherdesses, sailors, sultans, chimney-sweepers, harlequins, Punchinellos, Sir John Falstaffs and Abel Druggers, passed and pushed us, but she for whom I waited with throbbing heart and burning brain did not appear.

At last I felt myself tapped on the shoulder by some one among the crowd behind us, and turning, found myself face to face with two women in black dominoes and masks. One removed her mask instantly, and I recognized Mademoiselle Adolphe.

"Get us to a coach as quick as you can, Mr. Robert," she entreated, hurriedly; "my young lady is like to swoon herself. Oh, but I pray you to sustain yourself, mademoiselle! The coach is all near, and monsieur will lead us there. Lean you on his arm, mademoiselle, and on me. And you will tell the coachman where to drive, and follow us in another coach, is it not, monsieur? Ah, what of dangers, what of hazards, we have run to encounter you! Monsieur Lestrangle is yonder in waiting for mademoiselle, who has gone away with her aunt to the cloak-room; and Milady Barbara goes to monsieur to say that mademoiselle is too ill to return to the dance. Word of honor, it is a pretty comedy!" and chattering thus, the French maid hurried and hustled us to the door of a coach, into which she pushed her timid companion, who did indeed seem half-fainting.

I pressed the poor little trembling hand, which clung convulsively to mine.

"Shall I not come with you, Dora?" I asked. "Great Heaven, no!" the French girl shrieked, almost hysterically; "and if one pursues us, and Monsieur Lestrage came to overtake us—the beautiful affair! Go you into the other coach, monsieur, with your friend, and tell to our coachman to follow yours. Go, then. Is there the time to lose in follies?" cried Adolphe, as I kissed the little hand that still clung to mine, alas! with but too natural fear.

Philip Hay pulled me from the carriage-door, directed the man where to drive, and thrust me into our coach before I had time to remonstrate.

"Drive like ten thousand devils!" he shouted to our Jarvey, who, no doubt used to such clandestine errands and the double or treble pay attendant on them, whipped his jaded horses into a gallop, and in another minute we were tearing, rattling, jolting eastward at a pace that shook every bone in our bodies, and precluded any attempt at conversation.

I looked out of the window several times on the journey, to satisfy myself that the other coach was following. I think we could scarce have left Ranelagh an hour and a half when we pulled up in a wretched dirty lane, before the dreary entrance of a tavern, whose dinginess was but just made visible by an oil-lamp hanging over the threshold.

"Is this the house?" I asked, with a shudder. "What a horrid place!"

"Zounds, Bob! what a fool thou art! Does it matter by what gate a man goes to heaven? Quick, man! here are the ladies; there is no time for dawdling. My parson will be drunk or asleep if we're not quick; 'tis an hour after our time. This way, mademoiselle; support your mistress. The stairs are somewhat rotten, and might be cleaner. The chapel is an ugly one, miss; but this dirty stair is like Jacob's ladder, for here are seen angels ascending and descending. Come, Bob."

He opened a door and ushered us into a chamber lighted with two tallow-candles in brass candlesticks. These stood on a table covered with a dirty cloth, and surmounted by a greasy, dilapidated-looking prayer-book, upon the cover of which, in tarnished gilding, appeared the arms of one of the colleges. A man, dressed in a grimy surplice, and with a red cotton handkerchief tied round his head in lieu of a wig, was nodding half-asleep over an empty bottle; but he was broad awake in a moment at our entrance, saluted us briskly, clapped himself behind the table, opened his book, and began to gabble the marriage-service, as if for a wager.

The irreverence of the whole affair shocked me inexpressibly. Was this, save one, the most solemn of all ceremonials, to be thus rattled over by a drunkard?

"Stop, Sir!" I cried; "let the lady at least remove her mask."

"Mais tu es bête!" roared Philip Hay. "Veux-tu que tout le monde s'aurait demain ce que se fait ici ce soir?" The lady will keep her mask; 'tis the custom with people of her rank. Go on, parson, and let us have none of your clippings of the service. This is a bona fide marriage, remember; but you'll be paid as well as if we wanted to play fast and loose by-and-by."

I took the little hand in mine. It trembled no longer, but was now icy cold. The parson rattled on with the service. Mr. Hay stood grinning at us, with his arms skimbo and his hat on. The bride's responses were given in a faint murmur that was almost a sob. The ring was slipped upon the slender finger, and the ceremonial being concluded, a greasy book was produced, in which I signed my name, and the bride after me. As she took the pen Mr. Hay gave a loud huzzah, which withdrew my attention from the register. It seemed the signal for a fresh arrival. The door of an inner room opened, and a gentleman entered, who took off his hat and saluted me with a bow of mock ceremony. This new-comer was Everard Lestrage. His ironical courtesy, and the sardonic grin upon his hated face, told me that I was undone. Till this moment my brain had been dazed and muddled by the stuff that had been mixed with my drink; but my enemy's presence sobered me.

"Let me be first to salute the bride!" exclaimed my lady's step-son. "You may remove your mask now, Mistress Ainsleigh, and let your husband imprint a hymeneal kiss upon the prettiest lips in Christendom."

She—my wife, bound to me irrevocably by the ceremonial—just gabbled over by a half-drunken parson—took her mask from her face, and looked at me pleadingly, piteously, tenderly, with her soft brown eyes.

It was my foster-sister, Margery Hawker!

HARMONY OF DRESS.

FOR a harmonious toilette three things should be consulted—personal appearance, character, and circumstances. First,

Personal Appearance.—On the simple principle that harmony is in itself better than discord, and beauty better than ugliness, I should wish to see every dress adapted, as perfectly as can conveniently be done, to the coloring, the shape, and the size of the wearer. Words are so inadequate to describe color that it is scarcely possible to lay down any rules about the becomingness of particular colors to particular complexions. Every thing depends upon variations of tint too slight to be translated into language. The great thing, therefore, to be impressed upon the students under this head will be that they must choose their colors by the eye, and by that alone, never allowing themselves to act upon any theory without constant reference to it. Some of the most unusual, and, so to speak, unrecognized combinations are, in skillful hands, the most beautiful. But then the hands must be really skillful, and it is perhaps more dangerous to recommend than to forbid such combinations. One common notion, however, I must protest against, viz., that two different tints of the same nominal color—for instance, turquoise and French blue—should never be combined. All the most brilliant effects, not only of nature, but of Oriental coloring, are produced by such subtle combinations, or rather gradations of color; but the more subtle and lovely the more difficult they are to manage, and the more carefully the quantity, as well as the exact quality of each tint, must be chosen. The different effect of the same colors in different materials is very remarkable, and should be carefully pointed out to students. It is perhaps safe to say, as a general rule (but not without exceptions), that delicate colors (such as lavender, dove color, sea-green, pale blue, etc.) require fine materials. They not only soon fade and get spoiled in common or rough materials; but even when new such colors are apt to look washy and unsatisfactory in coarse stuffs—their beauty often depends upon a sort of bloom which is to be seen only in silk or other fine textures. The principal combination of color will, in some cases, be between the dress on the one hand, and the coloring of the wearer on the other; while in other cases the coloring of the wearer is so neutral or insignificant that the whole interest of the effect, in point of color, must be obtained by combinations between the different parts of the dress itself. In every case, however, it is important to take care that the dress shall not overpower the wearer, either in color or any other respect.

In adapting the dress to the shape and size of the wearer a certain knowledge of drawing and of the proper proportions of the figure is of course the chief help. There are, however, a few well-ascertained rules which may safely be taught. One, for instance, is that transverse shapes generally tend to lessen height and increase breadth, while longitudinal forms have the opposite effect. Another well-known rule (which I believe is easily explained by a reference to optical science) is the tendency of light colors to increase apparent size, and vice versa. People of more than average size should be cautious about wearing white or very light colors for this reason, although it must always be remembered that proportion and color impress the eye so much more sensibly than mere scale that this rule is a very subordinate one, and only to be applied after those more important subjects have been thoroughly considered. It should, however, be remembered that more than average size necessarily involves a certain degree of conspicuousness, which makes any peculiarity of dress doubly undesirable in such cases. A small person may wear with impunity both colors and shapes which would be inexcusably striking on a large figure. Nothing goes so far to redeem unusual size as complete repose both in form and color. Much trimming, loose ends and streamers, frills and furbelows, and caprices of all kinds, are apt to become intolerable when magnified, while on a small scale they may please, by a certain fluttering airiness which is in keeping with the impression of a tiny creature. But here also proportion may almost reverse the effect of scale. A short, heavy figure may even more imperatively need quietness in dress than one of twice its actual volume which has run up into slenderness. And this naturally leads me to the second respect in which dress should be adapted to the wearer, namely, character; which, indeed, is scarcely separable from the form on which it is impressed, and according to which such questions as the last should mainly be decided.

Character.—It is as hard to draw the line between person and dress as between mind and matter, and there is, perhaps, no form of matter into which, and by which, mind can infuse a more subtle and incalculably radiating influence than it does by and into dress. Dress which is not informed and animated by individual character is to that which truly expresses the mind of the wearer what a dead body is to a living one. This life of dress, individuality, is, perhaps, not quite extinct in any one, being to some extent independent of the will, but all its vigor depends upon the degree in which dress is the result of the real working of the wearer's own mind. It is therefore generally seen in the greatest perfection in the dress of women who are neither very rich nor very poor. Like animal life, it depends for its health upon a due balance of restraint and abundance: wealth overlays it, and poverty cramps it. A woman who has no need to think of the price of her clothes, must have a singularly strong, natural tendency to the use of dress as a means of self-expression, if she does not leave a good deal of the arrangement of her toilette to her maid and her dress-maker, merely to save herself trouble; and the succession of the articles of which her wardrobe is composed is so rapid as to make each one worth much less thought to her than it would be to a woman who expected to spend a longer time within it: and, on the other hand, it is a task beyond ordinary powers to express one's mind fully within the limits of a very narrow purse. On this subject, therefore, great allowances must be made for individual difficulties, and great credit should be given for any clear indication of real inventive power or even of real thought and adaptation. The best advice which can be given to students on this head is that they should never set aside any instinctive preference of their own in regard to particular shapes and colors, unless for a definite assignable reason. As in the choice of wholesome food, inclination is to a person in good health a better guide than any rules of diet, so, in dress, a woman who has a genuine instinctive preference for any particular color will generally be safe in indulging in the absence of any distinct reason to the contrary; and though, no doubt, the free play of individual tastes would at first give rise to a fresh crop of mistakes, yet those very blunders have in them an element of life and progress which is utterly absent in the dull uniformity of merely imitative dress. There is a broad distinction between mistakes prompted by real pleasure in color, even if uncultivated, and those which are the results of a desire to attract attention, or of mere carelessness; and we ought to beware lest in our desire to discourage vulgarity we crush the germs of growth by too unrelenting a spirit of criticism. As to the manner of indicating character, that will no doubt be as various as character itself; but some general correspondences might be pointed out, as, for instance, that between gravity of temperament and quietness of coloring; and the distinction between the quietness of severity, which, in dress, means cold and hard colors, such as steel-gray, black, dark brown, and the quietness of simplicity, represented by the use of primary or very delicate colors—for instance, pure blue, white, or clear soft gray, and the quietness of a balanced and self-controlled character, which seems to me to indicate the fitness of deep, full colors, such as violet, deep blue, maroon, or crimson. But any colors may be either quiet or the contrary, according to their quantity and treatment, especially as to trimming. Perhaps the chief point to be observed for obtaining quietness of coloring, is that the trimming should be either of the same color as the dress (a difference in shade, great enough to be perceptibly intentional and yet not sufficient to produce an actual contrast, is perhaps the best calculated to give a subdued effect to the whole), or else in sufficient quantity, and sufficiently mixed ("united," as painters say) with the color of the ground, to be almost confounded with it, as is best seen in the case of lace; or else in such a very small quantity as to escape observation, merely producing a sense of finish, and perhaps a slight glow or shade, the cause of which must be sought for to be perceived. But quietness, though it is one of the safest and most inexhaustibly charming characteristics which can belong to dress, is not the only quality which we should wish to see expressed by it. Delicacy, freshness, simplicity, liveliness, elaborateness, sternness, dignity, caprice, cheerfulness, gloom, evenness, or variability of temperament—all these and countless other varieties of character and disposition have their appropriate influence on dress—and no toilette is fairly entitled to the praise of individuality which does not distinctly reflect some such quality really characteristic of the wearer.

Circumstances.—That dress should be adapted to the circumstances of the wearer is a sufficiently obvious, not to say trite remark, but it is not only constantly disregarded in practice, but also very insufficiently developed in theory. The wearer's circumstances may be considered under the heads of age, rank, and domestic relations. Black, white, and gray are the only tints which seem thoroughly appropriate to the very latest period of life; and there can not be much difficulty in arranging these. Besides this process of simplification, the traditions of the wearer's life can hardly fail to have supplied some characteristic and becoming types; and a slight adherence to these, in disregard of the progress of fashion, gives at once a graceful touch of quaintness to the costume of an old lady which has a special charm for younger generations.

Perhaps a more discouraging period to deal with is that vaguely called "elderly;" when the obvious beauty of youth has not yet been replaced by the picturesqueness, the cultivated significance, or the pathos of old age. Yet even at this age there is a difference, and an important difference, between a well-dressed and an ill-dressed woman; and the importance of the art of dress may surely quite as reasonably be supposed to vary in a direct, as in an inverse proportion to the difficulty of the problem. That the difficulty of the problem does increase somewhere about the middle period of life, I fully admit. But that very difficulty affords the greatest scope for skill in the choice of those delicate gradations by which a woman may adapt her costume to her years; and the wisdom of such a well-considered and carefully executed adaptation to the facts of the case, instead of any attempt to disguise or ignore them, is evident on the grounds both of morality and policy. If it were only for the sake of the perpetuation of interest which results from the necessity of continual adaptation to a changing position, it would be worth while to recognize the lapse of time; and it is, of course, unnecessary to point out how essential to the moral propriety and dignity of a woman's appearance it is that her dress should be suitable to her age. The general tendency of the alteration of style suitable to middle age is toward elaborateness in trimming and appointments and richness of materials. Complicated and intricate patterns and trimmings seem to shadow forth the complexity and intricacy which is the distinguishing characteristic of the middle period of life. They also, if well arranged, bear witness to the gradually increasing mastery in the art which has been acquired since the early days, when to plan a simple white dress was enough for the beginner; while, later in life, any such elaborate arrangements would become burdensome or lifeless, and a return to some degree of simplicity naturally accompanies the gradual withdrawal from the multifarious activities of middle life. The richness of material, however, which becomes especially suitable when the first youth is passed, need never be laid aside, and indeed seems, in a sense, especially appropriate to those who are no longer exposed to the wear and tear of the busiest years of existence.

Dress also has to be, in some respects, adapted to the social position of the wearer; and on this subject it is very difficult to lay down any very well-defined rules. For there is no saying beforehand what social position any individual may assign to herself; nor is it easy to say exactly what, in the way of dress, is due to any particular assignable rank; still less how the rival claims of rank and wealth ought to be adjusted. But some general principles may be laid down with confidence. One is, that no everyday costume (i. e., no costume which is not avowedly planned with a view to some special festivity) should be such as to be manifestly unsuitable to any company in which the wearer is liable to find herself. Black silk and white muslin are the typical representatives of the kind of gowns which can hardly be unsuitable in any company. The important truth is, that the thing which really gives an impression of refinement and good-breeding is not the particular pitch of dress chosen, but the degree in which that pitch, be it what it may, is sustained by perfect finish and "keeping" in every detail. It is obvious that the higher the style aimed at the more difficult and expensive it will be to carry it out in this sustained manner, and therefore the most really refined women in each class will generally be those who pitch their dress lowest for that class—they having the highest standard of completeness, and the keenest sense of its necessity.

Under the head of domestic relations come all such questions as those respecting the appropriate distinctions between the dress of young ladies before and after their entrance into society, between that of married and unmarried women, and questions respecting mourning and the use of costumes generally. I think that, as a general rule, the more significant dress can be made the better; and I would therefore encourage every attempt to indicate the circumstances of the wearer by appropriate diversities of style. But any sort of costume depends for all its effect upon common consent.

THE MISERY OF GREAT AFFECTION.

WHEN we have a great affection or a great veneration for any person we are too apt to idealize that person, and to think that we stand, for the time, face to face with perfection. A fond mother can not see any defects in her child, which other people consider pert and disagreeable. Now, to sustain an idealization for any length of time, we must not be too familiar with the subject of it. If, in this case, too much familiarity does not actually breed contempt, it is an effectual shatterer of idols.

It is the old doctrine that a man can not be a hero to his valet, and it applies to all conditions of life, and very much to marriage. We are never fully appreciated by our friends till we are separated from them. "Distance decidedly lends enchantment to the view." Before marriage every thing is looked at through a glass of couleur de rose; but after the first flush of sentiment has passed away, and the two people begin to settle down into everyday life, the imperfections of human nature begin gradually to peep out, shaking our faith, if not altogether disappointing us in our idol.

However fond of each other two people may be, it is possible to see too much of each other. Though they may utter all sorts of protestations, it may be doubted whether a bride and bridegroom are really sorry when the honey-moon is over. As Adam says to Eve:

"Solitude is sometimes best society,
And short retirement urges sweet return."

Corydon and Phillis may think a rural dwelling a little Paradise—that they will never want any thing but their own company to make them happy; but, somehow or other, if they have not many acquaintances in their neighborhood, or if their house is situated some distance from town, they will find that, after a month or two, the time begins to pass very slowly and with great monotony; and the more so if either of them has been accustomed to much society before their marriage.

Disappointment therefore is nearly always an attendant on great affection, and often it brings real unhappiness and sorrow with it. There is also another source of unhappiness in intense affection; and that is, that very great love is closely allied to very great jealousy. Even in ordinary friendships we are always sensitive to appearances of forgetfulness on the part of our friends; we do not like to be superseded in the affections of any one. This jealousy is naturally intensified when the cause of it receives all our greatest possible love. It was the very greatness of his love that made Othello torture himself to find out the infidelity of Desdemona. It may then be asked, "If disappointment be an attendant on love, how is it that the social world, on the whole, is contented and happy?" The answer shall be given in the words of a noble novelist: "Few of either sex are ever united to their first loves, yet married people jog on and call each other 'my dear,' and 'my darling,' all the same." These terms of endearment are more the result of habit than affection, and are used to make life "jog on" somewhat smoothly. The greatest number of marriages are not made solely for love—on one side or the other interest, whether in the shape of money, position, title, or convenience, will be found to be mixed up with them. The tastes of the two people most likely agree. But the husband does not expect perfection in his wife, and consequently is not disappointed in not finding it. He does not think her invested with the beauty of Venus, or the wisdom of Minerva; and, being fond of his comfort and peace of mind, would not go out of his way, as Othello did, to prove her unfaithful. She is not tortured with jealousy if she prefers to dance or talk with other people; and, if no very great disagreements arise, their lives pass very happily together—running smoothly on, unexposed by the distresses and annoyances which have their origin in the too great affection of those who "love not wisely but too well."

Jabot of Lace and Satin Ribbon.

THIS jabot is made of a piece of Valenciennes lace twenty-eight inches long and an inch and a half wide, arranged on a small tulle foundation, and ornamented with bows of red satin ribbon an inch wide. In arranging the jabot on the bodice turn down the upper edge at about half the width of the lace as shown by Fig. 1, and arrange a narrow piece of similar lace in the neck of the dress as a standing collar. If it be desired to wear the jabot as a cap, set two long strings of satin ribbon on the sides, and wear it on the head as shown by Fig. 2. For making the jabot gather the lace with wickel or over stitch, cut from Fig. 19, Supplement, the foundation of tulle, hem the outer edges and sew on the lace. Begin at ; on Fig. 19, and sew the lace on the edge, following the direction of the arrow as far as × on Fig. 19, after which lay the lace so that the scalloped edge points downward. Next arrange the upper part in an oblong rosette, and again proceed to the point marked ×. From × to *, where the end of the lace must reach, sew it to the foundation under the upper row of lace. The ends are easily hidden under the overlapping lace. Arrange the bows in the manner shown by the illustrations.

Nilsson Hat.

Two long black ostrich feathers, a tuft of violets, and a few sprigs of mignonette form the tasteful and stylish trimming of this hat, the foundation of which is made of black foundation lace and figured tulle. An illustration, page 788, shows the foundation of the hat in reduced size. Cut of foundation lace, from Fig. 47,

Supplement, one piece, cover this with gathered tulle, and bind the foundation with a strip of black silk an inch and a half wide, in which a layer of stiffening has been placed. Lay a wire on both sides of the binding. Bend the foundation into the desired shape and trim with feathers and flowers as shown by the illustration. A sash of the tulle edged with lace may take the place of the feathers. A second illustration shows the hat trimmed in this manner.

Silk Brush.

See illustrations on page 793.

THIS brush is both useful and pretty. It is pointed at both ends, and therefore especially suitable for brushing the dust out of the folds of silk dresses. The brush consists of four pieces of red baize, of graduated size, which are fastened one on the other. On the top of these is a piece of black cloth, and on this is set a small piece of white cloth in application worked in point russe embroidery with silk of different bright colors. The handle is formed of a piece of white cloth embroidered in application over black cloth. For making the brush, cut first of red baize the under longest piece eight inches long and three inches wide, and point the ends in the manner shown by the pattern; after which cut three other pieces, each a trifle smaller than the preceding. Work the edges of these pieces with black worsted, and fasten them together at the ends. Next prepare a piece of black cloth of the same size as the upper piece of baize, and a small piece of white cloth for the centre, and embroider from the design, half of which is given in Fig. 48 of the JACKET FOR GIRL FROM 9 TO 11 YEARS OLD.

Supplement. The middle sheaf-like part is worked in single chain stitch with coarse violet silk twist, while the stems are worked with fine brown silk in herring-bone and half-polka stitch. The scallops on the outer edge are worked in long button-hole stitches of red and shorter ones of blue silk. The plain lines which lie within the scallops are worked of green and white silk in chain and button-hole stitch. Fig. 2, which gives a full-sized section of the handle, more distinctly shows the manner of working the stitches. Having arranged the embroidered white cloth on the black cloth, edge it with a row in half-polka stitch, and one in button-hole stitch, line the black cloth with pasteboard, and fasten it to the pieces of baize, sewing in the handle at the same time.

Border for Java Canvas Tidy.

See illustrations on page 793.

THIS border is worked in point russe and cross stitch with filoselle and sewing silk. The colors may be chosen to suit the taste, but it is prettier when both kinds of silk correspond in color. Zephyr worsted may be used instead of the filoselle silk.

TIME AND PLACE FOR DRESS.

Time.—There is a vague code, which ought to be better defined, regulating the articles appropriate to morning, afternoon, and evening dress. The morning, of course, should be distinguished by freshness and simplicity; the evening by splendor. It may be almost an unreasonable demand in connection with most ladies, but the sentiment of morning attire appears to me to require that it should, at least in some remote degree, suggest a working dress. For this, as well as for the sake of freshness, as large a proportion as possible of it should consist of what are rather ungrammatically called "washing materials;" and it should at least look as if that part of it were washed every day. In summer, cottons and muslins make it easy to carry this out approximately; in winter, the sentiment must be represented by the collar and sleeves. Some kinds of lace are more or less, and should be stringently, set apart for evening, and some for morning use. But there is room for a good deal more definition in this branch of the subject. One anomaly calls for a passing remark—it is, that the distinction between morning and evening lace is so little regarded in bonnets, probably because they are not considered as meant to be washed. But in their present beautifully simple form what would be prettier or more easily managed than morning bonnets made of muslin and Valenciennes lace, and washed as often as their freshness was in the slightest degree impaired? And how much more ladylike such clean and simple head-dresses would be than the tulle and blonde constructions now too often worn at all hours of the day! The sentiment of evening costume is, I suppose, that it is improvised for the one occasion on which it is worn; and, therefore, no degree of flimsiness or fragility in the materials can offend one's taste, whatever one may think of them in point of economy. The afternoon is a compromise between morning and evening which it is hard to treat philosophically. To dress three times a day seems scarcely worthy of a rational creature, and this is indeed theoretically recognized by the technical use of the word "morning dress" for every thing worn before dinner. It would be well if practice were more nearly in accordance with theory in this particular.

The time of year need be noticed only as still further complicating the problem of dress for those who have to think much of expense. It is easy enough to adapt one's clothing to the temperature, if one can afford it. I may mention, however, that some regard is due to other people's eyes as well as one's feelings, that dress should look cool in summer and warm in winter, even if the wearer should be abnormally indifferent to the sensations of heat and cold. Also, when artificial flowers are worn, it is essential that they should be such as are really in season, at least in green-houses. Under the head of time we have also to consider the question of repetition. It is not only in buying new articles of dress that thought is needed, but in the daily selection of such as shall be worn together, so as to secure enough and not too much variation from day to day. Abrupt changes of the whole costume, or perfectly uniform repetitions of the same arrangement on successive days, seem to me almost equally undesirable. The most perfect arrangement, I think, is a combination of continuousness with variety by means of alterations of detail, while the foundation remains the same; and when that is changed the transition may be rendered less abrupt by the reappearance of some familiar ornament, redeeming the new attire from strangeness. Rapid and total changes of dress destroy the web of pleasing associations which time weaves round clothes as well as round other inanimate objects.

In the consideration of place the distinction between town and country corresponds in some degree to that between morning and evening. In the country there is always a charm in what suggests rural occupations even when it is manifestly only a suggestion. A lady's outdoor dress in the country should always be one in which, if she did milk a cow or make hay, she would be picturesquely and becomingly, even if really unsuitably, dressed for the occasion. Tried by this test, silk and black lace and all sorts of gauzy materials would be condemned, and, I think, rightly, as unsuitable to the country. For the sea-side a similar test might be founded upon the possibility of carrying any given costume into a boat. This test would be even more exclusive than the last; and should perhaps be less rigorously applied, though it ought never to be quite lost sight of. Some regard may be had, when it is possible, to the probable surroundings in respect of furniture, etc.; and furniture might be chosen more than is now done with a view to its relations with the dress of its owners; but it is impossible to insist very strictly upon attention to such varying combinations as these.

FELICIA.

By SHIRLEY DARE.

Ah, the scarlet vine leaves! Ah, the sparkling sea!
 Ah, the hazy afternoon my lady smiled on me!
 The white steps to the foam,
 The boatman steering home,
 Her dress that swept the stair,
 And sunshine-blended hair,
 Like the fluting cadence of forgotten measure,
 Such days to me bring the sweetest, saddest pleasure.

Ah, the eyelids tender! Ah, the bearing proud!
 Singing voice and subtle meanings half allowed,
 That thrilled me as they went,
 Like chance-struck instrument,
 Ah, to my dying day
 That voice and speech always
 Bring that flushing autumn's overflow of glory,
 When I took life's rapture—one day's passion story!

Queen of sun-haired women, jewel-eyed and gay,
 Promise filled your sweetness, you had no heart to pay.
 But one day's grace to me
 You left in memory
 That binds me evermore,
 Content, your servitor

All that women woo by, slighted turns for aye,
 Since I keep thy sweetness, thy smile, Felicia.

PRINCE PAUL.

WHEN Prince Paul was twenty-one his tutor said to him:

"Your Royal Highness is of age. You know every thing that a man can teach you. You have now only to govern your kingdom as gloriously as the king your father; and so, your Royal Highness, if it is quite convenient, could you pay me that twenty shillings that your Royal Highness owes me for your last month's instruction?"

Now, the first sentence in this speech was true. Prince Paul was certainly twenty-one. The second was such a prodigious falsehood as could not be uttered without laughing, except to a prince; for Paul had learned no more than he liked; and that was little enough. The third sentence was a compliment, which I must explain to you.

In the days of Prince Paul's father the court etiquette was so strict that if you once forgot to address the king as the most powerful and glorious of monarchs, off went your head. But one day it happened that all the king's generals lost all the battles that they were fighting, by sea and land, and that Paul's father had no longer a kingdom.

Here was a predicament. Somebody, of course, should tell the king that he was no longer the most powerful and glorious of monarchs; but nobody was quite willing to lose his head; consequently nobody told the king. The king pretended not to know that any thing particular had happened; consequently the court etiquette went on as before, and his courtiers still addressed him as the most powerful and glorious of monarchs. Having no subjects to give him any money, the king became very poor. He got out at elbows, and out at the knees, and the court seamstress was obliged to patch him; but the courtiers only said, "that no cloths were made nowadays fit for the wearing of a king;" and so the most powerful and glorious of monarchs preferred his old clothes. By-and-by, they could no longer pay the butcher's bill, and were obliged to live on vegetables raised by the court gardener; but then it became the fashion to say that there was no longer any good mutton and beef to be bought in that country, as there was in the good old times. One after another, the courtiers went away to find better living; but those who remained always spoke of them as absent on business for the king. The palace fell into decay; the bricks mouldered; the pavements were broken; half the lights in the windows were out; the roofs leaked; but the poor old king, and his poor old servants, only said that there was much more rain, and wind, and cold weather, than in the good old times; and though Prince Paul wore copper toes on his shoes, and only owned one suit of clothes, it was the fashion to say to him that he would soon be a glorious monarch. And now you see why his tutor paid him this compliment.

But that last sentence, about the twenty shillings! Let us see what they did about that; for Prince Paul had not twenty shillings in the world.

The Prince sat down and wrote an order on the treasury for twenty shillings. The tutor took the order, and went away to the treasurer's office, but found nothing there but damp cobwebs and an old owl; and came back in a rage.

"There is no treasurer but an owl, and nothing in the treasury, and you are as poor as a mouse in an empty barn," he said to the Prince. Prince Paul looked sternly at his servants.

"Is there no treasurer?"

"No, your Royal Highness," said they, trembling.

"Am I as poor as a mouse in an empty barn?"

"Yes, your Royal Highness," said they all again.

"Then something must be done," observed the Prince, and went away to think what this something should be.

But he could not think of any thing; which vexed him so that he would not eat his supper.

"How can I eat," said he, "when I can not think what should be done?"

"But why should your Royal Highness disturb yourself with trying to think," answered his servants, "when every thing that is worth knowing was written down in books, in the good old times, to save the trouble of thinking hereafter?"

"Why did you not tell me before?" said the Prince. "Bring me all the books in my father's library."

But when the books were brought they were covered with mould and eaten by worms, so that of them all there were only three or four that could be read.

But no books in the world could have been more proper just then, for these all were filled with stories of princes, who met with a variety of surprising adventures; but Prince Paul observed that one thing happened to them all.

They all went to seek a fortune.

"There," said Paul. "Here is what I should do. I must go seek my fortune."

Paul spoke to the Lord High Fiddlestick, and there was nobody else in the room. At least we should say that there was nobody. But the Prince's dog lay by the hearth, and, being a dog of intelligence, he not only comprehended but thought of the proposed journey so much that he could not eat.

"What are you thinking about to leave your dinner?" asked the cat, Grimalkin.

"The Prince is going to seek his fortune, and I am wondering if there will be any meat fit for our eating in the strange countries that we shall visit," answered Fido.

"Oh, meow!" snarled the cat, who was a jealous body, and hurried away lest she should hear more. But she could not forget what the dog had said, and though she laid down to bask in the sun as usual she turned and twisted so uncomfortably that Topknot, the speckled hen, asked her what was the matter.

"I have a colic, from pure grief," replied Grimalkin. "Here is this blundering mastiff going with our master to visit foreign lands where they have meat, while I shall be left behind to lap milk."

"Then," said Topknot, much delighted, "the black Spanish hen in the next yard need not toss her head so high. We shall have some one who can speak of foreign countries also," and she ran to tell the news.

"I don't believe a word of it," answered the black Spanish hen.

"What is that you are saying?" asked a chip-ping bird, who had lighted to pick up crumbs.

"My master, Prince Paul, is going to seek his fortune," returned Topknot, proudly.

"Really I thought that was quite out of fashion," answered Chippy, flying away to the forest; but she was so busy with thinking that she flew by mistake into the owl's nest instead of her own.

"Odds! nightmares! madam! What do you mean?" hooted the owl, waking up in a fine passion. "You have waked me from a delightful dream, in which I was just solving the problem of catching three mice at one snap. I have a mind to eat you."

"I beg your pardon," said Chippy, humbly; "but I was thinking so much that I was not thinking—I mean, if you please, Sir, that I have just heard that Prince Paul is going to seek his fortune."

"What!" and the owl opened his eyes so wide that Chippy tumbled back out of his nest in a fright, supposing that he would really eat her.

The owl was wide awake now.

"Did you hear that?" he asked the pines. "Prince Paul is going to seek his fortune."

Now telling news to the pines is very much like publishing it in the newspapers, and it was not long before Prince Paul's intention was known in fairy-land, where it made more stir than you may think; for whereas in the old times the fairy people were positively overworked, what with finding invisible cloaks and traveling-shoes, and turning stupid and wicked folks into cabbages and clocks, they have had nothing to do for the last hundred years or so but to sleep and gape, so that when they heard the news it was as if you had told fifty boatmen that one passenger was coming. The brook-goblin, who was so tired of the slop, slop, drip, drip of his waterfall that he had not visited his own brook for a year, started off for it at once, as he knew that Prince Paul would pass that way. The fairy with the enchanted sword, hearing the tumult, was ready to pinch every body for not telling her sooner. The queen of the fairies, who was snoring when the news came, boxed all their ears, and seizing her knitting-needles, hurried off on foot lest she should be too late; and every fairy who could find a wishing-ring, or an invisible cloak, or a truth-telling cap, seized it and hurried after her.

So here were half the fairies in fairy-land, ready and anxious to make Prince Paul's fortune for him. If he had only known it!

But he did not know it. He only went to the forest because all the princes of whom he had read struck at once into the nearest forest, and he had not the least idea what to do when he got there. However, he walked slowly, and looked around him on all sides to see if he could spy any thing like a fortune, till he heard a heavy, droning sound and saw a mill whose wheel was turned by the brook.

"I never saw that before," thought the Prince, and it would have been strange if he had, for it was built there an hour before by the brook-goblin; but it looked just such an old-fashioned, red-painted mill as you may see still in the country, with moss growing on the roof, and the miller standing in the door.

This was the brook-goblin; but he seemed to Prince Paul like a fat, rosy man covered with flour.

"Where are you going?" asked the miller.

"To find my fortune," replied the Prince, haughtily, for he thought the miller too familiar.

"Then you have found it," answered the miller. "I am in want of a hearty young man like you. Stay and help me grind, and half of the profits shall be yours."

Here was a fine offer, you see; very different from what the goblin would have said a hundred years ago, when he would have told the young man in a rough voice that he could have bread and a bed if he chose to work for it. But in these days fairy customers are scarce, and to make sure of Paul, the goblin had even arranged that at the first turn of the wheel all the corn should be turned into gold, and should come tumbling down through the trough in eagles and gold dollars.

Unfortunately Prince Paul knew nothing about this, and he walked on as if he had not heard the miller.

"Stop!" shouted the goblin. "Here is your fortune."

"You are mistaken. It can never be the fortune of a prince to turn miller's man," replied Paul with dignity, and walked on.

The fairies hidden under the leaves began to titter. As for the goblin, in his anger, he pitched the mill into the brook.

At the crash Paul looked around, and seeing the mill tumbling over the waterfall,

"Ah, I was right!" said he. "If I had listened to that impertinent miller I should have drowned. This proves that I have excellent judgment;" and he held his head higher than ever.

Before long he spied a shop, or rather a booth with a counter, behind which sat the fairy who had the enchanted sword, looking like an apple-cheeked old woman.

"Now," she said to herself, as she saw Paul coming, "we shall see if I let him slip through my fingers. I have not muddled my brains with tumbling over rocks and stones, like the stupid goblin. I say, young man, where are you going?"

"To seek my fortune," returned the Prince, haughtily, as before.

If he had answered her like that a hundred years before our fairy would have turned him into a puppy on the spot; but now she said, in a wheedling tone,

"If you are going to seek your fortune, my lord, you will need a sword; and here is one, with a hilt of gold, which you may buy for a sixpence."

"No," answered the Prince, stoutly, for though he saw that the sword was a fine one, and that the golden hilt was set with diamonds, he said to himself:

"It is stolen. No doubt she is afraid of the police, and would like that they should find the sword on me. But I thank my stars that I am not such a fool!"

"Buy a pair of boots, then," urged the fairy.

"I see your shoes are old and worn, and you can buy these for a shilling. You see how finely these are made. In them you could feel neither cold nor wet! Besides—"

She was about to say that these were seven-league boots, but she stopped; for fairies are forbidden to explain their gifts. Mortals must take them at a venture.

"No," answered the Prince, still more shortly, "I have read the newspapers, and I am not to be caught."

"My stars!" cried the fairy, staring after him. "He has refused the Enchanted Sword and the Seven-League Boots, for which five hundred princes have lost their lives."

Oh, how the vines and leaves in the forest shook! The elves came out of their flower-cups, to roll on the turf as they laughed, and the brook roared; but Paul heard nothing. He only thought that the wind was high, and that the brook was very noisy, and walked on, wondering whether he should find his fortune, and how he should know it.

All this time the fairy queen was waiting for Paul, knitting as she sat, by the side of the road; and Paul was so astonished to see her there that he asked her what she was doing.

"Knitting houses, and men, and castles," replied the queen. "How many will you have? I will knit you a hundred men, on horseback, in fifteen minutes; six strong castles in half an hour; and a coach-and-four to carry you to court. Will you have them?"

"What nonsense you talk," answered Paul.

The old woman's fingers flew like lightning, and before Paul could count twenty a handsome coach with four white horses dropped from her needles.

"You are a witch!" screamed Paul, and ran for his life.

It was nearly dark, and in his fright Paul plunged into a swamp. Sometimes he sank to his knees in the thick, stiff mud, and sometimes he was caught and horribly scratched among the brambles as he struggled to find his way out.

Just then he saw a light.

"Ah!" he said to himself, "there I shall find a house," and he hurried toward it.

But though he ran he came no nearer, for the light moved also.

"Hillo!" shouted Paul, but nobody answered; only the light quivered and danced about, and at last came close to him and settled in a tree.

"Oh!" said Paul to himself, "I understand, this is my fortune. It will lead me to some kind fairy, or to some princess who is waiting for me in her castle. I will follow it."

So he did. Deeper and deeper into the swamp. The mud was so stiff that he could hardly force his way through it, and the thorns tore his clothes until they hung in rags, but he persevered.

Suddenly he gasped and screamed.

He had stepped from a high ledge of rocks, and he fell with such violence that he broke his leg, and lay quite helpless till an old woman found him and dragged him into her cottage.

"This is a rough way of coming into my fortune," thought Paul; "but very likely this old woman may be some lovely princess, who has been enchanted. She will ask me to cut off her head, or bring her something or other, and then she will become a beautiful lady, of great wealth."

But the only thing that the old woman asked him to cut was fire-wood, and what she wished him to bring was water, for the dinner.

"I am a prince," said Paul. "I know nothing of cutting wood and such servant's tasks."

"Prince!" screamed the old woman. "You are a pretty prince, in rags! You can eat, it seems, though you can neither pay nor work, and she began to beat Paul with her broom, till he fairly took to his heels.

He ran till he was quite out of breath. Then he saw a city, with a crowd in the streets, and asked the man of what they were talking.

"Why, I thought that all the world knew that," answered the man. "The king has no money in the treasury; and he has heard that there are mills that can grind corn into gold. So to any man who will find him one of the sort he offers a quarter of his kingdom."

"Ah!" thought Paul. "What a pity that I saw no such mill in my travels!"

"Next to such a mill," continued the man, "the king most desires an enchanted sword, which will bring its owner victory; and for such a sword, he offers six of his finest palaces."

"Oh!" murmured Paul, whose mouth really watered, "why do I not know where to find such a sword?"

"Finally, the king desires a pair of seven-league boots, for he can never travel fast enough; and to the man who can find them he will give—his daughter."

"It is of no use wishing," said Paul, mournfully; "but why could I not have found some kind fairy who would help me to all these things?"

"What is the matter?" asked a man, who was passing.

"Nothing; only I am starving, and fit to drop with weariness," answered Paul.

"Come with me," said the man; "I am a baker, and I want a boy to carry the trays from my oven to my shop. If you are honest and willing, you shall have your food and a shilling a week."

Here was a fine fortune, but what else could Paul do? So he went with the baker, and if you look sharp, when you pass the right door, you may see him, any day, coming up from the ovens, in a white paper cap, and carrying trays of nice hot buns and biscuits.

Is it not a pity?

SPARKS FROM THE KITCHEN STOVE.

By a Young Housekeeper.

MY DEAR BAZAR,—Is your heart too full of sashes, and double skirts, and fichus to be kindled by these sparks from my kitchen stove, which would fain find lodgment somewhere? I am well assured there are other new beginners who peruse your columns, and who will unite with me in the opinion that a kitchen stove or range, whichever it may be, is at times a very awe-inspiring object. For oh, most charitable Bazar, I have been left without that invaluable and greatly-to-be-desired creature vulgarly styled "help," but in my vocabulary a queen. For does she not in reality reign over me, notwithstanding my assumed title of mistress? Dare I say beef-steak when her voice is for mutton-chops? Not a bit of it. On Mondays, Tuesdays, and Saturdays, just half of the working-week, am I not in terror lest by some thoughtless act or word I distract the even tenor of her way, and upset her for those trying but necessary pursuits of washing, ironing, and general cleaning up? Do I not, on the contrary, do whatever I can to make those duties easy for her by setting tables, making beds, and the dear knows what all?

It has even been whispered that I have allowed my adorable Augustus to wait a whole half hour for his dinner because my handmaiden so willed it, and my only excuse was to assure him the kitchen clock was out of order, whereupon Augustus reproachfully reminded me of the days of courtship and honey-moon, when his comfort was the first and most important consideration. It is a mournful fact, however, that he is not now so easily satisfied as then—that whereas in those never-to-be-forgotten times his appetite was entirely absorbed in the tender passion, beef-steak and coffee are now far more essential to his happiness.

But, as I was saying, the muse who superintended the commissary department has left me, beguiled into the higher sphere of matrimony and her own establishment, and I find myself help-less.

Then my kitchen stove stares me blackly in the face. I am aware that a fire is a necessity; but how to make it is the question.

I have a firm conviction that my calling in life is not to build wood-fires, so resolutely do they refuse to burn for me, and the harder I try the more obstinate is the refusal. In vain do I artfully arrange and rearrange the wood and kindlings, and insinuatingly poke in the paper; countless matches are expended on the pile; but it continues in statu quo, until by some unlooked-for accident a flame appears. And when you reflect that this operation must be repeated three times a day, invariably with the same experience, you will feel for me. Then the dirty dishes! With what horror do I regard them! How anxiously do I economize plates and cups and saucers; how carefully scrutinize Augustus's every movement, lest his extravagant habits make me another half hour's work.

But when it comes to greasy pots and kettles, my soul recoils in horror at the thought—my appetite is gone for the things I prepare in them just by reason of the cleansing operation. I don't mind cooking; in fact, I always liked to dabble in the kitchen; but my mixing and baking over, I have no desire to see any thing more of the dishes used. In truth, I would like to forget that they were required; but when I am reminded of the ever-present considerations of scouring and scalding, from all these things I beg to be delivered.

And yet it is a necessary operation. My objections to eating any more dirt than the necessary peck swallowed in hotels and boarding-houses are strong, and I see no reason for abandoning them. At the same time, when one refects that this performance of washing-up must be of daily occurrence for weeks, and months, and years to come, the prospect is disheartening, to say the least. It seems an incontrovertible fact that people must eat to live, and, moreover, that civilization no longer permits them the easy satisfaction in food enjoyed by our first parents.

Then the bills of fare. It is true they are simple; but the necessity of suiting the tastes of my Augustus, which are rather epicurean, and at the same time keeping within bounds of a somewhat slender purse, are two things difficult to reconcile. The last thought at night is what shall I have for breakfast; the first in the morning is an involuntary mapping out of the three daily meals. Augustus does not fancy salt meat, and despises fish; consequently my range is limited, and I vainly study half a dozen receipt-books in hopes of acquiring useful hints. In my opinion the generality of receipt-books are a farce. The ingredients are either so unattainable or so expensive, or, worst of all, so complicated, that I give them up in despair, or, if I conglomerate them, am disgusted with a mass of uneatable material. Variety being generally considered the spice of life, I try not to have boiled eggs more than three times a week; but the science of their preparation is so simple that I am often inclined to fall back upon them.

Augustus being naturally of a dyspeptic turn of mind, or stomach—whichever you please—I am compelled to study up hygiene extensively. As for myself, I really have not time to think whether things agree with me or not.

Then my trips to market. These necessary aids to domestic economy are accomplished early in the morning, after a resolute endeavor to screw my courage to the sticking-point. For, between you and me, I am afraid of the market-men. If I order porter-house steak, I am by no means sure I may not get a tough one, notwithstanding my persuasive entreaty for "something nice and tender." My roasting pieces are very apt to be minus fat, my chickens frequently of an uncertain age; for all of which misfortunes I console myself by the reflection that I am a young housekeeper, and will do better in future.

Then when it comes to vegetables. The tomatoes are painfully apt to be rotten, the corn of a golden yellow, the potatoes speckled. I have been known to bring home rotten eggs; fortunately thus far have escaped boiling them for breakfast, but constantly anticipate some such casualty. It is such a nuisance to know just what one is going to eat. Never for me nowadays are any of those pleasant little surprises, the more palatable by reason of their unexpectedness, but every dish the production of my own brain and hands. I confess it quite takes away my appetite.

Oh Bazar, have you any idea the fair virgins whose portraits adorn your plates, gorgeously arrayed in the latest Parisian styles, are acquainted with the mysteries of a kitchen stove? If not, and any of them are contemplating matrimony, I beg of you to impress upon them the study of culinary engineering, especially the science of dampers and ovens, of bread and coffee. For I was once one of those butterfly damsels; I also was splendidly attired in purple and fine linen, and fared sumptuously every day, without once considering the preparation involved or the method of its attainment. In that far-off past my Augustus thought not of pies or puddings, and I vainly imagined the halycon days of the tender passion would never end.

But, most excellent Bazar, such is not the case. A good dinner is, in these times, very necessary to his good temper, and I wish you would make known to those fair maidens formerly alluded to, that it will be even so with them.

Also urge upon them the importance of keeping on the right side of the kitchen luminary, of propitiating her in every possible way, sooner than allow themselves to be abandoned to the hard fate of their own devices.

It is six o'clock, and I am consequently reminded of the near approach of supper-time, of my empty stove, indeed of the truth of all I have been saying. I betake myself to my pots and kettles, and remain;

Yours, very warmly, A. Y. H.

SPANISH GIPSIES.

THE Gitanos are divided into three distinct tribes: first, the nomade Gitanos, who are met on the high-roads, and frequent the fairs; secondly, the stationary Gitanos, who are half savage, and live in the grottoes and woods, and have nothing to do with the Christian population; thirdly, the gipsies who still preserve some types of their race, but speak the language of the country they inhabit, even sharing the occupations of the natives, and mixing with their families. They have sickly and rickety children, and are known to hasten the death of old people, who, from their age and infirmities, are objects of care and anxiety. It is supposed they burn their dead, in order not to bury their corpses on ground where they are only wanderers, and leave without any hope of return. These accusations are perfectly in accordance with their wandering existence, which does not allow them any permanent cemetery—consequently sickly children and old men would be a considerable embarrassment. Such is the character of the tribe, who spread all round the basin of the Ebro in the fourteenth century, and who, desiring solitude, established themselves in the wildest passes of the Pyrenees, and crossed these mountains in great numbers; for we find them again in Roussillon and Lower Navarre. Their religion does not interfere with the Christian rites; we never hear of any bans being issued against them, even from the superstitious Catholics of Spain, and they have been always allowed to dwell in the grottoes and huts in the forests without molestation.

The men are idle, and employ themselves in clipping their mules. The woman have singular dances. They practice chiromancy, and have become so intermixed with the inhabitants, with whom they have married, and shared their fishing occupation, that, except for their physiognomy, some traditions, and some primitive idioms which they still retain, they would hardly be distinguished from them; for they have even adopted the costume of the Basques and Labours; whereas the other tribes, though they wear the trowsers and loose Catalanian shirt, and the handkerchief twisted round the head, "à la Aragonais," or the Basque blouse, always add some curious tinsel ornament, or brilliant-colored garment, which shows that they still have their savage tastes, though adopting European fashions.

Although gipsies are found in all parts of Europe, it is only among the Pyrenees, and in the Asturias, that there are sufficient numbers to be considered as a nation; and after having seen these mountains successively the refuge of the Gauls, Latins, and Germans, is it not curious to find them populated by a horde who have been banished from the Indian continent, and who have slowly crossed Asia, Egypt, and the Mediterranean to stop their wandering career in these wild district fastnesses, which have been the asylum of so many nations?

PUNCTUALITY IN MEALS.

IT is always better to be in advance in the preparation of any meal rather than behind-hand. It is always easy to proceed slower when one finds one's self ready too soon; but when you are compelled to hurry things for want of time there is every probability of doing badly, and it is rare that some part of the meal should not suffer. It is a mistake to suppose that a well-dressed meal will be sufficient to cause its want of punctuality to be forgiven. How many times have we seen excellent dinners, both as regards choice and execution, badly received, and fail on account of the time which the famished and impatient guests had been kept waiting, and who felt on that account aggrieved and indisposed to acknowledge its merits! An unpunctual cook will never be a true cook, to our mind.

SONNET.

A LOVER TO HIS MISTRESS'S JEWELS.

FLASH, happy gems, and hide from prying glance
The rounded forms you clasp, but can not grace:
Your frigid glitter serves but to enhance
The myriad charms that sparkle from her face:
Ye can not ape the lustre of her eyes,
Nor prize the smile that dimples round her mouth:
Your changeless gleam is sharp as frosty skies,
She, sweet as roses from the rose-strewn south:
The drooping pearl which nestles at her ear
Pales at the maiden fairness of her throat,
While happier diamonds, pure and crystal-clear
Reflect the beauties they have learned by rote:
Yet doth her touch restore your gemmed array
Tenfold the worth her beauty takes away.

GENTLEMEN'S PARIS FALL FASHIONS.

See illustration on page 796.

Fig. 1.—Low-crowned hat, slightly swelling, with a narrow brim; and full suit of light chocolate cassimere, with diagonal stripes. Sack-coat with rolling collar, closed in front by two buttons, the first of which is placed just below the roll, and skirt rounded in front. Transverse pockets with narrow welt, sleeve of average size, with cuff simulated by two rows of stitching four-fifths of an inch apart. The coat and vest are finished in the same manner around the edge. Double-breasted vest without collar, buttoning somewhat high. Semi-tight pantaloons with a stripe at the side, formed by a pleat stitched down. Plaid red and white cravat, Colin collar, and flesh-colored gloves.

Fig. 2.—Short sack over-coat of plain blue cloth, full and straight in the back, buttoning high and overlapping considerably in front, with four buttons on each side. Pocket on a line with the lowest button, and furnished with square lapel. Sleeve of average size, with a somewhat broad cuff, the upper edge of which is bound with wide galloon. The same galloon finishes the edges of the pocket-lapels and coat. Semi-tight pantaloons of plain fawn-colored cloth, with a stripe down the sides of a darker shade, standing collar, red cravat, and straw-colored gloves.

Fig. 3.—Hat with moderate-sized brim, turned up slightly at the sides. Short Spanish tobacco-colored over-coat, seen in the back, with front of the same cut as that of Fig. 2. Semi-tight pantaloons, of light brown cloth with narrow vertical stripes and a plain stripe of a darker shade down the sides. Standing collar. Pearl-gray gloves.

Fig. 4.—Low hat with moderate-sized brim, slightly turned up at the sides. Iron-gray over-coat, with facings rolling rather low and about an inch and a half wider than the collar, and closed with three large buttons on each side below the roll, the top of which is finished with a button-hole. Skirt-pockets on a level with the hand, and another in the left front, just outside the lapping. Sleeve with broad cuff, the upper edge of which, as well as the edges of the over-coat, is finished with two rows of stitching, an inch apart. A row of stitching is also seen in front on each side of the buttons; and the pockets are finished in the same manner. Semi-tight pantaloons of blue-gray cloth, with diagonal stripes and a band down the sides. Light blue scarf-cravat. Standing collar. Straw-colored gloves.

Fig. 5.—Low-crowned hat. Dark mastic-gray sack over-coat. Light brown semi-tight pantaloons, with diagonal stripes and a band down the sides. Standing collar. Blue-gray gloves.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IT is estimated that not less than thirteen millions of the human race have perished by earthquakes. The terrible convulsion of nature which has recently buried in ruins numerous cities and towns on the western coast of South America brings freshly to remembrance similar awful visitations in times past. Even if the horrors of ancient earthquakes seemed lessened to the mind through the long lapse of years, the records of more recent ones are still thrilling. Among those which stand out prominently in history is one which occurred a little more than two hundred years ago, in 1662, whereby 300,000 persons were buried in the city of Pekin alone. In 1693 Sicily was visited by a great earthquake which overturned fifty-four cities and three hundred villages, destroying 100,000 lives. Probably there have been no earthquakes equal in intensity to those which ravaged different parts of the world in the eighteenth century. According to the records 100,000 persons were again swallowed up at Pekin, in 1731; in 1755, 60,000 persons are believed to have perished in six minutes at Lisbon; about 40,000 lives were lost in Calabria in 1783, and nearly the same number were, in 1797, buried in an instant by an earthquake which destroyed the whole country between Santa Fé and Panama. During the present century these fearful visitations have frequently occurred in both hemispheres. The valley of the Mississippi was violently shaken during the year 1811 over an extent of country three hundred miles in length; in 1812 Caracas, the capital of Venezuela, was reduced to a heap of ruins, beneath which 12,000 of the inhabitants perished; indeed, both in South and Central America, earthquakes have been working fearful destruction. In 1823 and in 1835 Chili experienced desolating shocks; Quito, in Ecuador, was entirely destroyed in 1859, and in 1858 Mexico suffered severely. Naples and surrounding towns were shaken in 1857; the city of Mendoza, in the Argentine Republic, was destroyed with many thousands of the inhabitants in 1861; and still more recent earthquakes in Mexico, San Francisco, St. Thomas, and other parts of the West Indies, and in the Sandwich Islands, are fresh in the minds of all.

In this latest calamity, the details of which would fill many columns, the whole western coast of South America has severely suffered. All of the dreary facts may not come to our knowledge for weeks, and it is to be hoped that the appalling accounts have been exaggerated. Yet there is reason to believe that not less than twenty towns have been ruined, thirty thousand lives lost, and property destroyed to the amount of three hundred millions of dollars. Arica, a flourishing and important sea-port town of Peru, has ceased to exist. It had a population of about 80,000, but premonitory symptoms of the calamity enabled a majority to seek places of safety. Arequipa, one of the oldest and most beautiful cities of Peru, is a thing of the past. Its population was variously estimated from 35,000 to 50,000, and many perished. Iquique, the most important place in Southern Peru, was almost totally destroyed. The city of Quito has sustained serious injury; and along the coast of Chili the disturbed sea came forth from its depths, submerging whole towns, and dealing destruction to every thing in its path. And now many wretched, homeless creatures are wandering through the country in search of food and shelter. Meanwhile, the Government is endeavoring to relieve their distress as far as possible.

It is said that fifteen thousand dollars have already been raised toward the erection of a hotel at the Gettysburg Katalysine Springs.

News has recently been received of a singular and terrible accident which befell a missionary in Siam—the Rev. Dr. House. He was on a long and tedious journey to a new station to render medical assistance, and was accompanied by his four native guides and three large elephants to carry the baggage. When near the end of his journey, while passing one of the huge beasts, the animal suddenly turned upon him and smote him with his trunk, laying him prostrate, and then with his great tusks pierced his flesh in a terrible manner. He lay under the tree where he was stricken down for two weeks, being himself his only physician and surgeon, with great fortitude sewing up his own wounds. He was attended only by ignorant natives, had but a pint and a half of water with which to wet his lips and dress his wounds, and the thermometer was ninety-two degrees in the shade. Yet he recovered at length sufficiently to be carried to the end of his journey.

A mercantile house in Boston offer for sale a new article—American gros grain black silk—manufactured in Hartford. It is represented as being heavy, beautiful in fabric, and durable. In addition to this, being free of duty, it is much cheaper than a similar quality of imported goods. It is always well to encourage American manufactures.

An exchange says that if the word "cabled" is allowed we shall then have people "steam-boated," "carred," "schoonerred," and "slooped" before long.

The entire course of study at the Cooper Union occupies five years. The schools are capable of giving instruction to two thousand pupils at one time in the various departments. Students are admitted to all the benefits of the institution upon the formal application of their employers or some known citizen.

At the Philadelphia School of Design for Women, which has recently reopened, lectures on various branches of art are given frequently by different members of the faculty. The pupils are taught drawing in all its varieties, figure painting, landscape painting, lithography, pattern drawing (for printed dress-goods, wall-paper, and carpets), flower painting, architectural ornamenting, etc. Physiology and anatomy, in their relations to art, are also taught. The museum and library comprise many works of great value to students. The school has already enabled many young women to obtain a good living by the practice of the arts it teaches.

A gentleman given to enigmas stepped into the St. James's Hotel, in Boston, the other day, and asked the proprietor what he could have for dinner.

"Any thing you please to order, Sir."
"Very well," was the reply; "then give me woman's crowning ornament, roasted; the most active member in Congress, boiled; what England never can be, for dessert; mock misery for my beverage."

"All right, Sir," and the guest's order was shortly filled, as follows: Roast hare, boiled tongue, floating island, Champagne.

A peculiarity of the Missouri bottom is said to be the wonderful growth of sun-flowers. For miles they extend in unbroken and profuse luxuriance and utter uselessness. They were first brought there by the Mormons, and have spread until they have extended for a thousand miles along the river.

"Carleton," in the Boston Journal, describes a magnificent Chinese garden which he has visited, containing about a dozen acres, and consisting of gardens within gardens—with arbors, tea-houses, canals, tanks filled with gold-fish. There were straight paths, winding walks and labyrinths, a wonderful variety of tropical vegetation—a place where the florist and botanist might find unspeakable pleasure. The proprietor had Italian vases, French fruits, Japanese carved work, windows of German stained glass, floors of English encaustic tiles, flower-pots from the potteries of their native land—a jumble of fine things; but arranged without much regard to taste. A Chinaman's ideas of art are all grotesque. He has an utter disregard of perspective in painting. The pictures which we see on chinaware are excellent representations of Chinese comprehension of art.

It is said—and housewives may often find it convenient to try the recipe—that fresh meat may be kept perfectly sweet for several days by placing it in a dish and covering it with milk. Sour milk or buttermilk will answer.

A kind of watch is now manufactured in Switzerland, which is wound up by opening and shutting the case six times. When the watch is wound up it may be opened and closed an indefinite number of times without effect. Very likely—but why can not they invent something convenient while they are about it?

Difficult cases of neuralgia are said to have been cured by a new and powerful sedative which has been discovered in Paris. It is nitrate of oxyd of glycine, diluted. It is obtained by treating glycerine at a low temperature with sulphuric or nitric acid. One drop, mixed with ninety-nine drops of spirits of wine, constitutes the first dilution.

A singular crime has been detected in Munich. For some weeks the families living at a certain hotel had been subject to alarming attacks of illness. Investigation revealed that a young lady at the hotel, named Erminia Schlug, had a lover who was enthusiastically devoted to the study of physiology, and similar branches of knowledge, and spared no one in his experiments. With the aid of the lady, he had been administering various drugs to the boarders; not, however, sparing either her or himself, upon whom many serious experiments had been made. The pair escaped with a nominal punishment, and a leading paper spoke of their "heroic, though mistaken, devotion to the cause of science!"

Cleveland, Ohio, bids fair to become famous for the culture of the grape. One of the finest vineyards is situated on Euclid Ridge, and covers an area of 22 acres of high land. The vines are now five years old, and will produce, this year, more than 25,000 gallons of wine. The grapes grown on the high land command three to five cents per pound more than those of lowland growth. They include the Catawba, Isabella, Clinton, Delaware, Virginia Seedling, and many other varieties. Other vineyards in that vicinity have been bearing sixteen years, and have never failed to produce a good crop.

A New England four-year-old pet, who is called "Arlit," has a way of saying some funny things. The other day her father cut open a large water-melon, when "Arlit" astonished every body by looking at the seeds and exclaiming, with the most natural childish astonishment, "Oh my! beans in a cucumber!" She had her share of that melon.

There is one gymnastic association in Cincinnati which numbers over a thousand members, and includes the best young men of the city. The statement is made that of the nine thousand who have been enrolled on the books of the Young Men's Gymnastic Association not one has died with consumption, or any other pulmonary disease, though many were formerly strongly inclined to consumption.

At a recent book-sale in London six volumes, printed by William Caxton, brought the sum of $5480. Most of the books were defective; one, supposed to have been the first printed in England, wanted three leaves. A single volume sold for $2225. All the prices are in gold.

The richest Chinese library in the world, according to the St. Petersburg Gazette, is now in the Russian capital. It consists of 11,607 volumes, 1168 wood-engravings, and 276 manuscripts. Among these books are many rare works, of which there are no copies even in the largest libraries of China.

In 1852 the number of telegrams sent in France amounted only to 48,105, whereas in 1867 they figured up to 3,213,995, without taking official telegrams into account, which alone numbered 519,088 messages.

Two young ladies who recently went to a camp-meeting in Massachusetts, thought it no sin to illustrate their faith by their works, and taking their needles, plied them industriously on some charity garments. They were, however, reminded by a pious sister, that being on "consecrated ground," work was out of place. They accordingly put by their needles. While, however, they continued attentive listeners to the earnest and vivid words of the preacher, their sister rebuker was soon fast asleep.

THE LATE MADAME VICTOR HUGO.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

MADAME VICTOR HUGO.

I SHOULD like to tell you some news, but my pen, dipped in tears, can trace naught but a name—Madame Victor Hugo. The noble woman who so worthily bore this illustrious name is no more. She passed through all the pangs of glory. She suffered much for her adored husband, whom she worshiped till her dying breath.

With the beauty of Anne of Austria, she had also her pride, but her native loftiness was swallowed up in her inexhaustible goodness. I have before me her photograph, taken some five years ago. She is represented standing, in a dress of violet silk. Her magnificent black hair, rolled back on the temples, falls in thick curls behind her ears, leaving uncovered her broad full forehead. Her large velvety eyes are shaded by finely arched and thick brows, her nose is aquiline and perfectly shaped, and her mouth small, with the full under-lip which belongs to all generous natures. Her beautiful white hands are of an ideal perfection—royal hands, which remind one of those of a marble Venus. Such was her picture five years ago; though fifty-five, she was still in the lustre of a dazzling, full-blown beauty, calculated to inspire an ardent admiration.

Sickness had greatly changed her. She had grown frightfully emaciated; her large black eyes were the sole vestiges of her former beauty.

She passed the last months of her life at Paris, in obscure furnished lodgings in the Rue du Pré aux Clercs, near the Rue de l'Université, where a wretched little drawing-room, with worn garnet velvet furniture and woolen damask curtains, bounded the sole horizon of the poor invalid. She preferred it to her splendid house at Guernsey, because there she could see her friends. The greatest sacrifice which she made her husband was in supporting exile for his sake. She adored Paris, where she was fêted and understood as she deserved. All party hostility vanished in her presence.

No one could help loving this good and great woman. Women, above all, never consulted their husbands as to whether they should visit her. At her house the most aristocratic ladies of the Faubourg St. Germain were seen, side by side with the wives of the highest functionaries and dignitaries of the government.

She was always surrounded by a swarm of young girls, like a queen in the midst of her maids of honor. "I love young girls," she would say, "they are all flowers in soul and in face."

Her reception hours were from four to six. She was seated at the end of the drawing-room in a causeuse, where she greeted her visitors with a smile. She said little of herself, even on the days that she suffered most: "I have had a crisis," she would say, simply. "This detestable sickness gives me the blues." She was ignorant of the nature of her disease, hypertrophy of the heart, and believed herself treated for an affection of the stomach. She drew out every one by interesting herself in his private affairs, as well as talking of things in general. Although she could no longer read, being threatened with loss of sight, she knew all that was written at Paris, and gave kindly but well-digested opinions thereon. Her last conversations were of great amplitude. Her soul seemed trying its wings before soaring into infinite space. She talked much about God and human responsibility, and anxiously questioned herself—dear saint!—as to whether she had done enough in the past to assist the unfortunate and help them bear their burdens. I am sure that she is no longer afraid, and that she has found her reward.

A month had not passed since Madame Hugo quitted Paris when she breathed her last at Brussels. On the day before her death her eldest son, Charles, wrote to a friend, "I am perfectly happy; my mother is much better." A little child had just been born, George, the son of Charles Hugo, and she had the joy of embracing her grandchild before quitting the earth; but God took back the angel whom he had sent in the course of the week.

Madame Victor Hugo, née Adèle Foucher, married the great but then obscure poet at the age of sixteen. They lived for several years in the Rue Jean Goujon. It was here that Victor Hugo wrote "Notre Dame de Paris," which rendered him illustrious. From the Rue Jean Goujon they removed to the Place Royale. The celebrated salon of the Place Royale was for fifteen years the rendezvous of all the illustrious men, in whatever department, of Paris. Prince Napoleon was a constant guest there, and always remained the devoted friend of Madame Hugo.

On leaving the Place Royale, Madame Hugo went to the Rue de la Tour d'Auvergne, which she quitted for a life of exile. After an absence of seventeen years she returns to France forever, unaccompanied, alas! by those who loved her so well. She is buried at Villeguier, in Normandy, by the side of her daughter, Leopoldine, who fell a victim to a frightful accident, having been drowned with her husband when very young while on a pleasure excursion. The inconsolable mother made it a special request that she should rest by her child. Charles, François Victor, and Adèle, who is married to an Englishman, are the only children remaining to Victor Hugo out of five.

Madame Hugo leaves several works, among others one entitled "The Tombs." This is a profound and exquisite book, full of feeling and study, in which she has drawn the portraits of celebrated friends whose death she had witnessed—Balzac, Madame Dorval, Nodier, and some others, judged as she knew how to judge men.

Paul Meurice made the following speech at her grave:

"I only wish to bid her adieu in the name of us all. You who stand around her know well what she was—this soul so beautiful and so gentle; this adorable mind, this great heart—ah! this great heart above all! How she loved to love, how she loved to be loved, and how she knew how to suffer with those she loved! She was the wife of the greatest man alive; and through her heart she raised herself to a level with his genius. She almost equaled him by knowing how to understand him. And she must quit us! We must quit her! Already she has found some one to love. She has found her two children yonder in the heavens. Victor Hugo said to me at the frontier last evening, 'Tell my daughter that, till I come, I send her her mother forever.' I have delivered his message, and believe it has been heard. And now, farewell, farewell for the present; farewell for the absent; farewell, our friend; farewell our sister! Farewell, but au revoir!"

THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD.

A Story.

By the Author of "Mabel's Progress," "Aunt Margaret's Troubles," etc.

RICHLI ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER X.

OTTO AND LIESE.

OTTO's early training has been sufficiently described to enable the reader to understand that his father, the head-ranger, had imbued him with a large-hearted love for his whole fatherland that is more usually found among the inhabitants of populous cities than among the comparatively isolated dwellers in obscure nooks and corners of Germany. Hemmerich himself was unaware what deep root the feelings evoked by his old legends and modern ballads were taking in his boy's heart. The father's mind, dreamy, imaginative, and somewhat timid—though of physical courage Hemmerich never showed any lack—was content to wander in the past, and speculate on the future. Otto, more prosaic and less irresolute, lived in the present, and translated his ideas into action as far as it was possible to do so. To Otto's character no speculations were attractive which did not involve the possibility of doing something as their first result. And if this doing were tangible work to be accomplished by thews and sinews, so much the more was it attractive to Otto. He was yet such a mere child when his father died, that to suppose anything like a political bias in his young mind would have appeared to be an absurdity. But, nevertheless, such a bias was there, and only circumstances were needed to call it forth. In his school-days Otto had been a peculiarly bad subject for the reception of those wise saws which deal in vague generalities, and are not intended by their enunciators to be uncompromisingly acted upon. He had a disconcerting habit of taking you at your word, which had been a source of much aggravation to old Sophie, the sacristan's one domestic—laundress, cook, housekeeper, and gardener. And, indeed, the said habit had more than once occasioned some inconvenience to the despotic Simon Schnarcher himself. "Thou blessed Heaven!" old Sophie would exclaim, querulously, "the boy does it to provoke me! He came into the kitchen yesterday with his clothes one cake of mud, and I told him he had best eat his dinner in the cow-shed, for that was all the place he was fit for; and—would you believe it?—he walked off with his bowl of broth, and ate it up in the old cow-house; and it was pelting with rain as hard as it could pelt, and the water coming through the roof into his broth—for it hasn't been mended since there's been no beast kept there! It was all aggravation. He knew I didn't mean what I said."

But Otto had really acted in straightforward simplicity; and, in truth, the only method of dealing with him was this: when you did not mean a thing, not to say it.

In Halle, during his uncle's unsuccessful experiment of trying to mould this unmanageable conscience into a somewhat more plastic condition, it had been the same. Yet, although he returned from the university as fixed as ever in the resolve not to be a clergyman, Otto nevertheless brought away with him some good results of his sojourn there—a respect for learning and intellect, and a clearer comprehension than he had ever before attained of his own aptitudes and deficiencies. Under the roof of Herr Schmitt, the stationer at Detmold, Otto's individual opinions on politics—or, indeed, on any other subject—were, he thought, of no consequence whatever to the people around him. He had at first a return of that sensation of utter loneliness, of being apart from all love and care, which he had experienced in his boyhood, on exchanging the free forest life and his father's fond companionship for the narrow rule and gloomy roof of Simon Schnarcher. But gradually he grew to like his new master very much, and to respect him very sincerely. A mild, silent, honest man was Herr Schmitt, with an omnivorous appetite for books. Simon Schnarcher had not thought it necessary to confide to the stationer his grand-nephew's dislike to the life of a tradesman, and Schmitt had at first no idea but that Otto was well content with his lot. Soon, however, the two simple, honest natures began to understand each other better. The essence of the young man's character was a transparent candor, and it was not very long before Herr Schmitt was put in possession of all the events of Otto's simple history. Little did the sacristan suspect that the respectable, old-established—in Schnarcher's mind the two words were almost synonymous—tradesman was capable of sympathizing with Otto's perverse fancies. But so it was, nevertheless. However much Otto might like Herr Schmitt he could not reconcile himself to the prospect of being a tradesman all his days. He pined for a freer life, for an occupation that should give scope to the exercise of his bodily activity, and should call forth the powers of his quick, observant eye, light foot, and steady hand.

"If I had been a bit older when poor father died," said he one day to Herr Schmitt, "I believe I should have gone straight to the Prince and asked to be taken into his service as jäger. The Prince thought a good deal of father."

"Umph!" answered the stationer, musingly. "Is it too late? I am not at all sure that it is too late."

Which words fanned the spark of hope that had never ceased to glow in Otto's breast. But then Schmitt, who was always more or less an ailing man, fell sick, and the subject was put out of sight for the present.

Detmold folks are old-fashioned early in their habits. Liese was out at market, making such purchases as did not require her mistress's experienced judgment to select, by seven o'clock on the morning after her master's departure for Horn. "I wonder," thought she, trotting homeward, with a heavy basket on her arm, "whether Herr Schmitt's shop is open yet?"

It was open. The shutters were down, the pavement swept, and at the door stood some one looking for her. Some one whose jaws were not bound up with a handkerchief, and whose brown face glowed brightly at her approach.

"Good-morning, Otto."

"Good-morning, Lieschen."

Otto managed to throw a good deal of eloquence into the ordinary greeting. Liese tripped into the shop.

"How glad I am that you happened to be here, Otto!"

"Happened to be here! Why, of course I was here. Where else should I be, when I knew there was a chance of your coming?"

"Oh! he did tell you then? He—he isn't a very nice boy, is he, Otto? I thought he seemed rather cross. But perhaps that may have been the toothache."

"Oh, come! he is not a bad fellow, Lieschen," remonstrated Otto. "He gave me your message faithfully, and he remembered your name and all."

Otto was too grateful to the cadaverous boy for giving him the chance of seeing Liese, to speak otherwise than well of him.

The young man was standing behind the counter, leaning his arms upon it so as to bring himself very near to Liese. The young maiden stood resting her market-basket on the broad wooden ledge. One little red hand clasped the wicker handle, the other was hidden beneath her coarse apron. Liese certainly looked very pretty. Her cheeks had been kissed into a soft pink glow by the eager morning air, and her eyes were bright and joyous. Happiness is a great beautifier; and Liese felt very happy in Otto's presence.

"How is Herr Schmitt?" she asked, gently.

"The boy told me he was ill in bed."

"So he is, more's the pity. I don't know, but I'm afraid he is very ill. The doctor shakes his head. He's a right good man, Herr Schmitt."

"I'm glad you like him, Otto."

"Yes; I do like him, though I don't like the business a bit the more. Herr Schmitt has notions that Uncle Schnarcher wouldn't approve of if he knew them," added Otto with a smile.

"Has he?"

"Ay, Lieschen, that has he! Uncle Schnarcher fancies that none but hot-headed young fellows have such notions, but Herr Schmitt is old enough, Heaven knows! more than fifty. And yet he is a strong patriot. Ah, and he reads all the liberal journals, and I believe he writes letters to some of them."

"Thou dear Heaven!" exclaimed Liese, profoundly impressed.

"Yes, I believe he does. He and I have long talks together sometimes of an evening, and I've learned a great many things from him."

"Do you know, Otto," said Liese, earnestly,

"I wanted to ask you something."

"Did you, Lieschen?"

"Yes; you always were so good to me, and I am not so afraid of you as I am of most people."

"Afraid of me? I should think not! Why, Lieschen, if I thought you were afraid of me, it would grieve me to the heart."

"Would it, Otto?"

"Yes, it would. Because I don't believe folks are afraid of those they like."

"I don't know," returned Liese, pondering.

"I think I am afraid of people I like, sometimes. But then I am a coward—Cousin Hanne always says so. However, I am not afraid of you, Otto, at all events. So I want you to explain to me why it was right to be a patriot in Hermann's time—Hermann on the Grotenberg, you know—and yet it would be wrong now?"

"Who says it would be wrong now?" shouted Otto, impetuously. "Wrong! Wrong to be a patriot, and to love Fatherland! Why, Liese, I am astonished to hear you say such things!"

"Well, Otto," answered Liese, half-smiling, half timid, "you are determined to try whether I do really like you or not, for you are enough to frighten any body when you look and speak like that!"

"Dear Lieschen, did I startle you? I'm so sorry! You are such a tender little thing. But do tell me what put such an idea into your head! Wrong to be a patriot?"

Then Liese related the talk of the hoch-wohlgeborne damen at her mistress's tea-table, and Otto proceeded with much gravity to give the simple maiden the benefit of his superior wisdom and knowledge on the subject of patriotism.

Liese listened with very flattering attention and interest; and then, descending from the general question to the particular case, after the fashion of womankind, she asked, with a very grave look in her brown eyes, "And would you be a patriot too, Otto?"

"Well," returned Otto, after a short pause, "I hope I am one, Lieschen."

"Are you?" The brown eyes looked up with a great deal of surprise in them, and a gleam of something that was made up of admiration and timidity.

"I mean, you know, that I hope I feel like one. As to doing, I couldn't be of much use, of course, because wise heads are wanted as well as warm hearts."

"Oh, Otto!" Little Lieschen's soft chestnut eyebrows came together in an indignant frown. "That was too much! 'Oh, Otto, I am quite sure your head is not silly.'"

Not silly? No, indeed! In her heart she looked upon Otto as a marvel of cleverness. And as for learning—had he not been to college? And could he not construe the Latin epigrams on the tomb-stones at Horn?

Otto found it very pleasant to be looked at and spoken to as Liese Lehmann looked and spoke. He was a very good fellow, sound at heart; and, although far from inaccessible to the flattery implied in his old playmate's undoubting faith in him, he yet accepted it gratefully, as one receives not a debt, but a gift.

"What a dear little thing you are, Lieschen!" said he.

Then the brown eyes took refuge behind a hedge of long lashes a shade darker than themselves, and a bright blush deepened the pink glow on the soft cheeks.

"I say, Lieschen, couldn't I come and see you sometimes, after working hours?"

Liese's heart palpitated with terror.

"Oh no, Otto, I'm sure you couldn't," said she, breathlessly.

"I don't think it very kind of you to be so dead sure about it. We are such old friends. And I want to know why not?"

Now somewhere in some secret hidden nook of Liese Lehmann's heart there existed a very sufficient answer to this question. But scarcely to her own consciousness did she own what the answer was. As to boldly blurring it forth to Otto Hemmerich's face, there was hardly any wild audacity which she would not have been more capable of accomplishing than that. The answer put into words would have run thus: "You can not come and see me, because you would come in the character of my sweet-heart, and Frau von Schleppers utterly disapproves of and forbids sweet-hearts."

And there was Otto chafing and fuming because he fancied that Liese did not wish him to go and see her, and having not the faintest suspicion of the reason that kept her tongue-tied and abashed. And upon the whole, I, for my part, am inclined to like them both all the better for their foolishness. Otto would not have been the Otto I knew and am trying to describe, had he been capable of jumping to the conclusion that he was much too dangerous a fellow to be admitted by the mistress of a household as a visitor to her pretty serving-maid.

There was a pause.

"Please, Otto," said Liese, in an unsteady little voice, "would you tell me how much I owe for the pink satin note-paper? I must pay for it. That's what I came for."

"Three kreutzers," responded Otto, briefly.

"There they are. Good-by, Otto."

"You are going?"

"I must go; mistress is alone. Master went to Horn last night, and is not come back yet. I don't know whether he would see Cousin Franz or not. I didn't dare to ask him to take any message."

"Who is your master? Is he cross to you?"

Otto was very fiery at the idea of any one but himself being cross to Liese.

"He is the Herr Justizrath von Schleppers, and he isn't cross a bit. But I feel afraid of him all the same. Good-by again, Otto."

"Good-by, Lieschen. Shake hands. I dare say I may be having a holiday myself soon, to go and see Uncle Schnarcher. If I do go, I suppose I might call at the Justizrath's to ask if you had any message to send to Horn?"

Liese felt rather dubious about that even, but she had not the heart to say so. So she made no verbal reply, but put her hand into Otto's, and then set off homeward with her market-basket.

"The Justizrath von Schleppers," mused Otto, still leaning with folded arms on the counter. "Folks say he has all the management of the Prince's estates now. I wonder—"

And then Otto's thoughts went off into various wanderings, branching out hither and thither; and the most prominent figure in his wanderings was not that of the respectable Justizrath von Schleppers, but a very small, slight form, belonging to a meek little maiden who was meanwhile actively engaged in household labors—rubbing, and scrubbing, and sweeping, under the jealous eye of her mistress—and breaking forth every now and then into short, sweet snatches of song, like the pippings of a young bird. Being impelled thereto by the irrepressible forces of youth, and a loving heart which instinctively felt that it was loved again.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

AGNES H.—Gore your green poplin closely, the skirt just escaping the floor. Over this make a tunic, open in front, rounded and held up in a short panier puff behind, by gathering the edge under the trimming. Straps underneath hold the puff in position. Around the skirt put two flat quillings of white satin eight inches wide, the box-pleats nearly touching each other, and sewed flat at top and bottom. Narrower quill on the tunic. High corsage open to the belt, with white satin revers. Belt with fan-shaped rosette behind. No sash. Lace chemisette. Sleeves puffed to the elbow, and finished with a frill. White satin boots. Gilt boots are tawdry and theatrical. Make your opera wrap a burnous, trimmed with heavy chenille fringe.

MORNING.—Make two skirts and short basquine. Trim with corded silk in box-pleats. Loop the upper skirt and basquine at the sides and back with rosettes of silk. If you wear white, put a white silk cord in the quilling. The picot of which you speak has been repeatedly described.

EVA C.—The front and side widths have a pleat under the seams. Back widths are gauged. Brown satin braid half an inch wide, three rows, above corded fringe, will trim your dress stylishly. We have not seen a sleeveless jacket this season. Cloaks are longer. Black is the best color, as it suits any dress. Benzine, ammonia, or potter's-clay may remove the soil. It is difficult to lay down a positive rule of etiquette in the case to which you refer, and which may be modified by circumstances. As a general rule we should say yes.

HELEN F.—The skirt of your alpaca habit should be from three and a half to four yards wide, and about three-eighths longer than your short walking dresses. Gore the front width and one each side of it. The right side is an eighth of a yard longer than the left. Gather the full widths to the belt, as pleats are not easily arranged in the saddle.

Mrs. C. N. W.—If your boy still wears skirts, make gored skirts and jackets of piqué, of Scotch plaid flannel, cashmere, or velveteen. Braid the piqué, vandyke the plaids, and put folds of plaid on plain goods. If he is in trousers, make full knickerbockers, and short blouses of navy blue tweed or brown ladies' cloth. Scallop the edge of the blouse and outside seam of trousers, and bind with braid.

R. W.—Skirts are gored like those worn in the summer. High corsages are buttoned before; low ones laced behind. Points are worn in Paris. The polonaise with cape is the standard shape for cloaks. Paniers are not universally worn, but an appearance of fullness at the back is adopted by the plainest-dressed ladies. Write to the "Upright Trunk Company, New York," for the information you want.

Mrs. H.—Wait if you can until the styles are established. Striped satin and velvet are the most elegant materials for petticoats. Looped and puffed dresses of all sorts are called paniers; but the panier proper is horizontal puffs across the back width.

A MOTHER.—A gored circular with cape is the best cloak for an infant. As you object to elaborate trimming, it may be merely scalloped and bound with colored satin, plush, or velvet. If you prefer embroidery or braid, trim the cape only.

READER.—You can wear the shape of collar most becoming to you, as the Byron and standing collars are both suitable. The neck-tie is white or light colored satin for evening, and a darker shade, or black, for traveling. Dark brown or blue cloth, coat and pants alike, are worn for traveling.

H. L. P.—All kinds of pleated trimming are fashionable, especially for mourning. Trim the poplin alpaca with wide pleated frills, bound with purple; the school dress with bias folds of striped poplin, purple, and black.

Mrs. D. B.—If you wish your daughter to wear white but object to Marseilles, get cashmere or merino, and trim with striped velvet or plaid. Soft wool poplins in small irregular plaids, of scarlet or blue with white, are pretty and serviceable. Make a gored walking dress with cape for winter of silk, poplin, or merino. Straw or felt hat with round crown, trimmed with white velvet.

Mrs. C. H. C., Iowa.—In Harper's Bazar, No. 24, you will find full instructions for working point russe.

MINNIE, KATE, and MOLLIE.—The directions which you require would occupy too much space, and could only be properly given by a professional hair-worker. Martelle requires about the same space as croquet, but is much more difficult to set up. The new game of Silver Chimes is much easier, and seems destined to become a favorite.

S. C. MILLER.—We can not recommend special machines through the columns of the Bazar. If you write to us, inclosing a stamp, we will send you the addresses that you desire.

J. A. C., MICHIGAN.—We can not at present give the information you desire, but will endeavor to do so at some future time.

O. P.—The procession of the Flitch of Bacon is peculiar to England, where connubial bliss is so uncertain that a continuance of it for only a year and a day was celebrated with pomp and ceremony, the happy couple being exalted and carried on men's shoulders to the sound of music, etc. It was very rare that any married couple claimed the gift of the Flitch. It was provided that they make oath in the church porch of their qualifications, such as never having regretted the tie, never having quarreled, etc. But this, like many other old English customs and holidays, is disappearing with the "progress" we boast of. In the Gentlemen's Magazine of A.D. 1751, is an account of John Shakespeare and his wife having claimed their gammon of bacon.

GEORGE B.—The phrase sub rosa, or "under the rose," is the Latin for the ancient Greek expression. The rose was dedicated to the God of Silence, and it was customary among the Greeks at their entertainments to place a rose above the table to signify that whatever was spoken was private. The presentation of a rose to any person admonished him to be silent. Hence the expression, equivalent to the French entre nous or the Latin inter nos.

GLIMMER.—The word "Dandy" has been ingeniously derived from the French Dindon, a turkey cock, and this comes from Dinde or oiseau d'Inde, bird of India. He who is called a dandy is supposed to resemble by his strut and self-importance a turkey cock.

L. G.—When there is no dancing the guests at a party can amuse themselves with music, games, and conversation. One large party seems to us so much like another that we should suppose you would not require any special instructions how to give one. Do as others do.

LOTTA G.—There is nothing less than a surgical operation with the knife, ligature, or cautery that can remove moles.

L. G.—You may sup with or without gloves according to your discretion.

SENEX.—About 350 cubic feet of air are inspired and expired by the human lungs every 24 hours. There are about 20 respirations a minute.

R. T.—The time taken by the blood to make the complete circuit of the body, from and back again to the heart, is only half a minute. The whole quantity of blood in a man of the average size is 75 pounds.

BRUNETTE.—Bear's grease which was recommended by the beautiful Cleopatra has been in repute ever since. The following is a favorite modern application to prevent the hair from falling out:

Vinegar of cantharides..... 1 ounce.
Cologne-water..... 1 ounce.
Rose-water..... 1 ounce.

MIX.
C. K. S.—Mourning is worn for a husband's brother. —Dickens's "Child's History of England" is unquestionably the best.—It would be equally proper to call with your guest upon the neighbor and invite the neighbor to meet your guest. You in fact can do both.—If you want to get rid of the "troublesome suitor" all you need do is to cause your daughter to refuse to see him. If you wish to compel him to "make his intentions in regard to your daughter known," you, as her mother, might frankly ask him.

COUNTRYMAN.—Paint your house one of the dark neutral tints which abound in nature. The grays, browns, and deep buffs which you find in the trunks of trees, the rocks and soils, as natural contrasts to the bright green of the grass and foliage are all good colors.

HELEN.—Rizzio, the favorite of Queen Mary, was not a handsome man, though most of the modern pictures represent him as such. He was hunchbacked and comparatively old, and it is not likely that the beautiful young queen regarded him otherwise than as a faithful servitor.

Mrs. C. A. S.—We have no personal knowledge of the article to which you refer. If you send us your real address, with stamp, we may be able to give you some further information on the subject.

J. C. G., Bryan City, Texas.—We comply with your request in this instance, although it is contrary to our practice. Your papers are mailed regularly from this office.

FOREIGN HONORS.—The Grover & Baker Sewing Machine Company can boast of right royal patronage. They have recently supplied two of their Elastic-Stitch Family Sewing Machines to Her Majesty by Royal command, and they also hold appointments from the Empress of the French, the Queen of Spain, and the Emperor of Brazil, while they have also supplied the Empress of Russia and the Queen of Bavaria. —London Mirror.

HALF WAY up Lookout Mountain, the place where memory is stirred by a thousand thrilling associations, and where the brave boys of both armies met and fought hand to hand—where the blood of both friend and foe was mingled together and ran down the mountain-side in rivulets—is a smooth-faced rock, upon which a poor wounded soldier inscribed the following:

"S. T.—1860—X.—Early in the battle I was wounded, and carried to this spot by two clever 'Yanks.' They bade me farewell, and as they supposed, to die, for I was so weak from loss of blood that I could but faintly thank them for their kindness. They left in my canteen a part bottle of Plantation Bitters, to which I owe my life, for it strengthened me, and kept life within me until help came and my wound was dressed. God bless them for their kindness, and for the Plantation Bitters. HENRY DAVAGEL, Co. B, 10th Ga." —Times.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

FROM A LONG-ESTABLISHED AND WELL-KNOWN HOUSE.—"We have sold BURNETT'S EXTRACTS (for cooking purposes) for several years, and believe them equal to any we have had hitherto, and find them gradually growing in the public favor." ACKER, MERRALL, & CONNIT, Grocers. NEW YORK, September 8, 1868.

JOSEPH BURNETT & Co., Sole Proprietors, 592 Broadway, New York; 27 Central Street, Boston.

These Extracts are for sale every where.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N. B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

SUPERIOR IMITATION GOLD HUNTING WATCHES.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one is warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. We are now manufacturing Gents' and Ladies' Watches of extra fine finish and quality, price $20. These are equal in appearance and time to gold ones costing $200. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay ALL the express charges.

C. E. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 NASSAU ST., N. Y., Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one Extra Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

[From the City Item, Philadelphia.]

THE OROIDE WATCHES.—A new metal, closely resembling gold, has been invented, of which watch-cases and watch-chains are made. C. E. Collins & Co., New York, are the manufacturers, and their advertisement will be found in another column. The Oroide Watches are in great demand. From all quarters of the Union, daily, hourly, come orders for one, two, ten, twenty, fifty, and one hundred watches. They are sold for only $15 each, and better time-keepers are not to be found. One of them has been going for a week in this office, and it is perfect in its movements. It looks as handsome, and keeps as good time as a watch costing $150.
We advise all who are about to buy a watch to try the Oroide.

[From the La Crosse Republican.]

OROIDE WATCHES.—Out of curiosity, we called when in New York at the Watch Manufactory of Messrs. C.
E. Collins & Co., on Nassau Street, and confess our astonishment on being shown their assortment of watches.
The cases made of this metal so closely resemble eighteen carat gold that we were puzzled to select a gold one placed amongst them. We should have no hesitation wearing one with full confidence that time would not change its appearance. Every watch is warranted, and the works are perfectly reliable and in all respects equal to a watch costing $150. We have no doubt that when once known in this section, many will be sent for.

[From the Liberal Christian.]

MESSRS. C. E. COLLINS & CO., of 37 and 39 Nassau St., are still further improving their beautiful Oroide Watches. These are excellent time-keepers, and for all practical purposes as good as a fine gold hunting-case watch.

[From the New York Independent.]

Our readers have probably observed in our paper the advertisement of C. E. Collins & Co.'s Oroide Watches.
These gentlemen are manufacturing a watch which they claim to have good time-keeping qualities, and in a case which is ornamental and durable, an almost exact imitation of gold. We have tried one of the watches, and find it a good time-keeper when well regulated. There are a great many persons in all classes of society who can not afford to pay a price of $40 or $60 for a first-class silver watch, nor $125 to $175 for a gold one, yet would like a handsome-looking watch, keeping fair time. The Oroide Watch appears to suit their case exactly.

Citizens of Toronto and the Dominion generally, take notice. We have hundreds of Testimonials, for which, see our advertisements. But you need no further evidence than the following, from one who is well known among you. Here is his proof positive—

HARRY HAZELTON, the well-known author, says:

"I have always looked upon cheap watches as humbugs and dealers in them as little better than swindlers.
At the request of a friend, I have worn for three months the watch he purchased of C. E. Collins, and for which he paid $15. It keeps accurate time, retains its perfect golden appearance, and I can really see no difference between it and my own, which cost five times the amount of the Collins Watch."

Mr. HAZELTON adds:

"I have since purchased FIVE of these watches, at the request of friends, and those for whom they were intended are perfectly satisfied. Others are seeking for them, and I fancy that Mr. C. will find some difficulty in supplying the constantly-increasing demand."

THE regular price of the watch is $15, and others costing $20. These are superbly finished, and really superior to any article placed upon the market costing five times that sum.

OFFICE STATE CAPITAL REPORTER, 42 and 44 J Street, SACRAMENTO, CAL., July 15, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

Gentlemen: Wells, Fargo & Co. delivered Watch and Chain, as per order; paid bill on presentation. The Watch and Chain give entire satisfaction, and several of my friends wish the same quality of watch and chain.
One is the chief editor of this paper, and two others are the publishers of this paper, and the others are for friends of mine, and by wearing your goods will make you a large sale in this city. I therefore wish you to send me seven watches and seven chains, of same quality as those you sent me, price paid you $15 for watch, and $6 currency for chain. I return you the guarantee; it may assist you in ascertaining the exact kind of goods sent me; the number of the watch sent is 66,982. If this order sent turns out as satisfactory as the first, we will give you a good editorial notice, and help you along as far as practicable. I send this order not for my benefit, but for yours and to accommodate my friends. Send to E. K. PHIPPS, Office of "State Capital Reporter," Sacramento, California.

Yours respectfully, E. K. PHIPPS.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR, VOL. II.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Published:

THE SECOND VOLUME OF

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. The Invasion of the Crimea: Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER
WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Vol.

... The polished diction and burnished style which first made their author famous are still maintained in this volume; and were the interest of the subject even less momentous, they would be eagerly read as specimens of a literary production of consummate skill.—Saturday Review.

By a happy accident the author has acquired extraordinary opportunities and advantages for ascertaining and verifying the incidents of a remarkable episode in history, with which the national honor is inextricably mixed up. He has shown himself willing to undergo any amount of personal sacrifice and responsibility for the adequate performance of what, to him, is both a public and a private duty. He has instituted a careful survey of the localities; he has consulted and collected dispatches and correspondence without end; he has personally communicated with statesmen and warriors, with almost all the leading actors and many of the less prominent characters who have figured on the scene, and he has got together a mass of information perhaps unequalled in pari materia for fullness, accuracy, interest, and variety.—Fraser's Magazine.

FACETIÆ.

THE John O'Groat's Journal says that a certain clergyman in the North told his congregation the other day that it was by eating the forbidden fruit that toothache was first caused.

THE MOST VALUABLE PRIZE—Enterprise.

At a recent Second Advent meeting in Wisconsin the preacher was very much annoyed by a Republican and a Democrat, on the outskirts of the meeting, discussing as to who would be the next President. The preacher approached them, and said: "My dear friends, you are exciting yourselves unnecessarily, and wasting precious time, in speculating as to the future President of the United States; for before an earthly election takes place our blessed Lord will be President every where." "I'll bet you $25," said the Democrat, "he can't carry Kentucky!"

BODY AND RAIMENT.—It was said in the olden time that the body was more than raiment; but now the raiment is often a great deal more than the body in value, and full five times as much in circumference.

"Biddy, did you put an egg in the coffee, to settle it?" "Yes, mum; I put in four; they were so bad, I had to use the more of them."

Which letter of the alphabet, if ailing, would make an instrument used in harvest-time? A sick L (sickle).

Some wags took a drunken fellow, placed him in a grave-yard, and waited to see the effect. After a short time the fumes of the liquor left him, and, his position being confined, he sat upright, and after looking around exclaimed: "Well, I'm the first that's riz, or else I'm confoundedly belated!"

ELEMENTARY PAGES.—Sheets of water.

A CHINESE-AMERICAN PLAY.—Burlingame.

What is the difference between a schoolmaster and a railroad conductor?—One trains the mind and the other minds the train.

Our friend F. E. Bust, who has just published a volume of "poetry," that has been widely reviewed, favorably and unfavorably, declares that there are three degrees of critical expression—criticism, hyper-criticism, and viper-criticism.

A city exquisite, having become agriculturally ambitious, went in search of a farm, and finding one for sale, began to bargain for it. The seller mentioned, as one of the farm's recommendations, that it had a very cold spring on it. "Ah—aw!" said the fop, "I won't take it then, for I've heard that a cold spring ruined the crops last year, and I don't want a place with such a drawback upon it."

A fellow, anxious to see the Queen, left his native village, and went to London, to gratify his curiosity. Upon his return his wife asked him what the Queen was like. "Loikh?" cried Hodge. "Why, I ne'er was so cheated in my life. What, don't think, Margaret? Her arms are loike thoine and moine, although I have heard excitemen say a score of times her arms were 'a lion and a unicorn.'"

Would Eve have eaten apples in the Garden of Eden if they had been seven dollars per barrel? We expect not. The state of Adam's funds would not have justified any such extravagance.

Ye who are eating the apple-dumplings and treacle of wealth should not forget those who are sucking the herring-bones of poverty.

ALL MOONSHINE.—A canard has been flying about to the effect that the authorities at Paris have seized the moon, on account of its being the parish Lanterne.

What is the difference between an auction and sea-sickness?—One is the sale of effects, the other the effects of a sail.

Why is an elephant forcibly running against a large tree like a traveler on a railroad?—Because he gets his trunk checked.

When Steepte married his fifth wife he sent the usual notice to the papers, with the addition, "To be continued."

A SATISFACTORY CHARACTER.

MRS. BRISKET (about the Master's new Bride). "Oh yes, Mum, She come in 'ere Yesterday, Mum. Bless Yer! a puffed Lady, Mum! Don't know one Jint o' Meat from another, Mum!"

A VERY OLD HABIT.

COUSIN LUCY. "Lor, Henry, you don't mean to say you Smoke?"
COUSIN HENRY. "Smoke! why, my dear Gal, I have smoked ever since I was a Boy!"
COUSIN LUCY. "What a long, long Time! How Tired you must be of it!"

A PROMISING BOY.

UNCLE. "Well, Johnny—why, what a Fine Fellow you are, Johnny, aren't you?"
JOHNNY (whose temper is uncertain). "No; I shall be a Fine Fellow when I can Beat Ev'ry Body wiz my Whip and Knock zu Down!"
[Uncle speaks of JOHNNY in future as a "singular child."]

Fortune knocks once, at least, at every man's door. Some men must have been out when she knocked at theirs.

THE BEST HEAD-QUARTERS—Brains.

Why are good resolutions like fainting ladies?—Because they want "carrying out."

MUSICIANS THAT NEVER FAIL TO DRAW—Mosquitoes.

BEHIND TIME—The back of a clock.

A FLORAL SWELL—The dandé-lion—the lion that lambs are not afraid of.

The leaves of the forest are ill-bred—they are always whispering in company.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—Four letters.

Mosquitoes never trust, of course—they invariably present their bills in advance.

A LEGAL TENDER—A lawyer's proposal of marriage.

A FACT.—A lady was deterred the other day from eating a cucumber with the peel on, for fear of the rind-er-pest.

FANCY FARMING—Harrowing up the feelings.

When is a bow not a bow?—When it is a bow-knot.

A Frenchman, being hard up for a dinner, stole a pig. He was caught in the act, taken before a magistrate, and called upon for his defense, when he thus delivered himself: "Oh, mon Dieu! I steal ze pig? No, Sar, I never! Aha, you shall see. I tell ze pig, will he go viz me? He says, 'Oul, oul!' and zen I take him. Is zat vat you call steal de pig, ven he go viz his own consent?"

"I fear," said a country curate to his flock, "when I explained to you in my last charity sermon that philanthropy was the love of our species, you must have understood me to say specie, which may account for the smallness of the collection. You will prove, I hope, by your present contribution, that you are no longer laboring under the same mistake."

A FEE COMMON TO EVERY BODY—Coffee.

Why is chicken pie like a gunsmith's shop?—Because it contains fowl-in-pieces.

THE MOST ENDURING TRESSES—Fortresses.

A waggish spendthrift recently said: "Five years ago I was not worth a cent in the world; now see where I am through my own exertions!" "Well, where are you?" "Why, I owe more than $3000."

Which times are the best?—Meal-times.

An advertisement in the London Times seriously announces a new song, with the modest request, "Oh, give me back but yesterday!" A companion to the above, "Oh, could you spare to-morrow?" is in the preparation, to be afterward followed by the sequel lyric of "You haven't got such a thing as next week about you, have you?"

BILL OF THE PLAY—William Shakspeare.

Little Julia L.—'s mother lay very ill, and the sweet child having heard some one say that "perhaps mamma would die," went in great grief to the bed, to ask if it were so. When her mamma replied that she might die and leave her dear little girl, the poor child, in the midst of her sobs, said: "Then, mamma, when you are dead I am afraid I shall play on Sunday!"

THE MOST COMMON LACE IN THE METROPOLIS—Popu-lace.

"Waiter, I want a napkin: s'pose you have 'em here, don't you?" said a customer yesterday, at one of the by-street restaurants. Waiter (just from the rural district) reads the bill of fare, and says: "All out, Sir; few in the market just now. Nice roast corn-beef; have some of that, Sir?"

The longest line in existence must be the telegraph line, for it extends from pole to pole.

Who can speak all languages?—Echo.

CAUGHT BY THE TIDE.—AN APPEAL TO CHARITY.

LOVELY HELEN. "Oh, won't a Single Gentleman come and take Me off!"

Reed Key Basket.

THIS simple and pretty basket is made of reeds and large and small round enameled beads, and is lined with green silk. Cut thirty-eight slender reeds, each four inches long, and two each sixteen inches long for the handle. Make holes through the shorter reeds an inch from one end and half an inch from the other, and through the longer reeds half an inch and three inches from each end. Run through each row of holes a thick wire, stringing on a bead between each reed, and fasten the ends of the wire. Fasten together the two reeds for the handle with three beads strung on yellow silk, which is also run through the holes bored for that purpose. For the lining of the basket take a piece of green silk fifty-two inches long and five inches wide, hem the upper edge an inch wide and the under edge narrow, and lay it in box-pleats; sew the ends together, and overseam it to the basket with green silk twist over the wire. For the bot-

REED KEY BASKET.

Needle-Work and Tatting Rosettes.

THE middle part of the rosette, Fig. 1, is embroidered. It consists of a star, which is worked on muslin in button-hole, satin, and half-polka stitch; the centre of this figure is formed of a small wheel. The illustration shows where the foundation is cut away. On this central part of the rosette work the following edge in two rounds: 1st round.—Tie together the foundation and working thread, fasten the foundation thread to the point of one of the figures of the star, and work * over the foundation thread a scallop composed of 7 ds., 1 p., 7 ds., fasten the foundation thread to the next embroidered point, make a picot with the working thread, and repeat eleven times from *. At the end of the round fasten the threads and cut them off. 2d round.—Again tie the threads together, fasten them to a picot in the middle of a scallop of the first round, and work * over the foundation a half scallop composed of 8 ds., then close on this, only with the foundation thread, a ring composed of 8 ds., fastened to the picot between the next two scallops of the former round, and then again 8 ds., and close on this now completed ring, again over the foundation thread, a half scallop of 8 ds. Fasten to the picot in the middle of the next scallop of the former round, and repeat from * eleven times. On the end of the round fasten the threads and cut them off.

The middle part of the tatted rosette, Fig. 2, consists of eight rings, and is worked with only one thread. On this work six rounds of scallops of graduated size, which are worked with two threads. Work, first, the central part of the rosette, in doing which work (with only one thread) a ring composed of 3 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., and close on this a similar ring, which must, however, be fastened to the last picot of the former ring instead of working the first picot. After this work six such rings, fastening the last to the first ring. Then cut the thread off. For the first scalloped round tie the foundation and working thread together and fasten to the middle picot of a ring, then work * over the foundation-thread a scallop composed of 6 ds.; fasten to the next ring, and make a small picot, and repeat from * seven times, after which fasten the threads and work five scalloped rounds in the same manner. Each round must, however, count more stitches than the preceding one.

Walking, Home, and Children's Dresses.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—Walking suit, dress, and paletot of light gray serge. The skirt is trimmed round the bottom with two narrow flounces of the same material; the paletot is bordered with netted fringe, and is looped up at the side with a bow and ends. Straw bonnet, trimmed with brown blonde and flowers. Brown silk parasol.

Fig. 2.—Walking costume. Dress of dark green Cretonne. Scarf-mantilla of black silk and lace. Straw round hat, trimmed with lace and wild flowers.

Fig. 3.—White alpaca dress and fichu. The under-skirt is striped with violet; the over-skirt, as well as the waist and fichu, is trimmed with a fluting of the same material, with a heading of pinked violet silk. The over-skirt is looped up with a bow and ends of violet ribbon in the manner shown by the illustration. Sash and ends of violet ribbon.

Fig. 4.—Dress of gray summer poplin, with violet silk trimming. Gray straw hat, trimmed with violet velvet and an aigrette of feathers.

Fig. 5.—Suit for girl from six to eight years old. Skirt with peasant-waist of white piqué; trimming of yellow piqué; blouse of white tucked batiste.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1868.

The first of a series of Elegant Colored Plates of the FALL AND WINTER FASHIONS, prepared in Paris by the proprietors of the MODE ILLUSTRÉE expressly for HARPER'S BAZAR, will be presented to our readers in an early Number.

DOWN TOWN.

IN most of our large cities there are two very distinct regions—up town and down town. The former is supposed to be more especially the scene of pleasure, and the latter that of business. Up town there are the dwelling-houses, the markets, retail shops, places of amusement, promenades, and whatever else may be essential to administer to the immediate requirements of social and domestic life. Here enjoyment is the object, expenditure of money the means, and woman the willing agent.

Down town there are the banks, the counting-rooms, and wholesale warehouses. Here the making of money is the object, business the means, and man the devoted agent.

This separation between up town and down town is becoming daily more marked. With the increase of population, and consequent enlargement of cities, the distance between the dwelling-house and place of business is rapidly widening. This severance of the two—the original motive for which was nothing but convenience—has not been without its effect upon social life and character. Business and pleasure have got so wide apart that they never, by any chance, come together. The mutual influence of the prudence of the one and the cheerfulness of the other, once so beneficial, is no longer felt, and it is now either all work with the man down town, or all play with the woman up town. The husband is, in fact, too busy, and the wife too idle. He is daily becoming more greedy, and she more prodigal. Their lives are passed in scenes so unlike, and their occupations and companions are so different that they naturally acquire such dissimilar habits and manners as to weaken the bond of sympathy between them. The husband is apt to be gross and matter-of-fact, and the wife superfine and sentimental. He might be refined by her delicacy, and she sobered by his prudence.

This wide separation of the place of business from home has a still worse effect, in severing the ties of father and child. During the youth of his children the male parent, actively engaged in business, can see but little of them. When he starts for down town in the morning they have not yet risen, and when he returns up town in the evening they have gone to bed. So, except on the Sunday, and one of our rare holidays, the father, having little of the society of his children, can not exercise upon them that controlling influence he should, or receive from their innocent prattle the lessons of purity and tenderness he so greatly needs.

Conceding all that convenience may demand, there is still an unnecessary separation between the home and the place of business. However widened the space may be between up and down town by the natural increase of the population and expansion of a city, it is more than compensated for by the proportionate facility of communication of various kinds. There is really no absolute necessity for the long daily absence of most men of business from their homes. In the busiest times it is astonishing how many hours are wasted by the busiest men, not only in superfluous talk about their affairs, but in mere gossip which has not the remotest relation to dry-goods, hardware, or stocks, and in lurching and drinking at Delmonico's or elsewhere. With a more systematic regulation of time, merchants would be able to spare easily two or three hours out of the middle of each day for the enjoyment of the society of their wives and children. The luncheon eaten at home would cost less, digest better, and be more unlikely, under the watchful eye of the mistress of the household, to be moistened with those dangerous fluids of the restaurant and bar-room. This frequent companionship, moreover, would enliven and perpetuate the domestic sympathies, and man and wife, thus sharing each other's daily thoughts, and having more interests in common, would no longer, as now, live as strangers to each other.

There seems no reason in fact why people of moderate means in this country should not, as they do in Europe, carry on various kinds of business in the same houses where they dwell. Any thing would be better than that constantly widening space between the daily lives of married people, which is fatal to domestic character, causing the husband to devote himself more and more exclusively to business, and the wife to pleasure. If they were more closely associated with each other in both there would be more prudence in the one and moderation in the other; and thus there would remain fewer greedy, speculative men, and idle, spendthrift women.

DRESSING FOR COMPANY.

IT is the overdressed dame of the promenade and drawing-room who is the most apt to be the slattern of the domestic parlor and nursery. The woman who makes a point of dressing, as she calls it, for company, is generally very indifferent to the aspect she presents at home. With her there is no decent mean between dress and undress, the stiffness of formality and the laxity of negligence. She is like the tragedy queen of the play-house—a splendid sovereign before the foot-lights, and a dirty drab behind the scenes.

The moderately dressed woman, on the contrary, generally makes a uniform appearance of becoming neatness. Guided by good taste and sense she dresses for home, knowing that what is decorous there will be always presentable to any company elsewhere. There are many wives of a fashionable tendency who presume too much on marital indulgence or indifference. These think that, after having caught their birds with chaff, they may throw it to the winds; but birds thus taken are only to be kept by a continued supply. Any woman who, after having won a husband by her fashionable airs, expects to retain his affections by a careless indifference to her appearance at home will find out probably her mistake, and it is to be hoped, before it may be too late.

The most fatal error a woman can make is to presume thus far upon her privileges as a wife. No man can long endure a slattern at home, and especially if she appears the fine lady abroad, and thus shows her contemptuous preference of the opinion of others to his.

Women of moderate means, instead of concentrating their pecuniary forces upon this or that showy and expensive article of toilette, in order to dress for company, while they remain in a shabby negligence at home, would do more wisely to provide themselves with an abundant and decorous household wardrobe. A wise and true wife will take care that her house shall always wear an aspect cheerful and alluring to her husband. Men confess to the weakness, if a weakness, of being greatly attracted and influenced in their disposition to love by the mere dress of woman. Fielding, who had a wife whom he loved, and who was altogether worthy of his love, says of her in that minute portraiture of her charms, in his "Amelia," that with the assistance of a little girl, who was their only servant, she managed to dress the dinner, and likewise "dressed herself as neat as any lady who had a regular set of servants could have done." This charming woman was also equally attentive to every other domestic duty. She took as much pleasure in cooking "as a fine lady generally enjoys in dressing herself for a ball." She, moreover, "never let a day pass without instructing her children in some lesson of religion and morality; by which means she had, in their tender minds, so strongly annexed the ideas of fear and shame to every idea of evil of which they were susceptible, that it must have taken great pains and length of habit to separate them." Neatness and order in the personal dress of the housewife are thus generally accompanied by regularity and completeness in the performance of every domestic duty.

To appear well-dressed, in the eye of the man, requires no great outlay of money, for it is notorious that he prefers the elegance of simplicity to all the display of expensive art. The neat maid thus is not seldom more to his taste than the showy mistress. He asks only for neatness, fitness, and harmony of color. If women dressed only to please him, they might dispense with nine-tenths of the expenditure upon their toilettes. But women dress to please—we were going to, but should rather say, displease—each other, for their main object seems to be to provoke the envy of their sisters by an impossible costliness of attire.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

On Fast Horses.

MY DEAR ECLIPSE,—How many thousands of dollars did you pay for your new horse? and is it true that he can trot a mile in two minutes and seventeen seconds, instead of two minutes and eighteen seconds, which is the speed of your neighbor Nimrod's mare? My dear fellow, I congratulate you with all my heart. If any thing ought to suffuse your rosy cheek with a brighter hue, it is the consciousness that your horse will do a mile in one second less than any other. The night before taking Quebec and making himself immortal, General Wolfe was reading Gray's Elegy and he said: "I would rather be the author of that poem than take Quebec to-morrow." I suppose you have something of the same feeling. You would rather be the owner of a two-seventeen horse than write another "Hamlet."

I wonder if your horse is better than other horses—that is, stronger and surer? I wonder if any human or other animal is benefited by his existence? I see the value of a Normandy cart-horse. I watch the noble creatures in the express wagons with immense admiration. They help us in the great and necessary work of life. They draw enormous burdens. The strong horses pull the plow, the harrow, the mower, the reaper. I stop in the road and see them with infinite pleasure, and I should like to look into their stables, and see if they are treated with proper gratitude and consideration. But when I see Nimrod sitting in a light wagon or a trotting-sulky, leaning forward over the dasher, holding the reins with both hands, and flying along the road, passing every thing, his horse all aflame, and Nimrod's whole soul bent upon his horse, I look at them both, and I have some sympathy for the horse, but I feel toward the good Nimrod very much as I should toward the excellent Mr. Blondin who used to walk upon a tight-rope across the Niagara River. Or very much as the daughter of a friend of mine, whose active mind caused her to speculate for some time upon the baldness of the family clergyman, until, overpowered by curiosity, she stood before him, and rubbing the top of her head symbolically, said to him: "What did you do it for?" Why does a man put one end of a rein into a horse's mouth and himself at the other end, and then tear along the ground at the rate of a mile in two minutes and seventeen seconds?

Yes—I confess that I am trotting too fast. I make no allowance for the excitement, the exhilaration, the glow. "Why be narrow and hypercritical?" you justly ask. King James certainly did not dispose of the tobacco question when he said that it converted a man's mouth and nose into a chimney. The wretched old pedant would doubtless have been a happier man and a better king if he had smoked. That he did not was probably no virtue. I have no doubt tobacco made him sick, and that he had a personal spite against it. Besides, if James be a specimen of a non-smoker and Milton was a friend of the weed—I hear you say—who would not rather put himself at one end of a tobacco-pipe than at that of a sceptre? Certainly, and the truth is that tobacco has nothing to do with the question. The Paradise Lost is certainly not a tobacco fume, and James was undoubtedly a miserable king. But still tastes do indicate character. The modern James who blows his counterblast against tobacco with all the geniality of the most accomplished player upon the pipe, remarks the peculiar fondness of Mr. Webster for cattle. He liked to look upon a spacious green pasture full of great cattle calmly grazing. There was a largeness, a repose in the spectacle which charmed him. Were they not also keys to a corresponding largeness and placidity of nature? You feel it, I think, at once. Webster is a type of the man who delights in stately cattle. And the type of the man who is fond of fast horses—he is different from Webster.

And what is the magic which seems to pervert a man's character when he is dealing in horses? It really seems as if he would cheat his brother if he were selling him a horse. There are men who are evidently more ashamed of being taken in in "a trade" than they would be of a very serious moral offense. And there are jockeys who enjoy as much unalloyed satisfaction in doctoring a horse so that his defects are hidden from the shrewdest eye, as if they had performed some great act of mercy and had relieved vast suffering. Is it to be considered the satisfaction which always springs from the triumph of skill? Does a burglar perceive it when he does his dark work dextrously? Is this what De Quincey means by the fine art of murder?

It would be an extremely curious study to trace character in taste for animals. I mean to trace it carefully, and to treat it scientifically, and philosophically, and seriously, and all that. You, for instance, my dear Eclipse, are devoted to horses. I really think you would prefer a fine horse to the welfare of your country. I should fear that your moral firmness would be awfully shaken if Mr. Vanderbilt and Mr. Robert Bonner should say to you, "Eclipse, we will each give you our best animal if you will write a letter to the New York Observer publicly renouncing the Christian religion." Mind, I do not say you would do it; and I am far from saying that they would reward you in that manner if you did. But let us make the supposition—and how do you feel about it? Is there not a nervous reaching for the pen and ink, and a vague dawn of wonder whether you will become Mohammedan or Ashantee?

But are you a horse at bottom? that is the question. Thackeray says of George the Fourth that if you come to analyze him you find a coat and then a waistcoat, and then another, and then more waistcoats, and then—nothing. Now if we proceed to analyze you, shall we find first a coat and then a waistcoat, then a shirt, then Eclipse, and then horse? The old story of Circe, you remember—You remember! I beg your pardon. I suppose you remember no classical, historical, or mythological character but Bucephalus. However, it is none the less true, the old story of Circe had just this moral. She was the enchantress who invited the unwary wanderers into her palace, and they became brutes of every kind. Nowadays we are not content to believe that stories are stories. We think that they are parables. The pretty tale is a mask and a cloak, and we fall to prodding it to discover what kind of figure is hidden under it. It is agreed that this pleasant old legend of Circe depicts men imbruted by a favorite vice. So if we can at last discover a horse under your waistcoat it is because there is too much horse in your fancy.

Is it so unreasonable an idea? You have seen, I think, my aunt Flora. She is an authority upon humming-birds. It is beautiful to see her and to hear her when a bird is actually near or the subject is introduced. Her house is embowered in honey-suckles. Her walls are hung with pictures of the dear little charmer, "the most exquisite of the feathered tribe," as Aunt Flora poetically says. Her books are all ornithological, and the humming-bird pages are all worn away and carefully mended. I suppose my aunt Flora is in a state of metempsychosis. She is really a humming-bird, and is now passing through the human stage. But her humming-bird soul remains—and if you saw the amount of sugar she takes in her tea you would have no doubt of it.

Her son Ned is not a humming-bird. Far from it. He eats enormously. That young boy is an old glutton, and I have known him to burst into tears because he could eat no more apple-dumpling. "I have shook myself," said that ungrammatical child, sobbing heavily—"I have shook myself awful, but it—it—it—does no goo-o-o-d!" and his remarks ended in a loud hysterical explosion of grief. He is fond of sitting in the sun near the pig-sty, and watching those fat sleek porkers. If he were astray upon Circe's island, and ventured near her palace, I should know exactly where to look for Ned. If, distracted with her grief, Aunt Flora hopped and flew about, twittering piteously, and looking into all the honey-suckles to find her truant son—and I heard a grunt—I should exclaim, with the utmost confidence, "There he is, dear Aunt Flora; I heard his voice."

So the other evening, when I went to the caucus with my friend Pry, and heard the eloquent orator, who was introduced as a great statesman upon whom all honest men might rely, I looked at him with surprise and curiosity. He seemed as smooth and shining and slippery as if he had been covered all over with soap, and meant to slip into our confidence whether we would or not. He says nothing frankly: he pursues no end directly. He twists and turns, and prefers turning and twisting as, upon the whole, the surest way to success. Now, you may call him what you will—but I am sure if we could only put him ashore upon Circe's island, we should very soon see a huge serpent gliding away in the shrubbery.

As I go wandering about in the Central Park, and see you and your friends dash by with all your souls absorbed in your fast horses, I can not help believing that there is something essentially equine in you, and that your good and bad qualities are really those of horses. Then I go on and wonder if here is not a vague confirmation of the Darwinian theory of endless development and selection; whether life, in whatever form, wholly loses the characteristics of its earlier types; whether there is not in your devotion to your team, and your unspeakable delight in owning a two-seventeen horse, an indication of the unity of creation!

Here you see I am on a high horse, from which I make all haste to descend. Wolfe the soldier would gladly have been Gray the poet. I suppose it was because the talent of another seems to us so beautiful that we can not believe it to be only another form of the power that works in us. On the other hand, I, an old pedestrian, can not understand your ecstasy in a fast horse. It is then my business to remember that it is because I am still in the bondage of narrowness with King James, and have not comprehended that human nature is large enough to delight with honest pleasure both in a fast horse and an epic poem.

Yours, dear Eclipse,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

NEW BONNETS.

AT the millinery openings a great many Fanchons and Fanchonettes were displayed as pattern bonnets from the best Parisian houses. This shape is universally becoming, and will continue to be worn throughout the season, perhaps longer, but, as we told our readers some time ago, it is no longer the only choice. Milliners say they are making for their most fashionable customers a high, round pouf bonnet that encircles the front of the head above the ears, sloping upward at the back to fit snugly on the edge of the high chignon. The diadem, a conspicuous feature this season, is better adapted to this round shape than to the Fanchon with long ears. Puffs and erect aigrettes behind prevent the diadem from looking too high and prominent. When properly adjusted to the head the new shape will be found to have the becoming effect that has kept the Fanchon so long in favor.

All the different materials, satin, faille, velvet, lace, feathers, and flowers, enter into each bonnet. Diadems are of jet, flowers, feathers, and lace quillings, but most frequently of velvet lined with satin of another color, the lining showing at the edges like piping. On the body of the bonnet the material is shirred, puffed, or in reversed pleats, never plain on the frame. Narrow strings tied behind with falls of lace and velvet in front still prevail, but not to the exclusion of bows under the chin as during the summer. With the present fashion of cutting dresses low at the throat the front bow is becoming and comfortable in cold weather.

Lace drapery falling low at the sides, and caught at the back of the chignon by a bow and ends, is a graceful feature of winter bonnets. A novelty in lace falls has a wide pleat behind, pointed like a hood, and trimmed with bows, à la Renaissance, down the centre. The front of this drapery has revers fastened by a bow without ends.

The Sultan red introduced last season is a favorite color for bonnets, as it is becoming to dark and fair alike, provided the complexion is clear. Florence green, lighter than Metternich, and the royal pink, so long out of use, are selected for youthful faces; garnet, the rich, warm crimson, leaf-brown, and gold-yellow with black, are chosen for those more mature. The light shades of French gray, drab, and brown are contrasted with Alexandria blue, with scarlet and cherry. Violet is trimmed with deeper purple. White still prevails for evening hats.

Straw bonnets are not largely imported at this season of the year. A few waved and plaited braids, gray, brown, and black, and the yellow Italian straws, are shown. Wreaths of scarlet berries, shaded autumn leaves, or pansies of different color, form the diadem; loops and bows of velvet and short ostrich tufts complete the trimming. The diadem may be of pleated velvet, with a jet Marguerite or a humming-bird in the centre.

Crape bonnets for fresh mourning cover the frame smoothly, with a diadem of reversed pleats. Jet diadems of square blocks are designed especially for mourning. Black royal velvet and lustrous faille are used for more dressy mourning, trimmed with Brussels net and jet ornaments.

HATS.

Round hats are almost universally worn at this transition season before new bonnets are purchased. A black straw hat, high crowned with turned-up rim is the shape most generally adopted. It is called promiscuously the Valois, the Louis Quinze, and the Rupert. Small birds with long, graceful plumage ornament the left side. The black velvet Deauville sloping from the middle, back and front is the most elegant of the new styles, and is too expensive to become common. The trimming of quilled lace and flowers is massed over the forehead. The Sultan's fez, a round crown like an inverted cup, is a piquant novelty, becoming to a pretty face. It is made by sewing successive rows of lace or puffs of satin around the frame. Clusters of flowers, feathers, and lace, or ribbon rosettes, are arranged on the top of this Turkish cap. Long strings of narrow ribbon tie under the chignon. Lace veils drooping at the side are sometimes added, but they detract from the character of the hat. Sultan red is the proper color for this hat, but all others are used. The felt hats are of excellent material. High colors, such as garnet, are shown in felt. Skating turbans have tops of colored velvet with sides of Astrakhan seal-skin, or wreath of curled ostrich feathers.

SPECIMENS OF NEW BONNETS.

A pouf bonnet of sultan velvet has a diadem of pleated lace and velvet with a jet Marguerite in the centre. Light puffs of velvet cover the frame. A large rose, the petals of satin, is on the left. Behind is a fall of thread lace pointed like a baschlik hood, with small velvet bows down the centre, and fastened under the chin by a large bow. Price $50.

A black velvet is made with reversed plaits over the frame. A wreath of wild roses with satin leaves is in front, with a trailing vine at the side. Narrow strings of bias velvet with a jet pendant.

A blue velvet in three puffs is trimmed with scarlet velvet leaves. Blue feathers at the side clasped by a jet ornament. Lace falls at the side connected behind by scarlet bows.

A Fanchon of light gray velvet has a diadem of scarlet ostrich feathers, with a humming-bird in the centre. Loops of wide velvet ribbon behind. An evening bonnet of white royal velvet has a wreath of apple-blossoms in front, and drooping at the sides. A veil of white embroidered lace is fastened by a bow in front. Price $25. A brown uncut velvet for an elderly lady has a diadem of cut jet, with garnet ostrich feathers among the puffs. A leaf-brown velvet has velvet leaves clustered over the front. Purple velvet and satin combined has an aigrette of black ostrich and white heron's feathers.

A Sultan hat or fez of black velvet puffed around the frame is studded with jet ornaments with pendants. Short black and orange feathers on top drooping around the hat. Strings of velvet ribbon a yard and a quarter long are tied behind. Price $20. A second of Sultan red satin placed smoothly over the frame is covered with gathered thread lace. A scarlet rose and buds with brown leaves on top. Satin strings. A high-crowned Valois hat of black straw has the turned-up brim lined with black satin pleated, and held against the crown by jet ornaments. Folds of black satin around the crown. A small bird in front with gay plumage.

The Spanish mantilla is an elegant coiffure for drives in the Park during the soft twilight of Indian Summer. In Paris it is worn to the Opera. It is of thread net, edged with fine lace. Two rows of lace over the head are caught by a rosette of black ribbon. The ends, a yard in length, are crossed in front and thrown over the shoulders. A rosette of bright colors would enliven the black, but Spanish ladies never introduce a color into this part of their costume.

BONNET MATERIALS.

FRAMES AND LINING.

As many ladies make their own bonnets, thereby saving a large outlay, we give a few hints about the materials. First, select the frame. The new pouf bonnets are complicated, requiring the skill of an experienced milliner; hence it is best to attempt only a simple Fanchon with a high front. This should be narrow across the top, short at the ears, with a raised diadem. Milliners prefer wire frames with lace cover for silk or satin bonnets, buckram for velvet. Fifty cents is the usual price of frames. Turbans and Deauville frames of light buckram are bought at the same price. An eighth of a yard of Marseline silk, cut bias of the proper shape for lining, is furnished for fifteen cents; muslin for five. Silk is preferred, as it does not catch in the hair. A slip of argentine or oil-paper is placed inside to protect the bonnet from the oil of the hair.

SILK, SATIN, AND VELVET.

Buy silks, satins, and velvets cut bias from the piece. Narrow silks, plain taffeta, and corded, cut on the bias, cost from $1 50 to $2 a yard. If shirred on the frame half a yard is necessary; three-eighths covers the frame plainly, and affords enough for folds. Satin of all the fashionable shades is bought at $3 a yard. If only used for trimming, such as binding the frame, for piping or folds, the quantity required is from an eighth to a quarter cut bias. Half a yard makes a shirred or puffed bonnet. Scotch plaid satin, in high colors, for trimming, is $4 50 a yard. Bonnet velvets with good pile cost from $3 50 to $6. A fair quality of black velvet is sold at $5. The drab shades are in great variety. A puffed Fanchon with pleated diadem requires half a yard of velvet, with some satin for trimming. The fine corded velvet called royale is $6 a yard. Uncut velvet with coarser cords is less expensive. Silk plush, for round hats, is from $3 to $4 50 a yard. This is much narrower and lighter than the cloak plush. For mourning bonnets the best English crape should be selected. It is heavier than the French crape, with deeper crimps, and is worn for winter and summer. The roll crape is better than that brought in boxes, as there is no crease in the centre. A good quality is $4 a yard. From a quarter to three-eighths is the quantity for a plain bonnet; if made in folds, half a yard is necessary.

Two yards of satin ribbon, two inches wide, for strings, are tied behind. Fifty cents a yard. Corded ribbon for the same purpose is seventy-five cents.

ORNAMENTS.

A factitious value is given to fine flowers, making it difficult to give a positive guide in prices. A fashionable diadem for a lady of thirty is of black Marguerites with yellow centres, or a coronet vine of crystallized autumn leaves. Large pansies, different colors in the same wreath, are bought of fair quality for $3 50. A diadem of scarlet berries for a young girl is $4. Sprays of the wild rose made of velvet and satin for eighty cents adorn the black velvet hats of blondes, while the scarlet pomegranate clusters, mountain-ash berries, rose geranium, and yellow butter-cups are selected for dark-haired brunettes.

Tiny humming-birds, with long bills and outspread wings, nestle amidst laces in the centre of the coronet, or are poised on the left side of the bonnet with long plumage attached; an objectionable fashion because not true to nature. A variety of small birds are sold at $2 apiece. The stylish feathers, white and colored, are from $2 to $3 50. The prettiest aigrettes are of curled ostrich feathers with heron's feathers erect in the centre. Breasts of peacocks and of gulls for round hats are from $2 50 to $4. Short ostrich tufts are inexpensive and very fashionable. Four tufts, different shades of one color, adorn a hat. Long white plumes of the ostrich are $5. The pretty wreaths, made of the tips of peacock's feathers, cost $2. They encircle a round hat, trimming it completely. Cheap feathers are pieced together and colored. The natural feathers are more expensive, but it is economy to buy them. We have spoken of the jet ornaments in a previous Number.

We give as a model that can be easily imitated a simple bonnet that attracted admiration at a recent opening. It was made in royal pink satin and black velvet for a fair young face. Sultan red, green, purple, or gold-yellow, may be substituted for pink. The shape is a diadem Fanchon. The satin is shirred on the frame, each row of gathers an inch apart. The black velvet diadem is lined with pink satin. It is two inches wide at the top, sloping narrower at the sides; is sewn in the centre in small box-pleats, and continued below the ears in strings three-eighths of a yard long. These are merely for ornament; a jet pendant is at the ends, and a small satin bow joins them together. On the left side of the bonnet is an aigrette of black ostrich and white heron's feathers, clasping a satin rose, shaded pink with brown leaves. A velvet bow without ends, with a jet flower in the centre, is placed on the back of the bonnet. This bonnet is sold at $25, but can be made by any one of taste and ingenuity for half that price.

We have said nothing about lace, because it is most frequently used for elaborate bonnets that require the artistic hands of a milliner.

PERSONAL.

A REPORT comes from Berlin that VON GRAEFFE, the most eminent of living oculists, promises restoration of sight to the Rev. Mr. MILBURN, who is now in that city for the purpose of undergoing the necessary operation.

—It was very neat and complimentary in DE QUINCEY, on being asked why there were more women than men, to reply: "It is in conformity with the arrangements of nature; we always see more of heaven than earth."

—The QUEEN OF PRUSSIA is off on a little private pleasure tour in France, traveling under the name of COUNTESS HOENTHAL. At Marseilles it was only after she had gone that people became aware that she had been there. The Queen visited nearly all the public buildings and curiosities, not forgetting the hospitals, where she remained longer than in other places.

—Colonel ROBERT M. DOUGLAS, son of the late STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, has made his debut in the political world in a speech delivered a few days since at Raleigh, North Carolina. It is spoken of as a very creditable performance. The young gentleman has been thoroughly educated, is very ambitious, and, as Private Secretary to Governor HOLDEN, starts out in his public career under the most favorable auspices.

—In reference to Mr. BURLINGAME'S mission, "Carleton," the correspondent of the Boston Journal, says that he has information from the interior of China to the effect that the Chinese suppose that Mr. B.'s mission will result in the opening of the whole of the empire to foreigners, and before long the Canton, Yang-te-ze, and all other navigable streams will be open to steam, and that railroads will be introduced. All of which will come to pass, John Bull to the contrary notwithstanding.

—The Rev. Mr. BELLEW, whose fame has not yet reached the hamlets of this country, but who is spoken of as one of the most earnest, fervent, and impassioned preachers in England, is on the point of emerging from the English realm to give a series of readings in the United States. A London admirer says that there is no reader in the present century that can at all compare with Mr. BELLEW—not the late Mr. THACKERAY nor Mr. C. DICKENS. Mr. B. is about thirty-five years of age, although his hair is as silvery white as that of a man of eighty. His person is commanding, eyes black and fine, voice melodious and sonorous, and his whole manner, while speaking, most fascinating. If this "account of stock," as taken by an admirer, be correct, Mr. B. will go back to his native hearth laden with much coin.

—We make a "personal" note of it that a few weeks since, during the progress of the Annual Regatta of the Columbia Boat Club, on the Hudson, Miss DAVIS, of Pleasant Valley, in company with Dr. WITHERS, pulled a two-oared boat, and for some distance held her own with the competing boats. Her skillful manner of handling the blades attracted much attention. The champion rowers affected to sneer at it; but "let the galled jade wince; our (Dr.) WITHERS are unwrung."

—CHARLES READE, the eminent English novelist, contemplates a visit to this country. He is a tall, stately, handsome man, of about forty-five years of age, with hair just turning gray. He is affable and witty in conversation, and thinks the republic of the United States a good style of things because it buys many novels written by C. R.

—If there were more General SYLVANUS THAYERS in the world American colleges would soon rival in the magnitude of their endowments, the Oxfords and Cambridges of the Old World. The General has added $10,000 to his previous donation of $40,000 for the endowment of the "THAYER School of Architecture and Civil Engineering." The college has also had the good fortune to receive, lately, a legacy of $10,000 from the estate of the late Hon. WILLIAM REED, of Marblehead.

—WORMLEY, of Washington (every body who has been in Washington for many years and enjoyed the comforts of his cuisine knows WORMLEY), has just returned from England, whither he went with the Hon. REVERDY JOHNSON, to assist in arranging the household matters of that gentleman. WORMLEY is a good man.

—Mr. DISRAELI has, during his brief premiership, given the strongest evidence of his sympathy with the widows and dependents of literary people. His last kind act in this particular was to grant to the widow of SAMUEL LOVER a continuance of the pension of £100 per annum which her husband received in his lifetime from the Government. To various living authors and artists Mr. DISRAELI has been noticeably considerate; no man knowing better than he the tolls, the cares, the anxieties of him whose daily bread is daily kneaded from his brain.

—RISTORI is made the subject of huge exaggeration when her profits from her American trip are written about in continental journals. One enthusiastic figurer states her receipts to have been 317,000 francs, about one-third of which the eminent artiste has expended in the purchase of a splendid estate, which she calls the "Villa Ristori."

—The lady preachers are taking full part in the higher ecclesiastical ceremonies. Some two or three weeks since Mrs. HANAFORD, of Hingham, Massachusetts, and OLYMPIA BROWN, of Weymouth, both of them ordained ministers, took part in the ordination of Rev. WILLIAM G. HASKELL, at Marblehead. Mrs. HANAFORD read the hymn, and read the Scriptures to the candidate; both ladies, with two male clergymen, performed the laying-on of hands, and Miss BROWN made the concluding prayer. In delivering the charge Mrs. HANAFORD described herself as "Phebe, servant of the Church of Hingham," and declared it as her belief that "there is neither tribe, nor caste, nor sex in the religion of Jesus." As a whole, her charge is said to have been "masterly, womanly, and impressive."

—Baron JAMES DE ROTHSCHILD is a maker as well as consumer of good claret. He has purchased the famous estate of Château Lafite, and expresses the opinion that the wine crop this year will be the best since 1811. Its value is estimated at two hundred thousand dollars.

—It may possibly agitate the bosom of some male reader of the Bazar to know that a paper in Decatur, Illinois, contains the advertisement of a lady who wants a husband. He must be handsome, well off, temperate, anti-tobacco, and go to church regularly. The lady is twenty-seven, fair, and good-looking, and has money.

—The millionaire of Chicago is Mr. POTTER PALMER, and this is the way in which he manoeuvred to become so: He went to Chicago shortly before the war with $7000 worth of dry goods, did business on the high-pressure principle, bought enormously before gold went up, made a vast sum, bought again immensely in the nick of time, run his fortune up among the millions, and then sold out clean, putting his money into real estate in Chicago, which he is now covering with marble blocks. Mr. PALMER is near forty years of age, slim of stature, dresses very richly, is a bachelor, and, considering his gigantic enterprises in Chicago, probably the most noteworthy man in the West. He began life as a farmer's boy.

—We have a fresh and very good "personal" of ALEXANDRE DUMAS. An American gentleman called on him on his 78th birthday (in August last), and found him reclining in a huge easy-chair, clad only in a pair of linen pants and a white shirt, whose front was entirely open displaying his bosom. Although he reads and writes American fluently he can not talk it a particle. He said he was as familiar with the writings of FENIMORE COOPER as with those of any writer in France, and his idea of the United States seemed strongly impregnated with the romances of Indian life and legend, and his conversation tended in a great measure to recall the scenes so beautifully depicted by his favorite American author. He is extremely obese, and moves about with great difficulty. He is a man of powerful frame, as well as mind, and labors almost incessantly with his pen. His features are decidedly African, and his woolly hair reminds us in its grayness of the old Uncle Tom. As age grows upon him he becomes the victim of peculiar whims and fancies; he cooks his own food, conducting the culinary ceremony with a religious exactitude, and is always satisfied with his cuisine productions. When he eats, and that is very irregularly and seldom—he apparently enjoys his food. After his meals he returns to his chair and dictates to his amanuensis until nature prevails and he drops off into a calm slumber. He scarcely ever retires to a bed, but sits and sleeps an hour or two and instantly upon awakening calls for his amanuensis and proceeds with his work. He is said to have been greatly attached to MENKEN and grieves much at her decease.

—Mr. BRIGHAM YOUNG, of Utah, has "popped" to Miss ANNETTE INCE, the actress, offering her the undivided one-fiftieth fraction (a "vulgar" fraction), of his heart and hand; but Miss I. is said to have dropped a stage courtesy to the hoary old sinner, and declined the honor.

—ISABELLA, Queen of Spain, who is now a fugitive from her country, and whose further occupancy of the throne depends upon the result of the revolution now in progress, weighs 225 pounds, has become very homely, and when she appears in public with her two eldest daughters, both of whom are handsome, the contrast is striking. The Queen's husband is said to be quite stupid, both in intellect and appearance. He is always in debt, and the Queen herself is generally "short." The better class of Madrid look with contempt on the royal family, and in Madrid there are very few girls bearing the name of Isabella.

—The father of Prince MENTCHIKOFF must have been a jocosely old gentleman. He was a mechanic; and when he first visited St. Petersburg was much pleased with the Opera. He asked his son, then at the head of the Government, for an office, and on being asked what office, replied that he should like to supersede the leader of the orchestra!

—A correspondent of the Chicago Tribune, writing from this city, gives a column of pleasant chat relative to Mrs. HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, whose fine productions have often graced the pages of Harper's Magazine and Bazar. She was married several years since to RICHARD S. SPOFFORD, a young lawyer of Boston, who is an active politician, and spends much of his time in Washington. She refutes the argument, so often put forward, of the unhappiness of literary marriages, and of the unhappiness of literary women for wives. She is the embodiment of affection and devotion to her husband, with whom she fell in love, it is said, at first sight, fifteen years ago, and whom she loves with all the fervor and intensity of her girlhood. She is very retiring and domestic, and so shy, withal, that she seldom goes into the smallest company when she can avoid it.

She lives, from the beginning of January to the end of December in the pleasant but stagnant old town of Newburyport, writing from one to eight hours a day, laboring so contentedly and cheerfully for others that she shames the paltry exertions men often make and boast of in the name of sacrifice.

She is probably twenty-eight now, good-looking, graceful, and seemingly self-possessed, though really so shrinking and timid that she can hardly be induced to meet the most commonplace stranger. She is tall and lithe; her face pale and oval; her eyes large and dark, and full of poetry and passion; her hair deep brown; her nose of the Grecian pattern; her lips rather thin, but red and symmetrical. She talks eloquently and fluently before her friends; but before those she does not know she withdraws into herself, and is so reserved and silent that no one would imagine for a moment that she is the fine creature NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE called the most gifted woman in America.

Patterns for Worsted Work.

We give several different patterns for worsted work, which may be easily executed with the aid of the accompanying symbols.

Fig. 1.—This design may be used for a note-book or cigar-case. If it be desired to use it for the outside it is best worked in fine beads, but if for the inside, work with worsted and silk, or entirely with silk on perforated board, or even in petit point on silk canvas.

Figs. 2-4.—These figures give different designs for slippers, bags, sofa-pillows, etc. These patterns may also be worked with very coarse worsted for hearth-rugs, etc.

Fig. 5.—This design is intended for a purse, but may also be used for a note-book, brush, etc.

Fig. 6.—Slipper pattern. The light shades are best worked with silk twist.

Figs. 7 and 8.—These designs are for mats, cushions, etc.

Figs. 9 and 10.—Two borders for baskets, tidies, etc.

an easy and simple manner of making tirettes, by means of which a trained dress may be looped up in a puff behind in the Watteau or Camargo style. Sew small brass rings on the back of the skirt in the manner shown by Fig. 2; the distance of these rings from the belt varies according to the length of the train of the dress. Through these rings run two silk cords of the color of the dress, sew one end of these cords fast inside the belt of the dress, and run the other end through a small button-hole between the front and side breadths of the skirt. Finish the ends on this side with a button covered with the material of the dress, which prevents them from slipping through. When it is desired to loop up the dress draw the cord, thereby pulling the skirt in the manner shown by Fig. 2. In letting it down, pull the skirt slightly behind, whereupon it falls easily.

Needle-Work and Crochet Edging.

See illustration on page 805.

To make this edging, work first the three small berries together on muslin with medium knitting cotton. The crochet work is done with fine cord. Sew around the berries in half-polka stitch, cut the material away close, and work together the three leaflets as follows: 8 ch., passing over the last of these back on the next six, 1 sc. (single crochet), 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 2 dc. (double crochet), 1 sdc., 1 sc., after this two leaves worked in a similar manner and 1 sc. in the first stitch of the first 8 ch. and in the first berry, on which fasten the thread. Having finished the requisite number of these leaf-twigs and berries, join them, first, by means of one round of crochet. Crochet 1 sc. in the outside edge of a berry, putting the needle through from the left side; work 5 ch., 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the edge of the opposite berry of the same twig, 7 ch., 1 sl. in the outer edge of a new twig, etc. Then work for the scallops on the outer edge of the lace three rounds as follows: 1st round.—1 sl. in the middle of the chain stitches which join two twigs, * 3 ch., 1 dc. in the next berry, 4 ch., 2 dc. separated by 5 ch. in the middle berry, 4 ch., 1 dc. in the next berry, 3 ch., 1 sl. in the middle of the chain stitches which join the next two twigs. Needle-Work and Crochet Edging.

For this lace, which is very pretty when worked with fine material, work, first, the figures which imitate a pansy. These are embroidered singly on fine lace in button-hole stitch and in point de reprise. Then with fine thread work the part between the figures, crocheting first the leaf twigs together with the stems which are continued to the upper edge of the lace. Crochet, beginning with the stem, 6 ch. (chain stitches), 1 dc. (double crochet) in one of the two side leaves of a flower which was worked in button-hole stitch, putting the needle through from the leaf side, 7 ch., 1 dc. in the same leaf of the flower, 4 ch., passing over the last of these work back on the next 3 ch. 1 sc. (single crochet), 1 sdc. (short double crochet), 1 dc., 1 dc. in the next dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc., 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the next 3 ch., this forms one leaflet of the twig, after this crochet 6 ch., 1 dc. in the former leaf (see illustration), 4 ch., passing over the last of these, work back on the remaining stitches 1 sc., 1 sdc., 4 dc., 1 sdc., 1 sc., 1 sl. in the same stitch which took up the sc.; this completes the second leaf. Continuing crochet now 5 ch., as shown by the pattern, 1 dc. in the former leaflet, after this 6 ch.; passing over the last of these, work back on the remainder 1 sc., 1 sdc., 5 dc., 1 sdc., 3 sc. Now follow two leaves, which are worked in the same manner as the first two, and, as shown by the illustration, joined to each preceding leaflet by means of a double crochet stitch, and to the opposite leaflet with a slip stitch; in working the last leaflet fasten on a new flower in the manner shown by the pattern, putting the needle through from the under side; on the chain stitches between the leaflets, as also on the chain stitches of the stem, work single crochet, in doing which fasten by means of a double crochet stitch to the same leaflet of the new flower. Having worked the number of twigs required for the length of the lace, work the scallops on the outer edge in two rounds as follows: 1st round.—* 1 sdc. in the button-hole stitch edge of the middle lace leaflet of a flower, 1 ch., 1 sdc. close to the former sdc., 1 dc. in the point of the next crocheted leaflet, 2 ch., 1 tc. in the next joining stitch between two leaflets, 3 ch., 1 dc. in the point of the next leaflet, 3 ch., 1 tc. in the following joining dc., 5 ch., 1 sdc. in the point of the middle leaflet, then crochet around the other side of the leaf twig in the same manner as far as the next flower, after which repeat from *.

(picot, which is composed of 4 ch. and 1 sl. in the first of the four), 1 sc. around the following 3 ch., 1 sc., 1 p., 2 sc. around the next 3 ch., 1 sc., 1 p., 3 sc., 1 p., 1 sc. around the following 5 ch. Work in the same manner on the other side of the scallop, and repeat from *. Crochet now two rounds for the upper edge of the lace in the following manner: 1st round.—1 sc. in the stem of a leaf twig, 1 tc., as shown by the pattern, in the next button-hole stitch leaf of a flower, * 4 ch., 2 sdc., each separated by 2 ch., in the next point de reprise leaf of a flower, 3 ch., 2 sdc., each separated by 2 ch., in the following leaf, 4 ch., 1 sdc. in the next lace leaflet of the flower, 1 sc. in the stem of the next leaf twig, 1 tc. in the side leaflet of the following flower. Repeat from *. The next round consists of dc. each separated by 3 ch. and three stitches space.

Work Basket.

This pretty little basket is intended to hold pins, thread, and buttons, and is made of fine white cord, while the lining and ruche is of blue silk. The piece for the side of the basket is in knotted work, and, in order to avoid being obliged to work with two long ends, is begun in the middle as follows: Take in the hand two double cords of the requisite length, double them together in the middle so as to make four equal ends, and make a knot in the middle in the manner described for tying a knot for scissors guard, Harper's Bazar, No. 43. Next work with the two cords on one side (leaving the other two cords alone) by fastening with another double cord the knot on one side, and in the same manner, with the ends before unused, a knot on the other side, after which tie with the first two double cords a second knot in the middle, and continue in this manner. Having used up one half the cord begin on the other end, and work the other half of the strip. The pattern counts nineteen middle knots. Fasten the ends of the cord firmly together, thus fastening the sides. For the outer covering of the bottom, which is made of a circular piece of pasteboard, make of the same cord a three-strand braid, and coil it around till it is of the same size as the pasteboard. Line the inside of the bottom with blue silk, embroidered in point russe with white silk and steel beads. Around the edge of the bottom sew a strong wire which has been wound with cord. Next join the bottom and sides of the basket, in doing which push the knots on the side into their proper places. On the upper edge sew another wire which has been wound with cord, and finish both edges with a braid loosely plaited over a foundation of double cord. Lastly, sew in the lining, and finish the upper edge with a pinked ruche, in sewing on which string on a steel bead with each stitch.

Trimnings for Dresses and Skirts.

The prettiest trimmings used this season for dresses consist of ruffled or pleated flounces of different widths, joined with various kinds of ruffles and frills. The trimmings, Figs. 1 to 6, are shown of one-fourth the full size.

Fig. 1.—A strip of cloth six inches wide and pointed on one side is made into a flounce by box-pleating it in the manner shown by the illustration. This is surmounted with a pleated bias fold, which is corded on both sides and edged with a narrow box-pleated frill.

Fig. 2.—Melon trimming. This trimming consists of a strip of cloth seven inches in width, which is cut into deep points on one side and gathered in the manner shown by the illustration. A strip only three inches wide is cut into smaller points and set opposite. The place where these are set on is covered with a fold, which is gathered up crosswise in the manner shown by the illustration.

Fig. 3.—This trimming is made of a strip of cloth eight inches wide, which is doubled down two inches on the upper edge and laid in double box-pleats. The upper fold of each pleat is laid back on the right side and fastened with a stitch. About an inch above the flounce is set a ruche two inches and a half wide, which is pleated in the same manner.

Fig. 4.—This simple trimming consists of pleated frills two inches wide pointing upward, and a similarly pleated flounce nine inches wide, the heading of which covers the seam where the narrower ones are sewed on.

Fig. 5.—This rich trimming consists of a pleated flounce eight inches wide, the lower edge of which is finished with a narrower pleated strip and the upper with a close pleating. In addition to this the upper edge of the flounce is finished with a double bias fold, on which is set, at regular distances, bows of the same material as the trimming.

Fig. 6.—The lower part of this trimming is formed of a gathered flounce six inches wide. Six inches above this is set a pleated frill two inches wide, each pleat of which is laid back on the right side and fastened with a stitch. A pleated strip of trimming five inches wide covers the place where this frill and the flounce are set on.

A RECOLLECTION.

A LADY sat in her garden bower
In the wealthy Eastern clime,
And her dark eye brightened as hour by hour
Passed on to the day's decline.
And her heart beat higher as she looked for the one
Who would be at her side ere the set of sun.

The autumn came with its days of light,
And again that girl was there:
But the burning cheek shone so intensely bright
They saw not the still despair.
Or that he, for whose love she had bartered her own,
Knelt at the shrine of a fairer one.

The seasons passed on till the spring came round,
With its chill, deceitful breath;
And men looked on the girl, and sagely spoke
Of consumption: which leads to death.
But none of them glanced at the cause of doom,
As they followed the girl to her forefathers' tomb.

THE HAUNTED GARDEN.

WHAT is it to be haunted? Who can explain or understand the laws which regulate the "night side of nature," or trace to their source the phenomena that seem to stand beyond those ordinary facts of everyday experience, which long custom has caused us to look upon as a settled order of the universe, though they are truly all miracles and wonders, into whose remote depths we can not penetrate? Yes; we may well ask, "What is it to be haunted?"

It were perhaps best to pass over, without comment, the most recent manifestations which the wisdom and enlightenment of this nineteenth century have produced, and to refrain from trying to fathom the shallow mysteries that require the intervention of a "medium" to interpret them, lest perchance they should rap out to us on the table an order to sign a check for a few hundred pounds in favor of the medium, pelt us with stale fruit and mouldy flowers, or rattle trumpets and accordions about our ears in a dark room. These beings seem, indeed, in their spiritual state, to profit so little by the expensive and liberal education bestowed on them in their lifetime by their parents, and to have sunk from the entertaining, learned, and genial friends we once knew, the men of power and influence the world once admired, into such very illiterate and stupid dolts, such feeble inanities, that the less we have to do with them the less we shall expose our character and reputation to the deterioration and disgrace which necessarily arise from keeping low company.

It is, however, possible for a man or a place to be haunted. I did not believe it once, but I do now. "Oh yes!" you tell me; "one can be haunted by remorse for evil deeds, by a horrid secret, by the memory of neglected opportunities that never returned, by lost or by buried, but unforgotten love, etc." But I had a haunted garden!

Don't tell me that yours is haunted too—by the cats that roll on your choice flowers, and shriek under your window at night, making you start from your pillow with your hair on an end, and with a vague sensation that murder or burglary is going on close at hand.

My garden was haunted by a plant!

Now, don't laugh and say that it was exactly the right thing to haunt a garden, and that you wish you had plenty to haunt yours. I had plenty before I had done with it; and to this day I turn my head away when I pass the green-grocer's, lest I should find my old enemy following me still.

You must know that when I married (it is years ago now) I bought a pleasant little villa near what is now the "Great Cheatem and Doer" southern railway terminus. It was a pretty place then, though it is a wilderness of bricks now; there was a shady lane leading to the house, and primroses grew in the hedge-bottoms in spring, though it was near enough to town for me to come home to dine after concluding business.

You remember the little strip of garden behind the house, and how it was divided from that of my neighbor on each side by a well-kept privet edge. You saw it a few months after I went to live there; and you know how nicely I laid it out with small gravel-walks and intricately-shaped beds bordered with box. Ah! my friend, when you went away to India, you little thought what trouble that small plot of ground would bring me; how one, only one, mistake in its cultivation would imberter some of the best years of my life!

"Clara," said I to my wife, "with a little garden, such as ours, it is of no use trying to grow vegetables or fruit; you know, my dear, every potato and cabbage we grew would cost us half-a-crown; and, perhaps, after all, there would not be one worth eating. Let us cultivate flowers only, and then we can look after them ourselves, and a gardener can come twice a week, just to do the rough work, and dig and rake and hoe the ground when it wants it."

"Oh yes, George!" replied my wife; "and I know of such a nice old man who will garden for us; he keeps a small nursery ground of his own, and he says he can spare just two days a week from his work; and then, too, he can supply us with plants as many as we like to buy. So, if you wish, we will go and see him at once and engage him, for old Mr. Dunlop, who lives next door, tells me that we ought not to miss him, and you know Mr. Dunlop cultivates choice geraniums, carnations, and pansies, which he sends to all the flower-shows in the county, and, he says, if it were not that Samuel Spikenard, the gardener, nearly always has better plants than his own, he should certainly win every prize that he puts in for."

So we went to the Nursery Gardens. Samuel Spikenard undertook to do all that we wished, and for a few happy months no garden could be gayer than the little patch behind Elm Tree Row. Such pelargoniums, fuschias, and verbenas—such dahlias and petunias—I never saw before nor since! It was Christmas time, and a few old friends were to dine with us. On Christmas-eve the good cheer had just come in from the grocer's, the baker's, and the butcher's—from the last a splendid sirloin, and from the green-grocer's the vegetables and trimmings—when my wife came into the room with a serious face. "George," she said, "I have scolded Turnips, the green-grocer, over and over again about his vegetables not being fresh and nice, but it is of no use. Just look what herbs he has sent! This parsley is just like an old rag, and I might as well scrape your walking-stick as this horse-radish. You know it has no flavor at all unless it is fresh, and your aunt Judith is coming to our Christmas dinner, and she is so fond of it. It is all very well, my dear, to grow flowers in the garden, but you really must let me have a corner to grow some herbs, so that we may run out and gather them fresh whenever they are wanted."

Could I do otherwise than fall in with so reasonable a suggestion? Alas! had I known what would follow, I would cheerfully have paid Turnips a sovereign for every penny bunch of parsley rather than have taken the unadvised step that I was led to do!

Before the early spring came round again Samuel Spikenard was busy at his work, turning over the ground and planting his bulbs in the anticipation of a glorious show of crocuses and tulips. I was strolling round the garden in the twilight, when the request of my wife for a herb-bed came to my recollection.

"Samuel," I said, to him, "I want a few herbs grown this season, if you can find a spare corner for them. Just a little patch of parsley, and some sage and mint and thyme, and a root or two of horseradish."

"Well, Sir," said Samuel, "I think if a gentleman means to grow flowers as he ought to grow 'em, and if he wants a market-garden, he'd better hire a market-gardener to tend his bit o' ground; an' I think, Sir, as you'll do a deal better not to have none o' that sort o' rubbish a mixin' with my flowers here, for there isn't never a square inch as I can spare 'em, and Turnips, the green-grocer, he'll sell 'em cheaper and better nor ever you'll grow 'em here, Sir."

The mention of Turnips, and the recollection of the musty trimmings to the Christmas beef, determined me, when I ought to have yielded to Samuel's better knowledge.

"Samuel," said I, firmly but kindly, "I desire you will plant the herbs I have mentioned, and if you can find no room elsewhere, you must put them here and there among the flowers—just a few in each bed, where they will not be conspicuous."

"Well, Sir," returned he, "that's not my way; but, howsoever, if you horders it, Sir, I'll do it;" and he wiped his forehead with his sleeve, and looked sulky.

"Samuel," said I, "I order you to follow the directions which I have given."

Next day the seeds were brought and sown (just a little bit in each bed), and neatly labeled.

"What are those things, Samuel?" I asked, observing about a dozen little whitey-brown sticks in his hand.

"These ere's orsradish," said he, as you hordered me to plant; so I'm jest a stickin' one on 'em in the middle of each bed."

"Do you think one in each bed is enough, Samuel?" said I. "Try half a dozen."

"You'll find 'em sufficient, Sir," replied Samuel, with a grim smile. So they were planted and labeled like the rest.

Spring came fully in, with its genial weather and its flowers; when one day my wife came to me and said: "My dear George, how provoking it is that we can not get a bit of horseradish to grow in the garden! I have been looking at the place where Samuel stuck the label in February, and there is not the slightest sign of its coming up; I do not believe the tiresome man planted any. And did you ever see the garden so weedy before, George? There is a sort of weed like a dock-leaf coming up all over every bed, and I have pulled it up, oh so often! but there seems no end of it. It comes up in the night, I think, when one is not looking. I spoke to Samuel about it, and asked him what it was; but all his answer was, 'Ax Master, mum, he orts to know, he orts; it's none o' my plantin', mum.'"

Samuel was working gloomily in the garden; he seemed to have lost his love for it. The miserable weed my wife had noticed was green on all the beds; the flowers were scanty and poor; the white stick labeled horseradish stuck up by itself in the middle of each bed. I was vexed, and, I dare say, I spoke harshly.

"Mr. Spikenard," said I, "I am afraid you have lost all pride in my garden; look how weedy it is! And you could not oblige me by raising a few plants of horseradish. I believe you never put in those roots at all!"

Samuel laid down his spade and ran his horny fingers through his grizzled hair. He evidently took me for a lunatic, and believed that what I now said was the development of a mania that had first shown itself in February.

"Orsradish!" exclaimed he; "good lawks! orsradish! Surely you don't mean to say as yer wants more on it? And look at my garden, as was so bewtiffle, overrun with it! But I won't serve no one as is gone out o' his senses on the subject o' orsradish! so I'll leave yer, Sir; I'll leave yer service; but I'll jest dig over yer garden after the spring things is tuk up, and then p'raps ye'll be 'appy—with yer orsradish!"

"Samuel, you are insane!" I replied. "Look at those labels; not a single leaf near them; and you tell me that the garden is overrun with horseradish!"

"Good lawks, Sir! and what do yer call them?" pointing as he spoke to what I had taken for dock-leaves. "Did ever a gentleman's garden look sich a sight as that before? Don't ye know, Sir, as orsradish never grows straight up at wunst, but it strikes out roots as runs all round like a star?"

"Oh!" said I, somewhat mollified; "then it has really grown, and come up, after all!" And I went cheerfully to my wife to explain how matters stood, and that the coarse-looking plants, which she had supposed to be weeds, were really fine specimens of that useful but pungent vegetable which she had so long coveted.

"My dear," said I, "you can pull up the spare plants and leave a few to grow to maturity, and we will have roast beef and horseradish of our own growing when aunt Judith comes to see us again."

The next week Samuel Spikenard came and took up the spring bulbs, which had ceased flowering. He was quiet and surly; but there was a malicious twinkle in his eye which I did not understand. This work completed, he began to dig over the garden for its summer show of flowers. My aunt was to dine with us the next day, and I had my reasons for keeping on good terms with her; she was wealthy, and her money helped me in my business.

Dinner-time came. My wife met me with tears in her eyes. "Oh, George!" she said, "aunt Judith is here, and dinner is ready, and that tiresome, nasty Samuel has dug over the garden and cut up every single plant of horseradish into little bits, and aunt won't eat beef without it."

It could not be helped. There was no time to send to Turnips, and if there had been I would not have humiliated myself to him, after having proudly told him that in future I should grow my own herbs.

So dinner was eaten, and we all were cross and out of temper over it. My aunt ate only potatoes and gravy, and refused beef shorn of her favorite garnishing. Before she left she said to me: "Oh, George! I wish to inter that thousand pounds that I lent you in 'Cheatem and Doer' stock, and I am sorry to have to ask you to repay it to me so soon, but you must contrive to let me have it next week." I paid her the money, but it injured my business, and, as I sat at the window, looking into my garden, now bare and desolate (for Samuel had left me, and I had not replaced him), I thought bitterly of my fancy for growing my own herbs, and what it had brought upon me.

"I think, my dear," remarked my wife, "that I see some of the horseradish coming up again." Yes! It was coming up again! It did come up again! Do you know how horseradish grows? Did you ever hear of the Hydra, a beast with a hundred heads, which, if one was cut off, burst out with a new crop of half a dozen? Have you read of the marvelous vitality of wheat? Of its growing, when planted, after it had been clasped for thousands of years in the hand of a mummy? Have you heard of seeds, buried in the earth for unknown ages, germinating into new forms of vegetable life, when some railway cutting exposed them to air and light? Well, they are nothing to horseradish! Cut it up into pieces, and every piece sends out a dozen shoots and offsets; bury it, and it forces its way up; cast it down on the naked soil, and it puts up a shoot to the light, and sends a root into the earth; its stringy fibres run like a mole under the ground, and come up again in unexpected places a huge bunch of pungent green; it scatters seeds, and they grow in a season to seed and increase again. I learned all this, but too late.

In another month my garden was a wilderness of coarse green! Every fragment that Samuel had dug in became a score, ay, a hundred plants, I tore them out of the walks, the beds, the borders, uprooting my trim box-edging and destroying my neat gravel-walks.

At last my wife said to me: "George, I am so sorry that you should be mortified in this manner by that dreadful horseradish. Let us get it carefully dug up, and we will have the garden sown with grass and make it into a lawn. A few nice shrubs will look nearly as well as the flowers, and we shall have no trouble with them."

So we got a man to fork up the plants as well as he could, and my garden disappeared; the roots were carefully thrown aside in a heap, and grass was sown over the place where my flowers had been so gay.

But the grass would not grow into a lawn. It did certainly come up here and there in patches, but, before it could grow, the broad curling leaves of my enemy began to spread over it. It was vain to cut it down; it sprang up again in a day or two; the fine threads from the roots grew quickly into cords, so that to pull it up was to destroy my lawn.

I humbled myself so far as to send for Samuel Spikenard; but all the advice he gave me was to try sodding, saying, "Them as 'ad it put in orts for to know 'ow for to get it hout." He treated me as one would do who sees a gleam of returning reason in a lunatic.

"I will have it sodded," said I to Clara; "it will make a croquet-ground." (The game had just then been invented.)

Not long after this my neighbor, old Mr. Dunlop, came to call on me. He was an old salt, and had been a captain of a ship, where he had seen some rough service. He had a mast fully rigged in his garden, and two ship's carronades and a pile of shot menaced all those who approached his veranda. His head was bald and shining, and his strong heavy face was of the color of mahogany. His back was broad as that of a turtle, and his legs were like pillars set wide apart. He had been a strict disciplinarian in his ship, and he now ruled his house and garden by the most rigid and inflexible laws. Not a thing was out of its place; nothing was permitted to go wrong, especially among his geraniums, pansies, and carnations, which engrossed his whole care and attention. Do you know how a man of that kind can swear when he is angry? Do you know how he can act when he is crossed? Yes; you have not been so long in the world without knowing something about it!

It was five o'clock in the morning, when I hurried down to answer his impatient rattle at my door (I am not an early riser). I dare not repeat the language he used. Clara looked out of the window, fearing he would kill me, and trembled as she listened.

"Do you know, Sir—do you know that you've been and piled five tons of nasty stinking horseradish against my hedge, Sir, and that it's grown through, Sir, into my garden, and is smothering the carnation that I was going to send to Doglebury Flower Show, Sir? Do you think, Sir, that because you are such an idiot, Sir, as to grow it yourself, Sir, that I want it straying on my premises, Sir? I hold you liable for all consequences, Sir; and if you don't have it cleared away, Sir, before the end of the week, I'll—" The remainder of the sentence I can not record here.

I stammered out my regret, and promised in a faltering voice to have it removed. Alas! how often had I tried in vain to remove it!

The next day the pile was taken to the opposite side of the garden. I tried to burn it, but it would not burn; it was growing at every joint, and was as green and moist as it could be. How bare the hedge looked where it had been, and I could see through it the long shoots that had crept into my neighbor's garden.

"I will try to pull them out," said I to myself, but my heart sank in my bosom. I knew how vain it would be to try to get rid of the plague. I carefully drew the long, rosy roots toward me. I saw them leave a long furrow in my neighbor's soil! Some of his choice flowers seem to move! I gave a stronger pull; there was a crash of glass, and I fell backward, drawing through the hedge the prize carnation entangled with my intrusive plant; and I had pulled down also a glass frame, to the utter ruin of the remaining flowers.

From that time forth I had an enemy next door. My poor wife could no longer walk in the garden, owing to the growling and cursing of the venerable tar. Her health began to droop.

The ground had been sodded, and was kept mown, but a day or two would cover it with the noxious plant. Simpson, who used to be considered the crack croquet player, would join our little croquet parties now and then; but he complained that his eyes smarted so much on my ground that he never could make a decent stroke. The lawn had to be freshly mown for every party, and the horrid effluvia of the root filled our nostrils. Our croquet meetings were finally broken up by old Dunlop. He had treasured up his vengeance and my stray roots for a fitting opportunity; and, at our last meeting, he poured a shower of roots and leaves over the hedge, mingled with a torrent of imprecations on the fools who liked horseradish, and who should have all he had to spare.

"Let us leave this place, Clara," said I; "I can endure this no longer; we will let this house and take another."

"Oh, George!" replied she; "it is just what I have been wishing for. Baby has been nearly poisoned in the garden with a piece of that dreadful stuff that he picked up; and when it bit his dear little tongue, he rubbed his eyes with his fingers, till they are as red as fire, and, oh! so dreadfully sore! Yes; let us go!"

At last we found a young couple who were willing to take the house; the garden had been nicely mown the day they came to look at it, and they only remarked on the curious smell. "I should like some flower-beds cut out in this grass," said the bride. I held my breath, and said nothing. We soon after left for another house farther away from town. You may be sure I looked carefully to see what was growing in the garden!

But my tenants did not stay long; they said nothing could be done with the garden, and that we must have been accustomed to supply all London with horseradish.

For a long time the house was unlet. Mr.

Dunlop was dead, and I visited the place occasionally. It was embedded in a forest of rough leaves.

At last I found a tenant who, I thought, would suit me exactly. "I don't care for the garden," said he. "If you'll do a little papering and whitewashing, and build me a stable for my hunters, you can pave the garden and make it into a yard, and, as the situation suits me, I will take it on a five years' lease."

You may be sure I was not long in coming to terms, and in having the stable run up and the garden nicely paved over. "And now," thought I, "that matter is settled for good." You may judge what were my feelings when Tom Tandem, my tenant, came, with a long face, into my counting-house three months afterward, saying, "I want you to take that lease off my hands. I am not particular about terms, but I must be rid of the place. There is some nasty plant that grows between the paving-stones of the yard, and we can not get it out, though half the pavement has been disturbed by pulling at it. But that is not the worst. A lot of it began to grow in the stable, and when my groom pulled it up, Sir, there was a smell just like new mustard, that set my horses coughing and sneezing and kicking as if they were mad. They have smashed the stalls to pieces, and half-killed the groom into the bargain."

"Call to-morrow," said I, "and in the meantime I will think about it." But I mentally determined that I would not let my tenant off his lease if I knew it.

The next morning I received a letter and my tenant at the same moment. Having read my letter, I turned to him. "Tandem," said I, "I am glad to be able to meet your wishes, and to let you off your lease on easy terms. The 'Cheatem and Doer' Railway Company have just sent me notice that they require the property that you occupy for their new Swindlum Junction Extension, and I mean to send them word that they can have it on reasonable terms, and without giving themselves the trouble of passing it through the hands of professional valuers."

Well, the "Cheatem and Doer" took my house and demolished it. The country-lane, the Elm Tree Row disappeared; a great cutting, like a half-healed scar, ran through the desolated fields, where bricks were now burned, and shabby little rows of houses, fit neither for town nor country, sprang up. Close by Elm Row Station there was a rough verdure on the bank, though all else was black cinders or grimy clay. I lived some way down the new line now, and noted that last landmark of my old residence, where all else had disappeared before the ruthless tide of so-called improvement. I knew what it was, but it was no trouble to me now.

Two years after the line was opened my aunt Judith sat, as usual at Christmas time, at my table.

"Ah, George!" sighed she, "I wish I had never taken that thousand pounds from you to invest in that shocking 'Cheatem and Doer' Line! Ever since they made the new Swindlum Extension they have never paid a penny of dividend, and they tell me I could not give the shares away!"

No doubt she would have run on with a long catalogue of troubles about her railway property, had not the wail of a wretched song from the hard-frozen road fallen upon our ears. Somehow the note seemed familiar to me, and I went to the window. A poor, broken-down, ragged old man was shuffling along the street. In spite of his battered hat and cracked boots, his ten days' beard, his shrunken limbs, and withered, famine-stricken face, I recognized my old gardener, Samuel Spikenard.

One feels soft-hearted at Christmas time; so, forgetting the wrong he had done me, I ran to the door and called him. "Why, Samuel," said I, "what has brought you to this?"

"Ay, Sir," replied he, "you may well ax me that! I'm a ruined man, Sir—a ruined man! Ay, deary me! To think of my bewtiffle gardin, as I owned an' tended like a pet child!"

"And what has become of it, Samuel? Why did you part with it, when you were doing so well, and with so many new customers coming to your neighborhood, too, by the Swindlum Extension?"

"'Twas that as done it, Sir! Yes, yes! that done it. You know, Sir, I was allus so pertickler to hev' rich, fresh soil put in every year; that was the secret of my flowers, Sir; an' two year ago a contractor come to me, and, 'Samuel,' sez he, 'I've a splendid lot o' soil as 'll suit you.' 'Where does it come from?' sez I, for I was allus so pertickler to know as it should come from a right sort o' place. 'Well,' sez he, 'it's jest been dug from a stable and stable-yard, as the new line's a goin' through, an' it's as full o' likkid menure as it can be.' 'Send me ten loads,' sez I. So when the soil came, Sir (my eyes isn't as good as they was, Sir), there was a smell about it as reminded me o' you, Sir; but, thinks I, it's the likkid menure. So I digs it into the strawberries, an' I pots all my choice plants in it, and spreads the rest through my gardin. You can guess the rest, Sir, I sees by your face. Yes, Sir! So it was, Sir! When I digged that ere orsradish into you, Sir, I never thought as 'ow it would come back to be digged into myself; but so it was, Sir. Next summer it was orsradish here, and orsradish there, and every wheres around me. I fought it till the next spring, but it beat me then, and I had to turn out. I was too old to go out gardnin', and here I am, Sir, as you see."

I gave him five shillings. I confess my eye brimmed with a tear. "Samuel," said I, "you know what retribution is; but I forgive you." I have not seen him since. I know not whether the evil spirit that haunts that spot, in the form of horseradish, is laid by my forgiveness; we shall see.

But here comes my eldest son from school, and I can see "news" in his face.

"Well, my boy! What wonder have you to tell us of to-day?"

"Oh, papa! have you heard of the frightful accident at Elm Row Station to-day? A poor old man tripped just at the same part of the platform that Sir Joseph Dollars fell down on when he broke his collar-bone, for which he recovered six thousand pounds damages from the 'Cheatem and Doer' Company. The poor old man fell under the wheels of the express-train, and is killed. They say there is a lot of horseradish from some old garden under that part of the platform, and that it forces up the paving-tiles so that it is impossible to keep them level for a fortnight together."

"Did you hear the man's name, my boy?" "Yes, papa; it was rather a curious one; it was Samuel Spikenard."

My wife looked at me and said, in a low voice, "My dear, you are right. The place is haunted!"

AN ANCIENT DUCHESS.

THE Duchess of Orleans, the mother of the dissolute Regent and great-great-grandmother of the sober-sided Citizen King Louis Philippe of France, has revealed herself by an abundant and intimate correspondence so fully and thoroughly that those who read it may know her better than even her contemporaries.

The Duchess was a German princess, born in Heidelberg, in 1652, and at nineteen years of age was taken to France and given in marriage, for reasons of state policy alone, by Louis XIV. to his brother, Monsieur as he was called, the Duke of Orleans. She frankly tells us, and her story is not belied by her contemporaries, that she was horribly ugly. "I was always ugly and was made still more so," she says, "by the small-pox. My waist is of a monstrous thickness, and I am as square as a cube; my skin is red and mottled with yellow spots; my hair is turning gray; my nose is quilted by the small-pox, as are also my cheeks; I have an enormous mouth and rotten teeth." With all this ugliness by nature she was not disposed to beautify herself by art had it been possible. "I do not see," she exclaims, "what people want with so many costumes; all I have got are my single grand Court and hunting suit; I have no other; I never wore in my life a robe de chambre or a cloak, and in my whole wardrobe I have but one night-gown to put on." This is a confession of a scantiness of costume on the part of a genuine Duchess which must sound strange in the ears of our democratic dames, who, with all the resources of a Saratoga trunk at their command, still complain of "nothing to wear."

The Duchess was fond of horses and dogs, of the latter of which she had always at least a dozen in her bedroom. According to one of her letters, in which she never fails to chronicle the daily life of her pets, Charmille pupped upon the skirt of that "single grand dress" in the august presence of Madame the Princess of Condé, who was paying her a visit at the time. Charmille was accordingly rebaptized and known ever after as Robe.

The Duchess was not more nice in diet than in dress. She thought a good dish of sour-kraut and smoked sausages worthy to set before a king, and declared that a soup of cabbage and bacon was preferable to all the delicacies of Versailles. "I can not bear," she says, "your tea, coffee, and chocolate. What I would like is a good beer-soup; but I can not get it, for the beer in France is good for nothing."

With such a diet, requiring the digestive power of a horse, it is not surprising that the hearty Duchess made use of a regimen of living and exercise of proportionate rudeness. She had been in at the death, according to her own account, of more than a thousand stags, and was in the habit of following the hounds twice a week from morning to night. With sour-kraut, smoked sausage, beer-soup, hard riding, and the invigorating air of the country, the kennel, and the stable, she became so tough of flesh, skin, and bone that she was almost invulnerable. "Of the twenty-six falls," she says, "that I have had from my horse, I have been seriously injured but once."

She was no great favorite with her contemporaries of the licentious court of the debauched Regent. This is not surprising, for she did not like what they liked—gambling, dancing, and conjugal infidelity. For these were the dames who, as Sydney Smith says, violated all the common duties of life, and gave very pleasant little suppers. The Duchess had too sound a conscience for the one, and too wholesome a stomach for the other.

Though on her marriage her parents had, for state reasons, turned her over nominally to the Catholics she remained in heart a Protestant. She read her Bible fearlessly while Louis XIV., under the command of the "saintly" Maintenon, was dragging the reformers. During the Regency she interposed and saved the lives of hundreds of Protestants, condemned for reading their Bibles and worshipping according to their consciences. The toleration of her son, the Regent, which was the saving virtue of that sinful mortal, was due mainly to the teaching and direct influence of his Protestant-born mother.

The Duchess never fears to speak her mind in regard to Catholic observances and priesthood. "I am well persuaded," she says, "that we can perform a better work than spoil our stomachs with eating fish." On another occasion she writes to a Protestant sister; "Believe me, the object of Christianity among all sects is the same; the difference, we notice, is the mere idle talk of the priests, and does not concern honest people; but this is what concerns us, to live righteously like Christians, to be merciful, and practice charity and virtue."

She had a horror of the excesses of her day.

The drunkenness of women, which was common, she denounces with the vigor of a temperance lecturer, and cries out with horror at the ladies of the court putting their fingers into every proffered snuff-box. The Duchess was not all virtue; but the worst that could be said against her by the French was that she was a German princess, haughty, reserved, and alike averse to the emasculated refinements and gross debauchery of the Court of Versailles. "Her ugliness," says a chronicler, "was repulsive, and she displeased every one by her moody pride. A stranger in the brilliant court where she was forced to live, she was always a German in France. To her husband, whom she despised (and with good reason), she was complacent and amiable, in order that she might be well treated, and left undisturbed. Louis XIV. esteemed her virtue, and the loyalty of her rude frankness; her masculine tastes, her passion for dogs and horses had his approbation and sympathy."

She spent all the time she could spare from the hunt and other outdoor exercise with her horses and dogs in writing letters. Her correspondents were her relatives on the thrones and in the courts throughout Europe, and not a day passed that she did not indite at least a dozen sheets. She frequently says: "I must stop, for I have five letters yet to write to-night."

Though, like most High Mightinesses of those days, she was a believer in the divine right of kings and other royal folks to enjoy, and of people to suffer, she does not seem to have been without sympathy with the oppressed of France. In this story there is a muttering in advance, and a lurid gleam of the future storm. "Yesterday," she says, "I was told a painful story of a woman who stole a loaf of bread in France. The baker wanted her arrested. She said, as she wept, 'If you knew my misery, you would not wish to take this bread from me. I have three little naked children. They cried for bread; I could stand it no longer, and I stole the loaf.' The policeman went to her home, and there found three children wrapped in rags, and lying in a corner trembling with the cold. He asked one of them: 'Where is your father?' The child replied, 'Behind the door.' The policeman looked, and drew back with horror: the wretch had hanged himself in despair. Such occurrences take place every day," adds the Duchess.

It is curious to learn that this masculine woman had for a husband one who was the most effeminate of persons in mind and body, cheated and despised by his favorites, intriguing, incapable of keeping a secret, indulging in the most abominable tastes, to which scandal gave the greatest publicity. A prince clinging to life with a cowardly tenacity, passing his days in total idleness, incapable of any application to business or serious study. He was adorned like a woman, covering himself with rings, bracelets, jewels, and ribbons wherever he could put them; saturated with all kinds of perfumes, and accused, apparently with justice, of using rouge.

By some curious hocus pocus of nature the souls of the Duke and Duchess had evidently been misplaced. She says herself that when she was a child she preferred playing with a sword and gun to a doll, and would have liked to be born a boy. "This wish," she declares, "almost cost me my life; for having heard it said that Marie Germain had become a man by jumping, I set to work leaping, so that it is a miracle I had not broken my neck a hundred times."

Madame the Duchess died in the full odor of sanctity at the age of seventy, a year before the death of her son the Regent. She was buried in that tomb of kings—St. Denis; and her memory was honored with a funeral eulogy by the eloquent Massillon.

ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

I CAN no longer chronicle for the benefit of my American readers the doings in London. Every one has flown from the hot, dusty town to the quiet and rest of a country life, or are seeking fresh excitement—living before a new world—at the sea-side. As I told you when I last wrote, I had repaired to the good old town of Norwich, in order to be present at the meeting of the British Association there. You, too, have but recently had a meeting of this kind in your hemisphere; so it may interest you to know how we manage such things here, more especially as ladies now are beginning to take an active interest therein. Intellectual women are on the increase, and are brave enough to dare public opinion and own their special penchants.

This British Association is purely of a scientific character. It holds yearly meetings at different parts of the country for the sake of discussing scientific subjects. It selects from among the various places which yearly solicit the honor of its attendance the one most suitable for the purpose. Last year the little town of Dundee, in Scotland, was the spot chosen. The great manufacturing town of Birmingham has had its turn not long ago, as well as the University city of Oxford. The annual meeting is always fixed for the autumn, and lasts a week. The Association divides itself into seven sections, each under its special professor, viz.: A. Mathematical and Physical Science—President, Professor Tyn-dall. B. Chemical Science—President, Professor Frankland. C. Geology—President, Mr. R. A. C. Godwin-Austin. D. Biology—President, the Rev. J. M. Berkely. E. Geography and Ethnology—President, Captain Richards. F. Economic Science and Statistics—President, Samuel Brown. G. Mechanical Science—President, G. Bidder, C.E. All these Presidents are men whose names are household words among us in connection with the special science over which they presided. All the lecture-rooms, libraries, ball-rooms, etc., the town possessed were hired, and each section took up its quarters at one of them.

The Masonic Hall at Norwich had been turned into a reception-room, which was the headquarters of the Association, where the General Committees sat, the reporters wrote, and the members generally met to write and read, stationery and papers being liberally supplied. The principal room thus became the general rendezvous, and a very pleasant rendezvous, too. A post-office was attached to it, as well as a luggage-office. Indeed, the comfort of visitors was in every way consulted and provided for. A payment of one sovereign made you a temporary member, and enabled you to enjoy all these advantages, and to attend every section, as well as a flower-show which was going on simultaneously, and all the other entertainments and amusements—every thing, in fact, connected with the meeting of the Association.

Norwich is usually a dull country town, one of the most interesting and the largest, nevertheless, in the eastern part of England. It is a quaint, curious old town, such as one lights upon often in this little island of ours; a town which had its origin in a Roman camp probably, and has gone on growing century by century, the new patched on to the old until it has grown into a modern manufacturing city of no little importance.

Colman, the maker of mustard and starch, who exports a great deal to your country, has large manufactories here. Cape, mohair, rich shawls, paramattas, bombazine, poplins, are all specially Norwich goods. These are the modern side of the picture. Its grand old Norman castle, now used as a jail, the fine cathedral, older still, but well preserved; the narrow streets, with here and there overhanging upper stories, curious pieces of carving, centuries old, tell of age and past grandeur and beauty, as well as modern prosperity.

For a few days before the meeting actually took place the usually quiet streets were wondrously full and bustling, and each train brought an influx of visitors, mostly very palpable savans with long hair and fully developed bodies, and of somewhat eccentric dress, accompanied by the female members of their families—fine, elegant women, who formed a strong contrast to their lords and masters.

The proceedings commenced by an Inaugural address from the new President of the Association, Dr. Hooker, a Norfolk man and a savant in every sense of the word. His father, Sir William Hooker, held for many years the head appointment at Kew, our chief Botanical Gardens, and at his death this son succeeded him. The Duke of Buccleugh was last year's President; he also was present, and gave up his office in a graceful speech to his successor, and then Dr. Hooker delivered his address, which occupied two hours, and touched on scientific progress generally throughout the country. This set the ball rolling, and next day all the sections began their labors at eleven and continued until three, and so on for a week. They all work simultaneously, and it is somewhat amusing to meet the people at every corner of the street rushing from one to the other. They have never been better attended, especially by ladies; half the audiences pretty well every where were of the fair sex. Section E, Geography and Ethnology, and Section F, Economic Science and Statistics, were the favorites. They were crowded every day, the committees of the various sections occupying the platform, the public the body of the hall, meeting-house, or lecture-room, whatever it might be. In the centre of the platform was the President in his high caried-back chair, and the secretaries beside him, all seated at green baize covered tables.

Any body who chose to send in a paper within the province of the science of which any particular section treated had to submit to the decision of the committee as to whether it were read or not. About six each day in every section was the average number.

One of the principal features of this year's meeting was the presence of two of the Abyssinian prisoners, Dr. Blane and Mr. Rassam, and of Mr. C. R. Markham, who formed part of the expedition sent to their rescue. I was fortunate enough to hear Dr. Blane and Mr. Markham both read papers. After that of the former Mr. Rassam came forward, at the suggestion of the President, for the benefit of those who cared to see him. He is a large, strongly-built man, with a bronze complexion and plenty of jet-black hair. He spoke a few words in broken English, in which he assured us that, though he had been glad enough to get away from Theodore, he regretted very much that an engagement prevented his remaining with us. Neither he nor Dr. Blane showed any signs of the hardships they had endured. This latter, a German, formed a perfect contrast to his companion; short, and stout, and very fair, with gray-blue eyes and a pleasant expression of face; his skin was bronzed with exposure, but not more than many of our own countrymen after a few weeks' shooting. Very quiet, very gentlemanly, and very well dressed, he looked more like a London beau than the hero of so sad and trying a captivity. When one thought of it all it seemed almost unaccountable that the two should be walking arm in arm about the quiet Cathedral Close just like any other mortals.

Another event, even more interesting to us, was that a lady read a paper in person. In America this is by no means as uncommon a proceeding, I suppose, as it is here, though it is not the first time it has been done even at the British Association; for when the meeting took place at Oxford Miss Carpenter read a paper on a subject with which her name is so justly and honorably associated, viz., Female Emigration. This year Miss Becker read a paper in Section F. (Economic Science and Statistics) on "Some supposed Differences in the Minds of Men and Women with Regard to Educational Necessities."

She is a most clever, clear-headed woman, between thirty and forty, with a pleasant physiognomy, and wearing spectacles. She was well and suitably dressed in a black silk and a white bonnet, and she said all she had to say with perfect self-possession. She delivered her opinions in clear, logical language, and was received with the greatest applause. This section met in the Museum of the town, and every nook and corner of it was crowded. A most animated discussion followed; but the fair orator found no entire or hearty supporters of her theories save in two oth-

In fact, many of the papers were so intensely interesting, and read by men the sight of whom was in itself a sufficient attraction, that I could write you pages about them instead of columns. I have only time and space, however, left to tell you that two soirées were held in St. Andrew's Hall on the Tuesday and Thursday evenings, and were crowded to suffocation. It is at this St. Andrew's Hall the triennial festivals are held. It reminds one of a cathedral almost; indeed, at one time it formed the nave of the Convent Church of St. Andrew's. It was hung some five or six thousand pounds. We were invited at four in the afternoon, and all kinds of amusements were provided—Japanese jugglers, Chang the giant, the Tyrolese minstrels, Christys minstrels, gipsies, etc. A magnificent lunch was provided, and a display of fire-works, which kept us there until midnight, though it was nominally a morning fête. The grounds of his house, which is about two miles from Norwich, slope down to the river's banks, and the colored lights thrown on the water as soon as the shades of night closed in was a sight never to be forgotten. The banks were er ladies, who addressed a few words to the meeting—a Miss Robertson, who merely seconded the propositions, and Mrs. Fellowes, a daughter of Sir Rowland Hill, who made a few very sensible remarks on the imperfect manner in which girls are educated in fashionable ladies' schools.

Mr. Hepworth Dixon, the author of "New America" and "Spiritual Wives," read a very interesting paper, "The Great Prairies and Prairie Indians." Mr. Gifford Palgrave, the author of a very generally read book on Arabia, another on the "Northeast Turkish Frontier and its Tribes;" Mr. Glarshier one on Meteors, etc.

with flags and evergreens, and the Marine's band played, while a few objects of interest were exhibited; but the company was the chief attraction, and seeing and being seen the order of the day.

The hospitality of the Norwich people knew no bounds. Every house was filled with visitors, often strangers, whose scientific celebrity secured them a welcome. The Mayor gave a déjeuner, and Mr. Harvey—a neighboring landowner, banker, and probable M.P. for the town in the next Parliament—threw open his grounds and gave a princely entertainment at the cost of loaded with flowers. A boat-house had been turned for the nonce into an elegant kiosk, where ices, tea, and American drinks were dispensed, and the bright light on the water displayed to full advantage the fine back-ground of trees which ran the whole length of the estate.

So you see we had science presented under a very pleasing aspect, which was thoroughly enjoyed by every body.

I see among the list of those present the name of Professor Gross, from Philadelphia, as well as other names well known to you on your side of the Atlantic.

Light blue Russian tight-fitting basque, cut low in front, and overlapping under the belt. The skirt of the basque is short, and plain in front with two pleats behind. Border and buttons of blue satin. A little cape of poplin like the dress, trimmed with a pleating of the same, is set on the back, and slopes up in front under the arms. High chemisette.

AUNT LENORE'S BURGLAR.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

WE sat round the feeble flicker of fire that had been lighted on the hearth that damp September evening, all of us secretly thankful, no doubt, that it was too damp and chill for a single unclosed window on the ground-floor, and some of us openly, and without fear of rebuke, giving frightened glances over our shoulders now and then, to make sure there was no face peering in from the outside of the unguarded window-panes, and that the scrambling of the mice behind the panels, or the tapping of the branches on the blinds, was not the preliminary challenge of some desperate highwayman ere he demanded our money or our lives. For it was more than suspected that there was an association of that class of gentlemen in the neighborhood, since it was only the night before that our house had been entered by thieves, and Quintilia, a Roman woman in stature but not in courage, had all in a flash started wide awake in the dead of the night to find a man in the room, busily absorbed in the delights of rifling her toilette-table drawers. There were all her corals, her curious, costly corals, that Uncle Robert had purchased for her only that day week, as dear to her vanity-loving heart as the apple of her eye until the bloom of their possession should wear off, and the thief would have his hand on them presently. But oh, he might take them and welcome, if then he would only go! She lay there, staring through her lashes; those languid lashes of Quintilia's, that people raved about so, never did such a stroke of work in all their lazy lives before—and suddenly, when waiting and terror had surmounted the very last pitch of her power of endurance, she rose with her whole immense height upon the bed, wrapping herself in the sheets as she rose, towered there one trembling instant, and then sprang past the man into the hall, a horrible apparition of white silence, so terrifying the poor house-breaker himself that, not to be outdone, he leaped from the second story window into the garden, breaking his ankle and leaving behind him the useless incumbrance of three gold watches and a diamond brooch with which he had enriched himself in some other outraged domicile.

"It is the most ridiculous thing I ever heard of," said Aunt Lenore, "his being overcome and vanquished by Quintilia, who is afraid to speak loud to a kitten. They are just like stray cows in the streets, it seems—these thieves—more afraid of us than we can possibly be of them; for we have only our jewelry to lose, and they have 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness' at stake."

"What a scare he must have had!" exclaimed young Rob. "He took you for a ghost, Kinny, the white Death, or something else as annihilating. Try the idea on the next lover that be-sets you like a fly in August."

"Why didn't you speak to him?" asked Aunt Lenny, demurely.

"Speak to him!" cried Quintilia, every thing else in her mind evaporating before the bare fancy of such a proceeding.

"Oh, you little coward!" cried Aunt Lenny, laughing. "You Broddignagian coward, rather! So great a coward that your very fright was frightful; and a man who came prepared to take life, if he couldn't take silver, flings himself out the window at the risk of breaking his neck rather than confront your terror. Oh, degenerate generation! Unworthy of the one that went before you!"

"Why, what would you have had me do?" asked Quintilia, rousing a little, her ray of indignant inquiry having the effect upon her quietude of a single fire-fly in a whole summer night. "Should I have lain still," said she, "and let him go on? You would have laughed in a different fashion if I had turned over and gone to sleep, and you had found an empty plate-chest in the morning and not a brooch for a collar in all the house."

"Do you mean to say that you had a single thought of us, or the plate-chest, or the collars in the morning, at the moment when you executed your grand conception?"

"Of course not. I only meant to get away from him. That was all. I don't pretend I thought of anything else—that one thought was big enough to fill all the mind I have, you know. Besides, I was afraid; oh! I was fear itself; I don't believe any of you can ever have known what it is to be absolutely afraid—it is like the beginning of total annihilation. Why, what would you have had me do?" asked Quintilia again, somewhat warmly. "You say yourselves that those wretches always come prepared to take life if they should be discovered; should I have opened a conversation with him and had a bullet for reply?"

"That is what I did with my burglar twenty years ago and over," said Aunt Lenore. "And I had no bullet for reply at all."

"With your burglar?"

"Certainly—my burglar."

"Didn't know you had such a piece of property, mother," said young Rob. "Stock company or private enterprise? Did you charter him? Run him on shares? What were the net profits, may we ask?"

"Private enterprise undoubtedly, I should say; very private. And as for the net profits, you young scape-grace, they were nearly every thing that your father and I have in this world. Didn't I ever tell you about it, girls? Rob has heard it twenty times before, I'm quite sure, for all his new counting-room impertinence. No? Then I will now. But it's one of the family secrets, remember. It was very much such a night as this one is, if I recall it rightly—one of those thick nights that seem to muffle sounds, damp and chilly, with a watery moonlight drifting every where through the spongy air. The very sort of a night for ghosts, Quintilia—you're not afraid of ghosts? Well, thank Heaven, we're not going to talk about ghosts, or we should soon see whether you are afraid of them or not! I will confess, in the first place, that I have a slight prejudice myself against moonlight nights; they always take moonlight nights for their operations, these breakers and enterers do; it gives them great advantages. And on the night in question your Uncle Robert was away on business, and I was all alone in my wing of the house, and if I had screamed till I brought about a hemorrhage of the lungs and no less not a single soul could have heard me. Knowing this fact, when I had entered my room at night I had locked the door fast, and tried it, had put a pair of scissors as securely as I could over the side-window, whose spring was broken, looked under the bed and the lounge and the secretary, with great particularity, and into the corners and behind the towel-rack and the old-fashioned arm-chair; and had peered into the closets, and poked all the dresses there up against the wall with a stick in order to make sure that there was no one hidden among their folds. I reflected whether any one could get into the drawers of the clothes-presses, but gave up the conundrum, and contented myself with fastening them so that if one were hidden there the fate of Geneva was his portion; into my great empty trunk, where a couple of thieves could very well have bestowed themselves, I hesitated to examine; I locked and strapped it down and let them stifle if they were there. One of the closet-doors, I remembered, held fast, as if some one were trying to keep it closed on the inside; it was only an atmospheric pressure, I presume; but it disturbed me. You are the image of what I was at your age, Quintilia. I got into bed with an uneasy sensation that some one would seize my foot, and I lay awake for a time with my heart beating a tattoo; and in consequence, when I did sleep, I slept soundly. They say that when burglars are going to attempt a house they usually watch it first for a while, and so learn the habits of its residents; my burglar then must have ascertained that I always kept a lamp burning at night, turned down just low enough to make a twilight in the room—a bad habit for me, but an exceedingly convenient one for him; he must also have discovered that your Uncle Robert had gone away for that night, and that night only, and that he had sold a field on Roshleigh Hill for a thousand dollars and left the money with me, and that I was a timid woman in delicate health, who had never so much as handled fire-arms—for I shut my eyes when I see a pistol now—and without the strength of a fly. He might have learned all this and a good deal more if he was the quiet lodger in an opposite house commanding the one where we were, as I have always supposed he was. We were boarding at that time, and as Mrs. Furness, our landlady, used her own silver and left it openly of nights on the dining-room table down stairs, so that a thief might seize it and run—a sort of reward of merit or bounty upon house-breaking—she evidently had no need of mine, and far from trusting a spoon of it in her hands I kept it in the shelter of my own bedroom above. As for locking-up, though it might answer to keep a thief in a trunk if you had him there, it would never keep a thief out of a trunk; I had no real faith in it; if thieves found a thing locked, of course they imagined there was something inside worth locking up. I believed far more in strategy; and possessing a Chinese wicker-chair, the lower part of which was in the shape of an hour-glass, I every night deposited my basket of spoons and forks and ladles, cream-pot, sugar-dish, and urn, underneath this chair, confident that no burglar would ever have dreamed of looking for it there, though the open wicker-work hardly hid it. Nevertheless I am free to confess that that wicker-chair was the pest of my life. It had a way of expanding and contracting unaccountably with the variations of the atmosphere, like the mercury in a thermometer, which in the daytime I hardly noticed, but which at night drove me frantic. How many a time, in the still night when my lamp had gone out, had I heard that evil-minded chair give a crack like a stealthy step on the stairs of the old house, stretching itself so cautiously yet so suggestively, and I had started up on my elbow to listen, and all at once the step had seemed to be in the room itself, squeaking across the floor, and then visions of sudden death danced across my eyes in the dark and were forgotten in the absolute certainty that the thief was cautiously lifting the chair and making away with my basket of silver—all wedding-presents and the best of coin! When I discovered that it was the wicker-work itself that made all that cracking and creaking, I became convinced that the chair was haunted, and used to lie awake nights imagining that I saw a ghost sitting uneasily in its embrace, a horrible antipodean ghost with almond eyes and queue; but finally Robert explained the Chinese puzzle to me, and my waking nightmare disturbed me no more. On the night of which I am telling you, and when your uncle was away, I put the silver beneath the chair according to my custom, and then I bethought myself where I should conceal my other valuables. I was not exactly a fool, but had a little show of reason in being somewhat more anxious than usual, because there had been several burglaries committed lately in the town; and, not a week before, the little child of our next-door neighbor had told her mother when she came to bed that she had seen a great black goblin walking over the carpet that night, and was laughed at and lulled for her pains, until the morning, when it was discovered that the goblin had 'gobbled up' every thing precious and convertible that he could reach. I did not believe in locks, as I have said, so I took my jewelry and scattered some of it under the confusion of my laces in the upper drawer of the bureau; some I inclosed in a little calico spool-bag tossed down beside my work-basket with the thimble and tape-measure. I liked to outwit a thief when I could. It was of no use to hide my watch, its ticking would betray it; so I boldly hung it in view, as if I had taken no precautions against thieves at all; and also left openly upon the toilette-cushion my old breast-pin which I had worn all day. Meanwhile, the money. If we lost that thousand dollars, I had a conviction we should be utterly undone. Your Uncle Robert was up to his eyes in speculations, blowing bubbles that shone like mines of jewels in the air, but which invariably broke in nothingness if he went to touch and draw them in; and on the principle of hydrostatic pressure, where a drop of water balances a ton, this thousand dollars of real money was to balance a world of speculative paper, to buoy up goodness-knows-how-many promises to pay; it was to be the means, and the sole means, of all the fortune we could hope for in the future. Moreover, there were the two hundred laid by to meet a note of Robert's that came due the day after to-morrow, and there was the hundred which we always endeavored to keep on hand for our current expenses of the month. You see we were in mighty different circumstances from these which we enjoy at present, my dears. I sat down to cogitate. If I put away all this money in a lump it might all be taken in a lump, and nothing left, whereas if I parceled it in several portions, should one portion be stolen another might be overlooked. Acting on this idea, I took one of the five hundred-dollar bills, and tugging away with all my might at the marble slab of the bureau-top I contrived to lay it flatly between the marble and the wood, and replace every thing as it was before: the other one I folded and creased into small compass and laid in the tiny dish carried by two plaster-of-Paris angels representing the San Graal, where

'With folded feet in stoles of white
On sleeping wings they sail.'

These angels hung high up under the cornice, and one would have been a detective as well as a thief to have thought to look there, and a man of such genius as to deserve all he found. My purse, with a half-eagle and some loose silver in its meshes, I left apparently in all unsuspectingness on the bureau, and even ran a pin into the cushion there and through my washing-bill and a couple of small bank-bills with which to pay it. I flattered myself that was as good diplomacy of its kind as ever eluded justice. But then, what should I do with the rest? Blessed be nothing, I said, and said again; how much easier I should have slept if I had not had a cent in the world to keep guard over! I must have had a premonition, a presentiment, a warning from somewhere of the coming of a burglar that night. There was a one hundred-dollar bill. I twisted it up like a gray wisp of waste paper, and inserted it into the bunch of parti-colored lamp-lighters. If I should forget, or if any body—a thief himself, perhaps—should light that one particular wisp! The remainder of that which I had to dispose was in bills of lesser denomination. I divided it into two packages; one I laid out flat in the sole of my shoe down beside the bed, the other I inclosed in an envelope and hid under the pillow. 'There,' I said to myself, 'if any one says, Stand and deliver! I can deliver this envelope, and, if I should lose a hundred, save twelve hundred dollars by the means, any way.' Nevertheless, I had my doubts about the success of all these manoeuvres of mine, for I always coupled burglars and ghosts together in one category; and back of every other fancy had a fancy that one was as omniscient and as impossible to deceive as the other. But nothing venture, nothing have. I had enjoyed my little drama of fright, concealment, and the confusion of the robbers almost as much as I do the theatre; so I turned down the light at this its close, and sprang quickly into bed, and quaked there like the miserable coward I was—a worse coward than you, Quintilia, my dear, after all, for your cowardice was sublime—imagining and conjuring up every thing in the world, whirlwinds, ghosts, days of judgment, fire, and thieves; and finally, I went to sleep, and slept soundly, as I said. I remember starting bolt upright once in the night at some slight noise, then assuring myself that it was rats, lying down and dropping off into my deep dreams again. But if my heart had beat a tattoo when I went to sleep, it was beating a reveille when at last I woke up a second time—woke up in the same entirely wide-awake way with which you woke last night, Quintilia, and to behold the same object, a large dark man completely engaged in examining and helping himself to the contents of my bureau drawers. For one long, curling moment every drop of blood forsook my cold hands and feet to lie in a hot oppression on my sinking heart; every nerve quivered in terror and refused to obey me. I stared wild-eyed at the man, who was just then too busy to mind my insignificance, feeling the bed begin to shake beneath me with my one unending shiver. That would never do, I knew very well; yet such knowledge is not very apt to assist one to better behavior, and I suppose that it was seeing the interloper so occupied with his possible plunder, and not with thoughts of murder, that allowed me to recover myself from the dominion of the dreadful fear that had at first seized me; for, presently, I was observing his size and probable power, and, for all my fear of him, thinking rather admiringly, that he was as dark and mighty a man as Saul, a prince among men for main strength. I had best lie still and let him steal on—he could crush me with his thumb. Just then the cautiously rummaging hands of the man came across something satisfactory; he held it up to the pale ray of my friendly lamp. Ah, me! it was Robert's diamond scarf-pin, a relic of two or three generations. I had always counted upon it as equal to the emergency of another thousand dollars if the worst came to the worst, and to postpone irretrievable disaster or gather time for fresh effort, Robert had to take it to a pawnbroker's. You see I had entered so deeply into his own speculative spirit that I was prepared for almost any contingency of that nature, and took every thing in the true determination of surmounting difficulties in one way if not in another. To-day we were respectable, to-morrow we might be paupers, but next week certainly millionaires. However, not if I suffered this man to carry off one of our main levers—that diamond scarf-pin; for, to people in our precarious circumstances, it was a lever to fortune, I can assure you. I had half the mind to speak with him, and see what would happen if I did. All he could do was to make an end of me, and, perhaps, he would do that any way when he found out that I was not asleep; for I was not one of those heroic women who can have their eyelashes burned off by a match without a quiver to signify they know it; in such case as that I should scream and he would shoot, and Heaven only knew what the rest would be if he were of the butchering order that had a fancy for making mince-meat of their victims. In the mean time, I never could bear suspense—if murder it was to be I did not want to lie there and expect it. What if I should try my persuasive powers? They had worked very well on Robert many a time. What if I should try them now? What if I should take this uninvited guest into my confidence! My teeth were chattering so, just then, that I couldn't have spoken if I would; and I was mortally afraid, every moment, that he would hear them. Moreover, how was I to begin? Suddenly? Then he would start back and trip against that hateful wicker-chair, and that of course would give way and rattle all the silver underneath it as it went; and on that silver I relied against the time when all Robert's bubbles broke, as I was sure they would some day, to have it sent to the Mint and coined into sufficient specie to stock the Western farm to which we should then retire for a period. I should hate to do it, and Robert would not let me if he knew it, but I should not tell him. I should surprise him one day with the sum in hand when he was fairly desperate. You see I was long-sighted in those days, and had my plans running years ahead of time. What else were wedding-presents good for, I should like to know, if you could not use them as you wished? Speak to that creature I must before he dropped that scarf-pin into his pocket, whether my teeth chattered or not; and that not suddenly, but after his mind had gradually become familiarized, unconsciously, with the idea of some interruption. Of course all this mental action of mine had been instantaneous; not so much thoughts and ideas succeeding one another as stamped all in a single die upon the mind. But, perhaps, after all, I should not have found the courage to play my destined part if I had not seen him turn to open the drawer where were laid away in lavender the clothes of the little children we had lost. I could not bear that he should touch them, desecrate, profane them. In a moment the sense of it sent the blood back to its proper channels, my nerves were my own; I was as cool as ever I had been in the coolest moment of my life. I reached out my hand gently and slowly, ever so slowly, turned up the lamp, so that gradually and unsuspectingly, as twilight dawns into day, the man found himself surrounded with full, soft light, and for one instant ceased his explorations and rubbed his eyes. "Stop a minute," said I then, in as quiet a tone as was ever uttered, "and look here, if you please."

"He almost jumped as I spoke. Then he moved his head and glanced at me, and laughed in a sudden, malicious way."

"Oh, it's you, is it?" said he. "Well then, you just lie still or I'll put daylight through you—our lamp-light either, it's all the same—in no time!"

"But I want to speak with you," said I, half rising and leaning upon my elbow.

"Don't want any preaching," said he, with quick intuition, and turning back to his work again.

"I've no idea of preaching," said I. "I don't know how."

"Look here," he cried, in a subdued voice, pulling out the drawer with the words, to lose no time. "Shut your mouth, or I'll shut it for you with this!" And he showed me the butt-end of a revolver.

"I had just as lief you would as have you open that drawer," I answered. "There is nothing there—oh, please don't! Truly, there is nothing there but the little clothes of my children that died; and I couldn't bear, oh, I couldn't bear to have them touched by a hand with guilt on it!"

"Guess there is," said the man, although he paused in his undertaking; "guess there is something there, or you'd never make that sort of fuss."

"I am telling you the truth!" I exclaimed. "If you'll promise not to touch me I'll come there myself, and take every thing out and shake it, and show you that there is nothing there worth a pin to you, though they are worth all the world to me!"

"Well," said he, turning his face round full upon me, "you're a game one. I'll take you at your word. You'll be so kind though in return as to show me where there is something worth a pin to me, and a diamond pin at that."

"Very well," I said, hurriedly. "There's my watch, and there's my purse with some change in it—several dollars—and there's the washer-woman's money; and I'll show you some more presently if you'll sit down there and let me tell you why I don't want you to take my husband's diamond pin—I think you wouldn't if you only knew."

"Don't catch an old bird with chaff," said he, with a grim laugh, rather amused than otherwise by my temerity, and gathering the various articles as I pointed them out. "And you don't catch me in your traps either. Come, hurry up your cakes! I've no time to lose."

"There isn't any trap to catch you in," said I. "You know very well that nobody could hear me if—"

"If you screamed the top of your head off! No. And I know too that your husband can't come till to-morrow without he flies; and I know too that he was paid a thousand dollars yesterday, and that you'll tell me where it is or— and he grasped his revolver again with meaning. But I felt convinced that he would put off screams and a noise like that as long as possible."

"I should think if you were so badly off as to be obliged to do this," still urged I, "that you would have some sympathy for people that would be worse off than you are if you took all their money—for you can steal and they can't!" I added, determined he should hear me if I had to die for it, and speaking so fast that he couldn't interrupt me. "If you had notes due at the bank, where grasping, cruel directors won't hear a word about delay or accommodation, and it is pay or protest, pay or ruin of all your credit and business prospects, being turned outdoors or having a keeper indoors, and nothing but death and despair ahead; and if you left what little money you had with your wife for her to take care of it for you, what would you think of her if she surrendered it to any body that just threatened her life, when it was as good as losing your own life to lose that money?"

"I vow!" said the man, grinning from ear to ear of his great dark face, as much entertained as if a sparrow had suddenly perched on his finger and laid a case before him, "if you ain't the first person I ever heard attempt to argue with a house-breaker!"

"Why, I'm not arguing," I said. "I only wish I could tell you about our difficulties, so that you'd go somewhere—somewhere—"

"Where they can better afford to have such visitors. Well, people that have diamond scarf-pins of this sort," and he held the live splendor up to the light with gusto, "can afford it as well as the best, I guess. Come, make a clean breast—"

"As for that diamond pin," I broke forth wildly again, "you might be welcome to it, if it were my property, for I don't care about such things to wear. But it isn't. It was Rob's great-grandfather's."

"It's mine now," said the man, with a sort of ghastly humor; "findings having!"

"Of course I can't help your taking it if you will, but I wouldn't take it if I were you," I went on. "I've been relying on it so—we haven't any friends, you know—no one to help us if we fall; so long as we had that I didn't feel quite lost, because if Rob had to produce the shares of the Quicksilver, that he bought long to sell short, and hasn't paid for at all, this would be some security; and if the Lime Burners' Company bursts, as I know it will, this would be a nucleus for something else to start from its ashes; and if the Widows and Orphans' Bank fails, this would pay back the only widow and orphan that he persuaded to invest there, and Rob would cut his throat, I know he would, if he couldn't pay her back then! And if the mortgage is foreclosed on his mother's house—he has his old mother and three helpless sisters to support—this would be enough for the first payment on another house for them. Oh, there's no end of ifs!" I exclaimed, in the swift and unstemmable torrent of words that I was pouring forth. "And if all these ifs all came down together, it would be enough at any rate to pay our passages to California, where we could begin again—"

"By George!" cried the man, who had listened to me perforce, with his mouth open in amazement at my audacity and impetuosity. "There's your pin, little woman. You're one of us. Be blamed if I'll go back on any of the craft. Make it up somewhere else!" And he shut his eyes and tossed the glittering thing to me. It fell short, of course, struck against something, a stone loosened, dropped out, and rolled a little way along the carpet. The man stepped instinctively to pick it up for me; and as he stooped to do so, he caught sight of my shoe and of its false sole, snatched it into his hand, and emptied it in a twinkling, while the wicked bills hurriedly fluttered out, as if they wanted to go.

"Aha!" said he. "And what is this?"

"I told you I could tell you where there was something more, if you would listen to me," I stammered.

"You're a cunning, lying fox, with your tongue!" he cried. "I'll listen to nothing more! And I'll—"

"His face darkened, and I trembled before the unuttered threat. But if the shoe were gone, let me save the envelope, and the San Graal, and the bill beneath the slab. "No, I'm not!" I answered. "I'm only a woman defending her husband. And as for the rest, you promised to befriend me kindly a moment since, and you'll keep your promise. I'm going to make you pledge it!" I said, gayly, smiling on him as sweetly as I ever smiled on Rob (I was very pretty in those days—it's so long since, and I've got over it so bravely that I may say so now safely), and pulling the shawl, which I had caught when I first rose in the bed, more closely about my shoulders. "I've heard of people," I continued, "staying to take supper in the houses they—"

"Robbed," said he, imperturbably, supplying the word I had not liked to use on our present good terms, his greed of gain and his anger evidently both being overcome by my persistency and daring, which were so novel to him.

"I can't invite you to do so here," I resumed, swiftly, "because this isn't my house. But there's a bottle with a couple of glasses of wine left in it in that secretary behind you—"

"How do I know but it's poisoned?" he asked, gruffly with his voice, almost good-naturedly with his face.

"Oh, I'll taste it first, if you wish me to," I responded. "That's right. Help yourself. And now I want to ask you a question, for he was no longer a burglar, but an acquaintance with whom I was having a confidential conversation, afraid of him to the roots of my hair though I was."

"You'd best be careful," said he, taking a sip of the Madeira. "You've wheedled me out of one job with your tongue—"

"You said you'd make this up somewhere else," I said, paying no attention to that pleasantry. "Does what you make so last you long?"

"No," he responded, in a surly fashion, not exactly as if vexed with me, but as if disturbed by the remembrance of his frequent impecuniosities. "Light come, light go."

"I shouldn't think it was very light come," said I.

"Well, it isn't!" he replied, quite put off his guard by any such unheard-of demonstration as sympathy with his dangers and distresses.

"I should think you'd enjoy, a great deal better than this sort of work, a piece of land such as any one can have for the asking in this country, turning over the soil by day, watching the corn spring—your own corn—knowing that you make something out of the earth that never would have been made but for you; smoking your pipe at night, with the women going and coming about you—"

"He set down his glass, which he had paused in the act of draining, in order to wheel about and see again what manner of woman it was talking to him in this sort; then I saw his face fall, and it made me feel sure that he must once, even if ever so long ago, have certainly had such a home, where cheerful women came and went."

"And you could send for your mother," I said, "or a sister. What pleasure it would give them! I suppose they have not heard from you in a long time. They love you, you know—people never get over that—or, perhaps, some good innocent girl would by-and-by marry you, and think there never was any body like you, and you would have dear little children toddling round, and be so happy."

"He sank down in the chair and gave one great sob. "Don't you talk that way to me," said he. "It's all up with me—that lay. Once—I'll not think of that! No, I'll never think of that! But I'll tell you what!" he exclaimed, glancing up directly, with a flushed face and a look like another man's. "If I could get away from my mates, and go to that new country you speak of—I'd try! I swear I would! I hate the life! I hate it! I was not born to it—I fell—I got there—I can't get away—but, God! if I could, I'd try—I swear I would!"

"Would you really?" said I, hesitating only a moment. "Then see here! Now I am going to trust you—for I believe, in spite of your being here, that you are in reality a man of honor—"

"That sounds odd, doesn't it? Well, I am!" said he, straightening himself suddenly, as if he meant to kill me if I dared to doubt it.

"I said so," I returned. "Now, in that drawer where you got the pin there's a box, and that belongs to me. It's an heir-loom; it belonged once to my great-grandfather, or rather to his wife, what is in that box, I mean. It's an old-fashioned stomacher of amethysts and topazes and big white pearls. Nobody wears them nowadays. Now Rob would starve before he'd use it the way I talked about using the other things, because it isn't his. And his mother would too; she doesn't like me very well. And I'll take it to-morrow and sell it; the pearls and filagree-work will bring a good price, I know, and Rob will get you out of the scent of those men, and put you safe on board a ship for California, passage paid, and money in your pocket. Rob can get around those men you can't avoid; he can do any thing. And I don't think I can ever do any thing better than that with the money, if you'll just promise me you'll never steal a pin again. Will you?"

"As true as there's a Lord in Heaven, I will!" he cried out, with tears streaming over his face.

"And then you needn't feel any obligation for it," I said, "because it's only a rightful recompense to you for not exerting your power over me when I was so helpless. That shows you have a great deal of goodness somewhere. Only I know you wouldn't take the money for that."

"How do you know I wouldn't take it for that?" he cried again. "How do you know there's any goodness in me? How could you tell, in God's name, that there was any thing in me to save at all? Oh, God bless you! You're an angel! You've got a voice like my little sister that died years ago. Never touch a pin again? I'd do more than that for your sake!"

"You said I was a fox, a little while ago," I said. "But I don't want you to do it merely for my sake, or my asking. I want you to remember please that the Lord made the earth, with all its treasures—somebody must have made it, you know—and the one that made it it belongs to, of course, and he has a right to do as he chooses with it and put it wherever he thinks best. And if he puts more in my charge than in yours, you have no right to alter it, but only to know that he always has a good reason for every thing, and so of course for that; and to remember that if you rob me you really rob him, because he does not give it to me; I must leave it when I die, he trusts it in my keeping for some purpose of his own that you don't know any thing about. And when he has given you health and strength and life itself, the world to live in, blue sky over you, and so many other blessings, it is not only wicked, it is mean, to go and take still more by violence. That's all my preaching," said I. "And you heard it after all. And I haven't a single doubt but that you'll always do right. Won't you? Now I'll ask you to take this diamond as a pledge, and when you bring it back to-morrow my husband shall do every thing just as I give you my word!"

"The man flung back the diamond, stepped forward and seized my hand and kissed it till I, not liking to withdraw it, felt guilty and ashamed myself. Then he sprang through the window at which he had found entrance, and as he swung himself down from bough to bough, I heard him muttering to some one below: "No go, Jem. All a mistake. A set of beggars, no swag there, every thing plated from garret to cellar, and a gamy little woman with a tongue like all artillery!" and so on, and so on, interspersed with jargon."

"I had a parcel by Adams Express a few years since. It was that little gold box on my centre-table, of exquisite workmanship outside, and more exquisite still inside, for it was filled with gold dust. And folded at the bottom of the box was a little parchment engrossed with what appeared to be a gift to me of the freedom of the city of San Juacita. And I always supposed that He must be the Mayor."

"Well, well!" said Rob, when Aunt Lenore had finished. "I don't see but that you and cousin Quintilia, mother, are on equal ground. She sent her burglar to Coventry, and you sent yours to California. You put your burglar into office; and she put hers into jail."

ADVICE GRATIS.

THE passion for proselytizing—for making converts—for imposing our own modes of thinking and acting on others, is not confined to religion, or the more serious affairs of life; it penetrates the most trivial details of existence. Nearly every man believes himself to be infallible in all he does, and wishes to share his infallibility with others. He rises at six o'clock every morning, and consequently wishes every body, old or young, idle or busy, strong or weak, to rise at the same hour. He plunges into a cold bath the moment he rises, and, consequently, wishes every body to indulge in the luxury or penalty of early cold bathing, without reference to habits or constitution. He eats underdone steaks for breakfast, and wishes every body to do the same. He dines early or late, as the case may be, but whatever may be his hours he always wishes to impose them on his friends and acquaintances. He drinks claret instead of beer, or beer instead of claret, and is resolved that every body shall patronize his favorite drink. He has faith in a particular doctor, or a particular medicine, and every one must share this faith, if he can possibly make them. His attempts at conversion are sometimes only amiable and foolish, but in most cases they are dogmatic and disagreeable. He knows, or thinks he knows, the best wine-merchant; and he wears, or thinks he wears, the best clothes, made by the best tailor. He goes to a particular watering-place, and all his friends must go there also; or he changes his mind, and prefers the bustle of foreign travel, and all his friends must follow his example. His favorite books, his favorite opera, his favorite pictures must be made other people's favorites; and his antipathies in matters of art must be made other people's antipathies. He hates driving or he likes driving; he hates walking or he likes walking; he hates riding or he likes riding; but whatever he hates or whatever he likes must be hated or admired by his companions. He invests his money in particular schemes, or he declines to speculate in any thing more risky than the national funds, and his commercial judgment must regulate the investments of his friends. He admires one system of education, or he hates another, or he objects to all recognized systems, and those who know him must think as he does. The Great Mogul is not more tyrannical; the Pope is not more exacting.

What he gains by this passion for proselytizing he probably never asks himself. He may gratify his sense of self-importance, but he does so by incurring great trouble and responsibility. The responsibility may not be pressing, but it exists nevertheless. Out of twenty more or less patient or impatient listeners he may make one convert, and this convert may not be benefited by the conversion. A sedentary man may be started on walks that overtax his strength; a weak creature may be hurried into an illness by being baked in a Turkish bath, or chilled in a cold-water tank. An impressionable man may be ruined by an injudicious speculation, and all by the advice of our practical dogmatist. The pleasure of giving advice and seeing it followed is dearly bought by the giver. If the advice is bad the adviser is blamed by those who took it, and by hundreds who knew that it was going to be taken; and if it is good, and proves successful, the adviser is rarely thanked for his trouble.

TABLE SERVING.

THERE have been endless discussions as to the relative merits of the two systems of serving; named, rather arbitrarily, the one à la Française, the other à la Russe. The first consists in setting the whole of a course on the table at once, taking each dish off to carve it; in the second mode the dishes are brought to table already cut up, which makes it difficult to present them otherwise than in fragments, set up together again in the best practicable way.

The differences of opinion as to which is the best of these two systems have now nearly been settled, as most questions of this kind are, by a compromise. Both systems have their advantages and disadvantages; the mode of serving à la Russe is undeniably simpler and more expeditious than that à la Française, the complications and slowness of which have been justly criticised; but in the former system the necessity of cutting up all the dishes before the guests see them puts an end to the opportunities of decoration, which many cooks turned to so good account, and tends to destroy the tasteful and rich appearance which formerly characterized high-class cookery.

On the other hand, we must admit that it is very objectionable to keep such dishes waiting on the table as are likely to suffer thereby: dish warmers and covers are of little avail; for many of the most recherché dishes require to be eaten immediately they leave the kitchen. In such cases there need be no uncertainty as to the right mode of serving; it would be folly to make a display of dishes of this kind, which can not wait. The question of appearance must be made quite subordinate to that of consumption. Thus, when weighing the pro and contra of both modes of serving, there is little need to waver long between one or the other; the compromise is self-indicated by experience.

For instance, nothing is to prevent putting on the table, to dress and deck it as it should be, first, large cold pieces, capable of receiving such great richness of ornamentation; also removes and hot entrées, which are generally equal to waiting on the dish-warmers without deteriorating.

In this way the guests, when they sit down, will not be greeted by a table decked out merely with fruit, compôtes, bronze articles of vertu, vases of flowers, and similar objects, little nourishing in themselves, and unlikely to act as appetizers, so as to insure justice being done to the dinner about to follow.

Neither will there be any objection to merely sending round the cut-up dishes, which require immediate eating, without seeking to use them for show purposes. By these means the dinner will be sooner and more evenly served, and ample time will be obtained to carve the large dishes properly.

I aver that a dinner presented in this way, from the fusion of both systems, can not fail to please the cook who has prepared it, and the guests who partake of it; the latter will not pause to consider whether they have been served more particularly à la Française or à la Russe; but they will admit that the dinner has realized the essentials of gastronomy.

LINES

TO A FELLOW-PASSENGER ALIGHTING AT A SUBURBAN RAILWAY STATION.

O GLAD young father, coming from the city—
One, maybe, of the throng who think the gate
Of heaven will swing unto their camels' freight,
Though mountainous with riches—twere a pity
Not to joy with you in the sweet embrace
Of wife and infant at your stopping-place.
And, fortunate father! if your blushes rise,
Confessing all the error of the day,
And that even as this child the way
Into the Kingdom lies, and only lies.
So much allow me of self-righteousness,
For I am jealous of your tender greeting;
Me there awaits no little one's caress,
My coming sets no baby-heart to beating.
And in your ointment I must find some fly,
Or from excess of envy I shall die.
Ah, wait a little! thus it shall not be Always—no, nor for long;
Not in a day bloomed your paternity,
And I am young.
Wait, then, and if you will, exult,
But not too proudly, in your morning glories;
At noon my modest garden-plot consult,
And you shall see upspringing
The rarest flower that earth can show,
On which the winds shall fear to blow,
The sun to shine too fiercely, or
The chill rain recklessly to pour;
And you shall hear me singing:
"Shepherds! among the number reckon me
Of those blest souls that dwell in Arcady!"—
Et ego in Arcadia, pastores!

WOMEN PHYSICIANS.

THE question as to the fitness of women for the medical profession has been solved in this country in the practical way usual with our people. The daughters of America, waiving all theories on the subject, have set to work and turned themselves into doctors, and with such good effect that they are already sharing the fees in all the large cities with their male competitors. In England they are more slow to act, and, though apparently disposed to follow our example, they retain evidently some misgivings as to the fitness of women for the practice of medicine. A writer who, in the last number of Macmillan's Magazine, discusses the question at length, thinks that the doubt sometimes expressed, as to whether average women have sufficient force of brain to justify the hope of success in a pursuit which makes a considerable demand upon mental power, is difficult to answer in the absence of data to go upon. Till women have the same educational advantages as men there can be no basis of comparison. All women who do any thing are self-made, and can only be fairly compared with self-made men. The achievements in science and literature of such women as Mrs. Somerville, Harriet Martineau, Anna Swanwick, and the author of "Adam Bede" must be taken as representing, besides what is actually accomplished, a reserve of force expended in overcoming special obstacles. For women have to contend, not only with the negative drawbacks of incomplete education and a secluded life, but also with that peculiarly subtle and deadening influence which consists in feeling constantly—or, at least, till they have conquered a high place for themselves —that nothing very good is expected from them. Among all the heavy burdens and discouragements which weigh them down there is, perhaps, none more universally depressing.

The exceptionally strong, no doubt, rise above it. But a portion of their strength is consumed in the struggle. Effort can not be put forth without corresponding exhaustion. In the meantime the success which has been attained by women, in the face of peculiar difficulties, encourages a sanguine estimate of what they may do under more favorable circumstances.

The same consideration must be borne in mind while dealing with the further question, Have women sufficient physical and nervous strength to endure so arduous a life? Will they not break down in the attempt?

It is tolerably easy to answer this question in so far as it relates to the influence of the mere study of medicine on the health of the student. No one who knows what the course of study really is doubts that women of good average health could prepare themselves for examination without any undue tax upon either their mental or physical powers. The important part of the question is that which relates to the after-life of practice as a physician.

Are women strong enough for that? In the absence of experience we can but suggest a few considerations which tend to reassure us on this point. It may be noticed, in the first place, with regard to physical strength, that wherever it is needed in other callings women are not, as a rule, incapacitated by the want of it. A physician would not need to be so strong as a nurse, a washer-woman, or a char-woman. She might be much weaker, physically, than the woman who stands behind a counter or who does needle-work for fourteen hours daily. Moreover, the demand for both muscular and nervous strength comes gradually to a physician. During the first few years of professional life he is not overwhelmed with work, and he has time to become accustomed to a fair amount of exertion. When in really full practice he can afford to spare himself much fatigue, as, for instance, by keeping a carriage instead of using cabs or walking. The same is true of night-work. Inexperienced people are apt to think that, because a doctor is sometimes called up, he scarcely ever gets a good night's rest; whereas the truth probably is, that a physician in even large practice is not often called up more than once or twice in the week.

With regard to the mental strain involved in a physician's life, it must be remembered that there is a good deal of practice which does not bring anxiety. A young physician is more or less anxious about all but the most trivial cases when he has not much practice. As his experience widens he finds the work more easy, and the proportion of cases which tax his nervous strength does not very rapidly increase. For some years, too, it is his duty to obtain in all serious cases the support of an opinion based upon wider experience than his own, and by doing so he is relieved of much of the responsibility and anxiety he would otherwise incur. Moreover, as his knowledge increases he learns to recognize the cases in which the failure of his art is certain, cases beyond the skill of any physician; he sees what is not to be done, and from that moment is anxious only to relieve suffering: he can not be anxious about a result which is beyond his control.

It is possible, however, that some women would be unable to free themselves from what might become an intolerable burden of anxiety. Also to some the constant sight of suffering would be more than could be borne without serious injury to health. The condition of exalted, almost morbid sensibility, in which every sense is preternaturally acute, and every mental act a keen excitement—the condition which, in the absence of an English name, is known as l'état nerveux—would certainly unfit its victim for the work of a physician. But, happily, this is a rare and exceptional condition, and one which a life of unselfish and varied activity is the least likely to engender. In considering the effect any proposed change in the lives and habits of women may possibly have upon their health, we must not forget what may be urged against the mode of life now prescribed. It is conceivable that a life of greater activity and of increased responsibility might be found too exacting in some individual cases. What we have to consider is whether this risk is worth incurring. No one knows how many women there are whose physical and mental health is now destroyed by the dreary vacuity of the lives they are compelled to lead. It is not true that enforced idleness—a life empty of any keen interest, empty of invigorating moral and intellectual discipline—is merely "rather dull." It is terribly demoralizing. It is the immediate parent of hysteria, insanity, and vice.

An objection of even greater practical weight is, that if women entered the medical profession one of two things would happen: either they would marry, and by so doing lose the benefit of all that had been spent on their professional education, or they would be tempted to abandon their natural sphere as wives and mothers, and, in fact, to give up their raison d'être. Assuming for a moment that a married woman could not practice as a physician, and that, therefore, a woman would have to choose between marrying and remaining in her profession, it may be fairly asked if to have such a choice would be a misfortune either to herself or to any one else? Is it desirable that women should be driven into marriage by the erection of artificial barriers before every other path leading to happiness and dignity? Would any man like to think that he had been taken into the holiest and closest of relationships as the only mode of escape from an ennui which was rapidly becoming intolerable? Men give up a good deal for the sake of marriage—would it injure a woman to have something to give up also? A profession which brings to those who practice it worthily a source of keen and lasting interest, and the dignity of a good social position, would remove the humiliation of celibacy, while it would not hinder the right kind of marriage.

But it is not necessary to assume that a woman must certainly abandon her profession if she marries. This would not be the result if she had no children. Childless wives—and they number one-eighth of all married women—are not much less in need of an occupation than they were before marriage; and a woman who had previously had the care of a house in addition to her professional work would find no difficulty in combining both duties afterward. The fact of her marriage would perhaps increase the value of her services as a physician to some of her patients. Even if she had children it is difficult to see why she should not retain her consulting-room practice, although it might be necessary to give up some of the general family visiting. In the lower branches of the profession, where the consulting-room practice bears a very small proportion to the visiting, a married woman with children could still share the practice with her husband if he were a doctor. They could work together as partners even if, owing to her other duties, she could not undertake as much of the work as he did. The experiment has been successfully tried here in America, where there are many examples of wives working with their husbands with signal advantage.

In thus expressing our opinion that women physicians need not consider themselves pledged to celibacy, it must be understood that we refer only to those who have completed the course as students, and have gained a foothold of their own in the profession by some years of steady and diligent work as general practitioners or as physicians. If they choose to marry before or immediately after receiving their diploma, they must be prepared to give up the hope of attaining eminence in their profession, or indeed any independent position at all. Even in this case they would probably have no cause to regret their knowledge of medicine.

THE CROSSING SWEEPERS.

BY EDMUND KIRKE.

ALL the day long, with naked feet,
In the driving rain and the blinding sleet,
In the biting cold and the scorching heat,
The boys stand there in the crowded street,
Saying to all who pass that way:
"A penny, Sir—a penny, pray;
We've swept the crossing—every stone—
Till it's clean as a broom and dry as a bone,
And you can cross without wetting your feet:
A penny, Sir, for something to eat."
But a surly word or an angry frown
Is all they can get—those waifs of the town.

All the day long, from morn till night,
In the garish sun and the dim gas-light,
Ahungered and cold, in wretched plight,
Those boys stand there, a piteous sight;
But never a passer stops to ask
If they get bread by their thankless task;
And never a Christian gives a thought
To the tender souls his Lord has bought;
For things like these can have no needs;
In God's great garden they are but weeds.
So on they go, in their saintly pride,
Like him of old, on the other side.

The moon comes out, and the stars look down
With pitiful eyes on the pitiless town,
And then these waifs whom none will own
Sink down to sleep on the cold, gray stone.
To sleep, and to dream of another day,
In some fair country, far away,
Where all the streets—so they've been told—
Are paved with gems and shining gold;
And many a sweeper rides about
In gaudy livery and grand turn-out;
And many a poor, neglected thing,
Becomes a great and mighty king.

Dream on, poor boys, nor wake again,
In the blinding sleet and the driving rain;
Where all for you is sin or pain—
The pauper's bed or the walk of Cain.
Better than that is the silent flow
Of the peaceful river there below;
For in its depths is a pitchy slime
That is purer far than vice or crime;
And on its breast is a wintry tide
That is kinder far than the men of pride,
Who build great temples of goodly stones,
And leave to perish Christ's little ones.

CHAPTER XI.

PUSS-IN-BOOTS.

It was not very long before the Prince's tenants in Horn and its neighborhood began to feel the pressure of an unseen hand, which weighed rather heavily upon them in various ways. The new land-steward, Major von Groll, was by no means a popular character in the district. He was never seen, and it was therefore safe to attribute to him all the disagreeable and tyrannous qualities which the imaginations of the people who suffered from the severity of his rule were able to conjure up. True, he used a cat's-paw to pull sundry ripe, plump, temptingly-cooked chestnuts out of the fire—a very soft cat's-paw covered with a velvet glove. But what comfort was this, seeing that the chestnuts were infallibly taken? And then, too, poor Grimaldin got scorched in the process.

A mild, fair-spoken gentleman was the Herr Justizrath; always ready to listen to reason and to sympathize with trouble. But his chief, the Major, was inexorable. It cut him (Von Schleppers) to the heart to be obliged to refuse to renew a lease, or to have to raise a rent, or to eject a tenant. But his duty clearly was to carry out the orders of the Prince's steward. And he must say, hard as it was in many cases to make the admission, he must, as a jurist, confess that the Herr Major von Groll had law if not justice on his side, and always kept strictly, though sternly, within the limits of his right.

Poor Grimaldin!

It struck some people as singular that Major von Groll, who was a stranger in the Principality, should possess so intimate a knowledge of the state of affairs in Detmold. And such persons as found this strange, frequently expressed their wonder to Lawyer von Schleppers.

"Ay, ay," he would answer, dreamily. "Indeed, indeed! Well, I own that I am sometimes surprised myself at the extent of the Herr Land-steward's private information. Yes, I don't mind saying that it frequently surprises me. And, to speak truth, I have more than once doubted his accuracy on certain points, and have said to him, 'Lieber Herr von Groll, I think that here you are mistaken. The rent has hitherto been so many thalers, and not so many, and the value of the land has not increased in such proportion as to make it fair to the tenant to raise his rent.' I desire above every thing to be fair to the tenant—always with due regard to the interests of my gracious master, his highness. But I have always been wrong in my facts. Always wrong. Ach Himmel! The Herr Major von Groll knows it all as I know my alphabet. And you see in Bopp's time I had no chance of knowing much of the land-steward's business. Because old Bopp—rest his soul, an excellent man!—did the work of managing the estate himself, and only employed me professionally when any case of litigation arose. It is nominally the same now. Oh yes, quite the same—nominally. But—"

And then people would go away and say how hard it was that the foreign Major should take the salary, while the indefatigable Justizrath did the work. And in the privacy of their own houses many would go a step farther than this, and regret that Herr von Schleppers had not all the power in his own hands, since, if he had the power, poor folks would surely meet with kindness and consideration. All which would of course have surprised the Justizrath very much could he have heard it.

Poor Grimaldin!

On his return home after the visit he had paid to Horn, the old lawyer set to work in earnest to initiate Major von Groll into the duties of his new office. But it was an up-hill task. Von Groll was—if not, as Frau von Schleppers had so trenchantly observed, "as stupid as an owl"—still a slow-witted, simple, solemn man. His two predominant ideas were, firstly, that nobility of birth conferred almost limitless privileges, and rendered its possessor incalculably superior to all other mortals who were not born noble; and secondly, that it behooved a gentleman, out of respect for himself and his order, to use this superiority and these privileges with forbearance. To have endeavored to sway Major Ferdinand von Groll by any representation of the effect of his conduct upon those whom he looked on as his inferiors, would have been about as hopeless as to try to persuade him to leave off riding on the plea that his horses considered equestrian exercise to be highly objectionable. His mind was unconquerably indolent. Thinking was a process utterly distasteful, difficult, and laborious to the Major. So much the more tenaciously did he cling to any conviction once arrived at. He had arrived at the conviction that it would be profitable, and in no way degrading, to accept office under the Prince of Detmold. He had also, assisted by his wife, arrived at the conviction that Von Schleppers (himself a well-born man, and therefore, to some extent, a fellow-creature) ought to, and could, and would bear the main burden of the business. The duties of a real acting land-steward were, it seemed, onerous enough; involving memory, clearness, activity, and considerable special knowledge for their due performance. All Von Schleppers's explanations and observations served but to puzzle the ex-cavalry officer, and to convince him that he could not do better in the interests of the Prince than leave matters as much as possible in the lawyer's hands.

Meanwhile Lawyer von Schleppers was steadily making hay—the Prince's hay, of course—while the sun shone. But his business employments did not prevent him from prosecuting those private studies of character in which he considered himself to be so acute.

"Every scrap of information about people is of value, and comes to be useful some time or other."

So thought the Justizrath in justification of what some might have stigmatized as mere idle curiosity. But the truth was that Von Schleppers had the magpie instincts of acquisitiveness and secretiveness very strongly developed, and what sort of people were these Lehmanns, and whether he had brought any message for Liese.

"Dear me!" said the Justizrath, dreamily; "I had forgotten all about that. Yes, yes; kind greetings, hearty greetings, for the little maid. I must deliver them, if I can think of it. What sort of people are they? Oh, good, quiet country-folk. A fine old homestead, and a well-filled garner. Lehmann has that hill-side meadow too cheap, though. To be sure; Liese's kin, eh? Ay, ay, ay!"

He continued to "forget" the message to Liese, until an opportunity occurred of delivering it without witnesses. Frau von Schleppers had promised to grace with her presence a little réunion at the house of Frau von Groll. The Justizrath was invited also, but he never gave an unconditional assent to such invitations. Business as he avowed—and the Blue Pigeon, as he did not avow—had superior claims on him to those even of such highly polite society as was to meet at the Von Grolls'. He might be able to look in during the evening, or he might not. As soon as his wife had set off for the party he went into his own den, and, taking out a bulky leather pocket-book—the same which had figured at the Pied Lamb—began attentively to examine some hieroglyphical notes in it.

"Humph!" muttered the Justizrath; "seventeen in April last. She has been thirteen years with them, the housewife told me. Thirteen from seventeen. Only four years old. Well, well, all information is valuable. Sure to come in, every scrap."

With that he slowly rubbed his hands over one another, and walked into the kitchen.

There sat Lieschen, with a great brass pan on her knees, which brass pan she was polishing and rubbing until it shone in the fire-light like gold. A row of brass and pewter pots and dish-covers, already brightened by her busy hands, stood glis-her fluttered spirits very efficaciously. I have no idea that this panacea for over-sensitive nerves will ultimately supersede aromatic vinegar or eau de Cologne, but I throw out the hint for the benefit of those whom it may concern.

Presently Liese looked up, and beheld her master still planted before the fire as though he had taken root there.

"He must have come into the kitchen to give me some order, or to ask me some question, and has forgotten all about it," thought she. So she made bold to speak to him.

"Were you seeking any thing, gnädiger Herr?"

The Justizrath slowly turned his dull eyes upon her, and then answered, after a pause, "Right, child, right—I had nearly forgotten. I have to deliver a message to you from your—from the good people at the farm yonder."

"Oh! you saw them then, Sir? How was my dear cousin Franz? And cousin Hanne?" This last a shade less eagerly than the first inquiry.

"I saw them. Yes. Both the farmer and the hausfrau. They were well, and they sent you—let me see—ay, they sent you lovingest greetings. Those were Lehmann's very words. I am scrupulous to be exact. A message intrusted to you should be as precious as a sum of money given into your charge, and it would be equally wrong to take away a word from the one as a doir from the other. Remember that, little one."

"Yes, Sir," answered Liese, humbly.

And she thought within herself what a good true-hearted man the Herr Justizrath was, and what a weak little fool she must be to be afraid of him.

"They said too," proceeded Von Schleppers, "that they should send you over another parcel at the first opportunity."

"Heart's thanks, gnädiger Herr."

"I saw more than one friend of yours in Horn, Liese. There was the fat landlord, a solid-minded, honest fellow. And the old kuster—what's his name?—and Peters the apothecary."

Again the bright flush flitted over Liese's face, and the shy smile hovered round her lips.

"Oho!" thought the old lawyer, sagely; "I was right enough. That look was most surely not called up by the thought of the ancient sacristan. The lank, sandy-haired seller of drugs is the 'patriot,' after all."

You see the Justizrath did not know that the ancient sacristan had a nephew who was neither lank nor sandy-haired.

"Peters brought you a parcel from home some time ago, did he not?" said Von Schleppers, speaking carelessly, but watching the girl narrowly out of his cold cunning eyes.

"Yes, Sir, he did. But I did not see him. I was out on an errand for mistress."

The remembrance of the pink satin note-paper, and of the meeting with Otto, combined to deepen Liese's blush.

"He has known you a long time, this Peters?"

"Almost all my life. He remembers my coming to Horn in cousin Franz's wagon after poor mother died. I can scarce remember that myself."

Ting, ting, ting, jingled the house-bell, as though tugged at by strong, fearless fingers. Liese jumped up, and then stood hesitating.

"It's too soon for mistress to be home yet," said she. "I wonder who it can be!"

"You are surely not afraid to open the door, Liese?" said the Justizrath, testily. "No doubt it is some client come to consult me. Say I'm busy, very busy—d'ye hear?—but that you will ask if I can see any one should the case be urgent. Wait until I am in my study before you open the door."

Then the master of the house shuffled away to his sanctum, and closed, but did not quite shut the door. It would ill have comported with his social or professional dignity to have been caught in the kitchen. He had scarcely gained his own room when a second vigorous pull set the wire quivering, and made the thin-voiced bell jangle noisily.

He listened stealthily, and heard Liese's faltering footsteps approach the house-door. "What a little timid fool the girl is!" muttered her master, impatiently. He heard the bolt withdrawn, and almost immediately afterward a little exclamation from Liese; then another voice—a man's, as it seemed. But not all the sharpness of the Justizrath's hearing enabled him to distinguish what was said, and he did not venture to advance nearer, lest he should be caught by the visitor whose approach he momentarily expected. All at once, after a more protracted colloquy than he had anticipated, the house-door was closed and bolted, and the Justizrath, turning to his desk with a rapidity of movement which would have much surprised any of his acquaintance who should have witnessed it, plunged loved collecting and hiding odds-and-ends of information, even when it was out of the question that he should ever be able to use them.

Much stealthy enjoyment had the Justizrath in thinking over his evening at the Pied Lamb in Horn. And he did not forget to keep a quiet watch on Liese. He thought he had discovered the "patriot" who instilled hero-worship into her simple little mind, in the mild apothecary, Herr Peters. But then that shy smile! Could the thought of the spectacled, middle-aged, sandy-haired apothecary have conjured up that look on Liese's pretty face? It appeared unlikely, but the Justizrath von Schleppers knew very well that in judging of such matters the words "likely" and "unlikely" ought to be blotted out of one's dictionary. Jack and Jill seldom come together in accordance with the preconceived theories of their friends as to what would be fitting and desirable; and their friends are not unfrequently very angry in consequence. The Justizrath was by no means angry, however, because he thought he had discovered something which it had been intended to keep secret from him. Von Schleppers would have been grieved if you had murdered his brother—he was a far from inhuman man—but it would have been a decided consolation to him to have found out how you did it.

When the old lawyer returned home from Horn he gave the wife of his bosom a full account of his doings there. Mathilde was duly edified by the progress her lord had made in learning by heart the carte du pays of so considerable a portion of the scene of his future operations. Regarding only one part of his adventures did he show some reticence in his recital to Mathilde. That was his visit to Lehmann's farm. Frau von Schleppers, knowing that her husband had been in the neighborhood of her serving-maid's home, asked with some curiosity tening on the dresser. As she rubbed she sang softly to herself with the little bird-like chirp I have spoken of before, and her head was bent down, so that she did not see her master enter. Hear him she could not; for, noisy as the clapping slippers were sometimes, their wearer could shuffle along quietly enough when it so pleased him.

"Liese!"

"Ach, Herr Justizrath! Bitte! Did you call me? I didn't hear you."

"Ay, ay, child; how you jumped! Do you know what folks would say if you were a fine lady, eh?"

"N—o, Sir," stammered Liese, blushing violently.

"Why, they would say to your face that your nervous organization was extremely delicate; and they would say behind your back that you were a lump of affectation. Your mother is a braver woman than you, little Lieschen. It wouldn't be easy to frighten her, I'm thinking."

"My mother, Sir? Ach Gott! Poor mother is dead, gnädiger Herr, these many years."

Here a big round tear dropped on the brass pan and dimmed its lustre; and then Liese's slender wrist resumed its rapid oscillations to and fro with redoubled activity.

"Oh, true, child, true! There, there, I'm sorry, I'm sorry. What would you have? I believe I am the most absent man in the world."

The Justizrath threw as much kindness into his voice as he knew how, and expressed his regret by thrusting out his yellow tortoise-like head, and wagging it deprecatingly from side to side. So he stood and rubbed his hands over the fire in his old fashion, and gradually seemed to lapse into one of his waking dreams, and to be abstracted from all outward circumstances.

Liese dried her eyes and scrubbed away at the brass pan; and she found the employment soothed his hands into a mass of documents, and waited, with head bent down, for the expected client.

To his surprise, however, only little Liese's light tread came to the door. She paused a moment, and then knocked, seeing her master apparently absorbed in his papers.

"Well?" said the Justizrath, looking up.

"It was somebody for me, please, Sir."

"For you?"

"Yes; a friend of mine is going to Horn tomorrow, and came to ask if I had any message to send home."

"Ach, so-o-o!"

The Justizrath stared up at his little hand-maiden with a genuineness of expression to which he could not often plead guilty. Liese mistook the bland surprise of his face for the vacancy of abstraction more usual to it. So she turned round quietly and trotted into the kitchen again before her master could recover from his astonishment. By-and-by he called out to her:

"Liese! Liese, I say! Who was it that came just now?"

"A friend of mine, gnädiger Herr, is going to Horn, and called to ask if—"

"Ta, ta, child! You said all that. Who was it?"

"Oh! the young man at the stationer's shop, Sir; Herr Schmitt's assistant," answered Liese, greatly abashed.

The Justizrath dismissed her with a wave of his pen.

"Humph!" thought he, with a vivid recollection of the cadaverous boy whom he had seen through Herr Schmitt's shop-window, "this meek little damsel of ours has an odd enough taste in admirers. Or maybe this youth—who, by-the-way, comes pealing at the front bell with a boldness worthy of the 'patriot' himself—is only a tool and messenger of Peters's."

At half past eight o'clock the lawyer set forth to fetch his wife away from the festive and fashionable society at Major von Groll's. But never a word did old Puss-in-boots say to his Mathilde about Liese Lehmann's evening visitor.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

PROBABLY there are few architectural structures in our city which will be of such absorbing interest to ladies during the month of November as the magnificent retail store of Mr. A. T. Stewart. The opening of the new section will make this, beyond comparison, the largest and most elegant retail dry-goods establishment in the world. The entire building has about 200 feet frontage on both Broadway and Fourth Avenue, and 325 feet on Tenth Street, and is six stories above the street with basement and sub-basement. The superficial area of each floor is nearly two acres, and of all the floors, including the basements, more than twelve acres. The sub-basement is to be used for storing carpets before they are opened to the public; and the basement, which is amply lighted from the street, will be filled with every variety of carpet known in the markets of the world. The first story will be the most beautiful portion of the edifice. It is to be divided into sections, each devoted to some special department, the goods being so arranged as to be perfectly displayed without obstructing the view of the room. Near the centre an immense rotunda will rise to a height of more than one hundred feet, the top of which is tessellated glass. This rotunda is supported by heavy iron columns, which are elaborately embossed; and in each story the sides of the rotunda are surrounded by ornamented balustrades. The second story is devoted to cloaks, shawls, traveling suits, and similar special articles. The third story is occupied by the "cutting" department, where garments of every kind are cut according to the most approved styles. These are made up in the fourth and fifth stories. A sixth story, which has been added to the whole building, will be used for storing purposes. Two tanks for supplying water to every part of the building are upon this floor. All the stories are well lighted and ventilated. In the sub-basement there are four large boilers for generating steam by which the entire building is to be heated, also the engine by which the four large elevators connected with the upper part of the building are to be raised. The new additions to this establishment, which are now nearly completed, are in accordance with the original design of the architect, and will result in a structure of extraordinary symmetry, grandeur, and solidity.

The first sewing-machine is said to have been invented by Madersperger, a German citizen of Vienna, in 1815. But the inventor was not a man calculated to successfully introduce it; and the public mind was too much occupied in political and national affairs to receive any new impression easily. Mr. Corliss, of engine fame, invented a sewing-machine, which was in constant use in his family, and he fully intended to have it patented, but was so busied with his new engine that he neglected it until it was too late.

A gentleman, who has ascended the snowy range of the Colorado, says that flowers were blossoming to the very summit, and among them the most fragrant ones of the mountains. In some cases they were growing up through the snow and ice, and in one instance he was compelled to break the ice with his heel before he could get the flower.

An anecdote is related of the English actress Clara Fisher, which illustrates her happy conception of character, and her extraordinary presence of mind. On one occasion she was to personate Richard III., and a new and elegant crown had been made for her. It was accidentally made too small, and was with difficulty kept on the head. When Richard, personated by Clara, descended from the throne in the presence of his nobles, and was delivering one of his most impassioned speeches, the crown fell off upon the stage. Little Clara took no notice of the circumstance, but concluded her speech with the same energy and commanding deportment with which it commenced; then beckoning to Catesby to approach, "Catesby," she said, pointing to the fallen diadem, and stood erect and motionless, with the haughty dignity of monarchy, until the brief mandate understood, he lifted it and solemnly replaced it on her brow. A less gifted performer might have found it difficult to save the whole scene from derision; but she, sternly maintaining the royal character she had assumed, commanded the respect and admiration of the audience.

In Russia ladies eat and sleep so much that when quite young they grow out of what we would regard as good shape and proportion; but there excessive corpulence is thought perfectly charming. "How beautiful and thick she is!" they regard as a complimentary phrase.

Diamonds threaten to become too common. Those who have money to lavish may be obliged to look around for something else upon which to expend it. A French chemist has discovered a method for producing diamonds, colorless, colored, or black. They are obtained from cast iron in a liquid state, by means of a current of dry chlorine, introduced into the crucible containing the iron. This produces the crystallization of the carbon in the iron, and thus the diamonds. The required shade is given to the crystals by means of metallic oxides of different colors.

Many years ago an intelligent boy was sent to school with others of his age. But his teacher could not make him learn his letters, and flogged him again and again in old-fashioned style. Still the boy could not or would not distinguish A from B, and he was finally given over as incorrigibly stupid. Yet he was bright enough in many things outside of books, and though he could not learn to read, he was not behind his mates in other knowledge that came within his power. It was not until he had attained his majority that, putting on a pair of spectacles from accidental curiosity, he discovered how the words and letters, which always before had appeared blurred, indistinct masses of a grayish color, looked separate and clear, and knew how it was that he had been flogged in childhood, and had never learned to read. He availed himself of his new knowledge with promptness; and is now a successful business man in Buffalo.

Children are too often blamed and punished in cases when, if proper investigation was made, they would be found entirely innocent of any fault. The above incident recalls many similar ones which have come to our knowledge. Not long ago a lady remarked that, when a little girl, she was often reproved because her work was not thoroughly done. Her mother, wisely believing in the expediency of instructing her daughter in domestic duties, committed to her, each morning, the care of certain rooms. But seldom were the sweeping and dusting performed well enough to suit the mother's critical eye. She found crumbs on the floor, dust on the table, and cobwebs on the walls, where the child could find none. Of course she was often reproved—so often that she felt quite discouraged. Years afterward, when she discovered for herself that nothing was plain and distinct to her vision a few feet distant from her eyes, she understood why it was, that when a child, she could never see the specks of dirt that her mother's eye so quickly discerned.

The man of fashion in 1720 wore the full-curved flowing wig, which fell in ringlets half-way down his arms and back; a neck-cloth tied tight round his neck; a coat reaching to his ankles, laced, straight, formal, with buttons to the very bottom, and several on the pockets and sleeves; his shoes were square at the toes, had diminutive buckles, a monstrous flap on the instep, and high heels; a belt secured the coat, and supported the sword.

On the eastern side of Lake Bombazine, not far from Castleton, Vermont, is a large manufactory of slate-pencils, said to be the only one in the country, and the greatest in the world. About 100,000 pencils are made here every day.

The virtues of borax are gradually becoming known. In fact, if we can rely on numerous statements, it is good for almost every thing. It is said to be a sovereign remedy for cock-roaches. It should be sprinkled at night on infested places, and the process repeated for two or three nights in succession.

A favorite condiment with many is tomato sweet pickles. Sweet apples may be prepared in a somewhat similar manner. Make a sirup in the proportion of one quart of cider-vinegar to one pint of sugar, sufficient to cover the desired quantity of apples. After the fruit is carefully prepared it should be boiled in the sirup until tender, spice of various kinds being added according to taste. The sirup may be boiled a few minutes after taking out the apples. Pears and peaches are very nice prepared in a similar way.

The peach crop in Ohio has been unusually large, and some dealers have been extensively engaged in canning the fruit.

The late Queen of Madagascar lost faith in her idols some time before her death. When dying she called upon some Christian officers who were attending upon her to pray to the true God. And to the great astonishment of every body, no idol was present at the funeral. The national idols have now been abolished in Madagascar.

The idea that to educate and train women thoroughly is to develop them into an inferior kind of man is precisely the reverse of the truth. The highest results of culture are to give control over the will, and to enable either man or woman to submit theirs when it is right that they should do so. A graceful obedience to a power which has the right to such obedience, although in both moral and intellectual force it may be inferior, is the surest evidence of true magnanimity. The petulant self-assertion of underbred women is one of the surest, as it is one of the most irritating, proofs of the absence of all true education. If a woman can not get through her housekeeping duties in sufficient time to inform herself in regard to the topics of the day, the probabilities are that she gives her husband a bad dinner, dresses her children and herself in bad taste at a great expense, and changes her servants constantly. Such are often the consequences of a defective education, and of marrying a husband who, never having known a true living woman, does not dream of the possibilities of happiness and life which lie within his reach, if he himself only had the intellect and will to call forth and develop the capabilities of the woman he has sworn to love, honor, and protect.

The Rast Gofar, an Indian paper, gives an account of a singular marriage which recently took place in Bombay between a Maharaj, long past the meridian of life, and a girl of ten years old. These Maharajs are believed to be incarnations of the Deity, yet are they said to incorporate in themselves the very essence of sensuousness and depravity of the blackest character. The bride was the daughter of a poor Telinga Brahmin, who received a large sum of money for giving the girl in marriage. The Maharajs are considered as outcasts, and no Brahmin gives his daughter in marriage to them without a large compensation in money, as he and his family lose caste immediately after the marriage. Every fraction of the large sums expended on this marriage was drawn from the blind devotees of Chimunlaljee Maharaj. On his marriage-day Chimunlaljee sat in his own temple with a wealth of smiles upon his face, and the people vied with each other in offering at his feet presents of money, jewels, and clothes. Later in the day, when in the immense procession, he was the "cynosure" of all eyes. A sight of the bride was a secondary matter.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

BLANCHE.—Fluting is used this fall to trim alpaca and other worsted goods. We will give the information you want in a future Number.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Seventy-five dollars a pound is paid for hair a yard and a half long in its rough state. Why does your friend wish to part with such fine hair? Only necessity should compel her.

LOUISE.—Make a petticoat of black and brown striped satin, or of poplin with satin stripes. Cut the upper-skirt and baschlik fichu by the pattern given in No. 50 of the Bazar. Trim with a marquise ruche, or with bias folds of the striped skirt, and fringe. Pleat a ten-inch flounce on your white dress headed by a chain of puffs bound with a color. Puffed trimming on the cuffs, and as epaulets. The fichu will be in good taste.

MISS G.—The walking dress with Watteau paletot illustrated in Bazar No. 50 is a proper model for you.

INDIGNANT.—Possibly you have only yourself to blame. You doubtless requested the editor in case of the rejection of your MS. to "return it to Jennie R. Smith, Smithville, etc." How was he to know you were a Miss and not a Mrs.? Of course he did not prefix either. If you are "touchy" on this point you should always sign yourself when writing to strangers thus, and always inclose stamps!

(MISS) JENNIE R. SMITH,

MRS. G., ALBANY.—The chemise pattern to which you refer is in No. 48 of Harper's Bazar, Supplement No. VI, Figs. 21 and 22. You have made the common mistake of confounding the Number of the paper with that of the Supplement patterns.

MISS M. D. AND SACHET.—We do not purchase goods on commission. On receipt of a stamp we will send the addresses of the parties from whom the articles described in our paper can be procured, so that our correspondents can communicate with them directly.

GRAMMARIAN.—Whose is the genitive of the relative pronoun who, and should be used instead of of whom, which is becoming so common.

O.—"What will Mrs. Grundy say?" is a quotation from the old English comedy "Speed the Plough." The phrase is now commonly put in the mouths of those who are oversensitive in regard to the opinions of others.

ZENIA.—Square linen cuffs are worn inside the dress sleeve. They fit best when attached to an undersleeve. Make your black silk long, the front width and one each side of it gored, the others full, and looped in a panier puff by a sash. Pleated flounce with puffs at the top formed by reversing the pleats. Passementerie braid with tassels on each seam. Heart-shaped surplice corsage, with lace chemisette. A baschlik with fichu similar to the illustration in No. 50 is one of the most fashionable wrappings. You can make it warm enough by lining with flannel. The samples of lace you send will probably wear and wash well. We prefer the coarse Valenciennes for under-clothing.

LUORETIA.—Gray, garnet, and black are the fashionable colors for street dress. Changeable goods are newer than solid colors. The shoes may match the dress in color and material, but black kids are most generally worn.

AN ADMIRING SUBSCRIBER.—For directions about your dress we refer you to the reply to Zenia.

ENGLISH ACTRESS.—You ask: "Do the remains of the celebrated actor, George Frederick Cooke, lie beneath the monument to his memory, erected by Edmund Kean, in St. Paul's church-yard, New York?" Part of them we presume do, but what part it may be difficult to say. In Dr. Francis's "Old New York" we are told of the removal of the remains "from the strangers' vault," where they had been deposited, to be placed beneath the monument raised by Edmund Kean, in St. Paul's church-yard. This was in 1821. Strange liberties must have been taken during this removal, for, if we recollect rightly, the skull of the actor was for some time in the possession of Dr. Francis, and on one occasion, we believe, figured on the boards of the old Park Theatre, to point a moral in the grave-digging scene of some starring Hamlet of the day; and we read further, in a letter of the American actor Maywood to William Hazlitt at London, that another vital portion of the great George Frederick Cooke was sent to London. "I feel assured," says Maywood, writing from New York, April 29, 1821, "that any part of so great a being as George Cooke will be esteemed a curiosity and richly valued. The bearer of this will offer a morsel of the liver of this wondrous man."

FLIP.—A high-crowned hat with turned up rim, and the round Turkish fez, will be the styles for winter.

SEVERAL SUBSCRIBERS.—Make the black gros grain according to the directions given Zenia. The lavender silk may have a tunic trimmed with a pleated ruche of satin or of black velvet. The flounce on the lower skirt is bound with the material of the ruche. Square corsage with puffed chemisette. Sleeves puffed to the elbow and ruffled. Traveling suit of gray serge or changeable poplin.

T. M. A.—Wait until your visit is returned before you make a second call on a stranger. Drab is trimmed with garnet this season—brown, with a darker brown and black.

FLORISSA.—If your wrapping is for evening, make a scarf hermine with Arab fold, trimmed with camel's-hair fringe. If it is for a day garment, make a polonaise, with Watteau folds in the back. Trimming of white Astrakhan or plush.

INQUIRER.—Brocade silks do not require much trimming. Make the long gored skirt plain. A berth of fringe or lace on the high corsage. Coat-sleeves. Make the white dress a baby waist, with puffed sleeves and fichu, trimmed with Valenciennes.

JEAN.—Try benzine on your skirt. Castile soap, used with a brush, may be effective. Trim your poplin with bands of the same, edged with faille; the striped dress with pleated bias ruffles, bound with blue. You will find illustrations of walking dresses in Bazar No. 50.

LOUISE.—You can order sets of hair jewelry from any of the jewelers whose names are used in the New York Fashion article of the Bazar. The prices range from $12 to $20. Hair three inches long will answer. Colored jewelry is not admissible in mourning. Watch-chains of jet are worn in deep mourning. Black velvet beaver cloth, trimmed with folds of faille, or Astrakhan, is the material for mourning cloaks. Alpaca is used for serviceable house dresses, but is too glossy for the street. You can have aprons of white orandy trimmed with folds, but not ruffles. A widow is addressed by her own Christian name, not her husband's.

CABIAN.—Read directions to Zenia.

EAST ABINGTON.—Thibet cloth and bombazine are the only cloak materials that you can trim with crape. If these are lined and wadded they will be quite warm enough for the Southern climate. Velvet beaver is a better material. It is six quarters wide, requiring only two yards for a cloak. The price is $13 a yard. Astrakhan cloth is used for deep mourning. It is also six quarters wide, worth from $10 to $20 a yard. We would not advise you to make skirts without goring them. The front and sides are gored perfectly flat, the backs are full.

LAURA.—Payson's is the best indelible ink. A small quantity of borax is put in the water when boiling. A set of Roman gold will suit your style, and may be worn both morning and evening. You can get good styles of the bright yellow gold for $60. A handsome set of mosaic will cost you $75 or $100.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—You will find directions for making infants' clothing in No. 14 and No. 17 of the Bazar. We will attend to your request.

BURNETT'S FLORIMEL, also BURNETT'S COLOGNE-WATER (three sizes).—There is a freshness in these delightful perfumes found in no others. New York Branch, 592 Broadway (Metropolitan Hotel Building). For sale by druggists and fancy-goods dealers in the principal cities of the United States.

It is estimated that seven-tenths of all adult ailments proceed from a diseased and torpid liver. The biliary secretions of the liver, overflowing into the stomach, poison the entire system, and exhibit symptoms which are unmistakable. After a long research, we are able to present the most remarkable cure for these horrid nightmare of diseases the world has ever produced. Within one year over six hundred and forty thousand persons have taken PLANTATION BITTERS, and not an instance of complaint has come to our knowledge. It is the most effectual tonic and agreeable stimulant, suited to all conditions of life. Inquire of your druggist in regard to it.—Press.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR REMOVED from any part of the body in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER. $1 25 by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, 115 South Seventh St., Philadelphia.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR removing FRECKLES, TAN, PIMPLES, and all other blemishes, use Phalon's "PAPHIAN LOTION." Sold by all druggists. Price $1 25 per bottle.

FOR the Toilet, Bath, and Nursery, use Phalon's "PAPHIAN SOAP." 25 cts. per cake. Sold by druggists and by PHALON & SON, 517 Broadway, N. Y.

THE OPIUM HABIT

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just Published:

THE OPIUM HABIT, WITH SUGGESTIONS AS TO THE REMEDY. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

The writer and compiler of the volume has been himself a victim to the habit which he describes, having eaten more than half a hundredweight of the drug and continued in its uninterrupted use for more than fifteen years. He emancipated himself by a short but painful struggle of six weeks, in which he proceeded from 80 grains a day by diminished doses to its entire abandonment. The story which he tells is interesting without being at all sensational; it is minute enough without being tedious, and its moral lessons of hope and perseverance are none the less impressive from the fact that there is not any attempt to state or enforce them. There is no cant nor preaching in the story, and but very little in the selections which follow it; the author judging wisely enough that the facts preach loudly and forcibly enough, and that to the great majority of opium-eaters their own reflections furnish more preaching than they care to hear or can consent to endorse.—Nation.

FACETIÆ.

A LITTLE girl was asked whether she could explain the meaning of bearing false witness against one's neighbor. "Please, Sir, when no one does nothing to nobody, and some one goes and tells on't."

Kratsalatt's wife discovered her old hen sitting in the back yard, and "bust up her nest." Soon after the poor wife came in much excited, and said, "My dear Kratsalatt, I took the eggs from Brownie, and she has gone and sat on an old meat-axe." "Let her set," said the bilious old fellow; "if she sets on an axe, maybe she'll hatch-ct!"

The papers speak of a man who discovered that he is his own grandfather. That is nothing to what happened to a certain venerable friend of ours, who found out that he was an old woman, and therefore possibly his own grandmother.

There was a ferryman whom some of his classical neighbors had entitled Charon. "Why do they call you Charon, Donald?" inquired a passenger. "Weel, I suppose, because I take care on the boat, Sir."

Some one who was swindled in the Nevada mines insists that the coat of arms of that State ought to be a sham rock and a lyre.

A doctor, recently installed in a new house on one of the new boulevards, Paris, received a visit from an unknown person. "Mr. P—, being a neighbor, I have taken the liberty of calling on you." "Ah! you are—" "Yes, Sir. I have established myself on the floor below, and I have taken the great liberty to beg you to recommend me, when the occasion demands, to your patients." "Willingly; but what is your—" "I have opened a mourning store."

BAD STUDY FOR ARTISTS—Daggers drawn.

A CANDID EPITAPH.—Tombstone inscriptions are generally accused of want of candor. The following lines, which are to be found on a stone in the church-yard of Darent, near Dartford, England, certainly do not err in that direction:

"Oh, the liquor he did love, but never will no more,
For what he loved did turn his foe;
For on the 28th January, 1741, that fatal day,
The Debt he owed he then did pay."

What forts are the best for soldiers?—Com-forts.

AN ACCOMMODATING SERVANT.—A gentleman addressed his servant, "James, I have always placed the greatest confidence in you; now tell me, James, how is it that my butcher's bills are so large, and I always have such bad dinners?" "Really, Sir, I don't know; for I am sure we never have any thing nice in the kitchen that we don't send some of it up in the parlor."

THE FIRST VEGETABLE EVER KNOWN—Time.

A lady in New York called at the shop of a maker of chimney ventilators to see if he had any contrivance which would make her husband stop smoking.

CONVIVIAL TOAST (for a Temperance Fête).—Fill high, Drink L'eau.

A MIEN ADVANTAGE—A superiority in appearance.

"You and your wife should be one," said a friendly adviser to a hen-pecked husband. "Become one!" exclaimed hen-pecked; "why, we are ten now." "How so?" "She's I and I'm O."

"Mr. Smith, the hogs are getting into your corn-field." "Never mind, Billy, I'm sleepy. Corn won't hurt 'em."

DINING-ROOM SCENE.

AUNT (who, as a rule, can't bear tobacco). "You know, Harry, I don't like Smoking in the Dining-Room; but as you enjoy a Pipe, I have had a Chair put for you in the Conservatory."

CONSERVATORY SCENE.

Harry has a Nap after the Second Pipe, and is treated to an expiring Shower of the Old Lady's Enemies.

A DEAD SET.

MAJOR GUMMY. "By Jove, what a Bore! Here come those Girls that are always making up to me, and I've got my confounded Teeth in my Pocket."

NEW FRUIT—A man-date.

A ROOM VERY RARELY RENTED—Room for improvement.

An Edinburgh journal, a little while since, inserted under the "Deaths" the demise of a Mr. W. W. The gentleman being alive, protested, and the week after the following correction appeared: "We regret to find that the announcement of the death of Mr. W. W. is a malicious fabrication."

HOW TO GET RID OF RATS—Kill them.

Why does a sailor know there is a man in the moon?—Because he's been to sea.

"Off she goes," said a lady, speaking of the train as it was starting. "You have mistaken the gender, Madam," said a gentleman; "this is the mail train."

A good story is told of a "country gentleman" who for the first time heard an Episcopal clergyman preach. He had heard much of the aristocracy and pride of the church, and when he returned home he was asked if the people were stuck up. "Pshaw! no," replied he; "why the minister preached in his shirt-sleeves."

A gentleman who has recently lost an eye begs to intimate that he has now a vacancy for a pupil.

Young women should beware of marrying an accountant. If they do so they take an adder to their bosoms.

ZOOLOGICAL.

Which animal is never old?—The gnoo.
Which is costly?—The deer.

Which is a good boatman?—The roe buck.

Which is often elected to office?—The mare.

Which makes a good light?—The tapir.

Which is a horrid nuisance, and tackles you every where?—The boar.

Which beast is most used by cooks?—The spider.

Which dogs is the Pope of Rome fond of?—Bull dogs.

Which dogs always go in pairs?—Spaniels.

Which is the most unheeding dog?—The mastiff.

Which dog would you recommend hair-dye to?—The greyhound.

Which reptile would drivers prefer?—The whip-snake.

Which would boys and girls rather have?—The hoop-snake.

Which is best for watchmen?—The rattle-snake.

Which do Indians have the most use for?—The moccasin snake.

Which is best for school children?—The adder.

"LEVELING DOWN"—Going to bed.

A man very much intoxicated was sent to jail.

"Why did you not bail him out?" inquired a bystander of a friend.

"Bail him out!" exclaimed the other; "why, you couldn't pump him out."

An apothecary, who is continually troubled with the inquiry for the time, was asked the other day, "Please, Sir, tell me what time it is."

"Why, I gave you the time not a minute ago!" said the astonished apothecary. "Yes, Sir," replied the lad, "but this is for another woman!"

When are fish a little crazy?—When they get in-seine.

THE EARLIEST PARTICIPANTS IN THE FALL TRADE—Adam and Eve.

Is it bad grammar to say, "That air gun?"

THE BALL-ROOM ALPHABET.

A—was an Angel of sweet seventeen.

O—was the Olga waltz then in its prime.
P—was the Partner who could not keep time.
Q—the Quadrilles that should have been Lancers.
R—the Remarks that were made on the dancers.
S—was the Supper they went to in pairs.
T—was the Twaddle they talked on the stairs.
U—was the Uncle who said, "Let's be going."
V—was the Voice the fair angel said "No" in.
W—was the Waiter who staid very late.
X—was his Exit, which wasn't quite straight.
Y—was the Yawn which comes after a ball.
Z—was for Zero, nothing at all.

"How do you get that lovely perfume?" asked one lady of another. "It's scent to me," was the reply.

CURIOUS ANOMALY—That bakers should always need bread.

THE END OF ALL LOVE—The letter E.

HIGH SOCIETY—In the Arctic Circle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Vol. I.—No. 52.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1868.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Toilette Box.

MATERIALS: A round pasteboard box four inches in diameter and two inches high, blue silk, blue ribbon three-fourths of an inch wide, pasteboard.

This pretty box makes a useful adjunct to the dressing-table as a receptacle for powder, small toilette articles, etc. A round paper box of the size given above is covered with pleated blue silk in the manner shown by the illustration. The silk covering of the cover is gathered in the centre; the edge of the cover is finished with a ruche of ribbon three-fourths of an inch wide. In the centre of the cover is placed a knot which is made of pasteboard three-fourths of an inch wide covered with blue ribbon; the ends of this knot are ornamented with little blue bows and fastened to the box. Bind the upper edge of the box covering, and finish the under edge with a ruche.

Lady's Fall Suit.

THIS pretty and serviceable fall suit is made of violet serge. Plain high corsage and close sleeves. Over-skirt, trimmed with black silk fringe three inches wide. Cape cut short and straight in front, with long ends knotted behind as shown by Fig. 2. The cape is closed with small passementerie buttons, and bordered with black silk fringe and two rows of black silk piping.

SEED WORK.

A PERSON who has never pursued the habit of observation, as applied to the common and homelier objects around him, can scarcely realize how great a variety is to be found among the garden and field seeds with which we are all familiar. Nor will they fully appreciate the curious shapes and colors of these humble things until they are brought together and displayed in some artistic form.

With this object in view let us collect throughout the season every variety of ripe seeds within reach, nothing being considered too homely or common for a place in the collection. Beans of all kinds, the various melon seeds, coffee, rice, and Indian corn—of which last there are to be found a great variety in size and color, from the deep red and mottled grains to almost white or deep golden yellow. Every seed of size sufficient for handling will be acceptable for our purpose.

Then the garden flower seeds will answer to form a miniature wreath, such as convolvulus, hollyhock, larkspur, pear, apple, the shining black seeds of the tiger lily, and others too numerous to mention.

Having thus collected a large assortment, a frame-work of wood must be provided; if intended to be a picture-frame, the shape and size will of course be regulated by the dimensions of the picture to be placed in it. But many prefer making the wreath itself the centre, and, when finished, have it framed neatly, with a glass to protect it from dust.

If the latter be the style fixed on, a circular frame of thin wood should be prepared and stained slightly with walnut staining materials, or simple black varnish. The upper surface of the wood should not be very smoothly finished, or the glue will not adhere so firmly, but will be constantly liable to scale off. When the frame is ready and the glue hot spread a portion of it over a space of about two inches in diameter, and begin at once to arrange or group your seeds; taking, for instance, one kind of bean for one flower. Form it by sticking them close together around the outside edges of the glued space with the points inward, thus making the circular outline of the flower. Allow the beans to radiate evenly, but lie perfectly flat against the wood, and then form the inner row by sticking the ends of the beans into the glue, letting the outer ones be slightly elevated by resting on the inner points of the first row. A third tier is then placed in like manner inside the last, and so on until the space is entirely filled and finished with a round bean of either the same or a different kind. If the glue stiffens too much before the whole flower is completed more must be added.

An almost endless variety of shapes and styles of flowers will suggest themselves as the work proceeds, and, since accurate resemblance to nature is not attempted nor aimed at, no exact rules need be given or followed, taste and ingenuity being sufficient guides to the artist.

When the whole surface is occupied with the greatest possible variety of designs, there will still remain considerable intervening space in which the rough wooden foundation will be seen. In order to cover this properly thin the glue with a little water, and with a small brush spread it over the wood wherever there is a bare space around and between the flowers, doing about one-quarter of the frame at once, giving it a pretty good coat; then while wet sprinkle over it any small seeds that may be most abundant, so that the wood shall be entirely covered with them; this will form a suitable ground-work, and afford a proper relief to the flowers, especially if these seeds are of a dark color.

Proceed with this part of the work until the whole space is covered, and then apply with a camel's-hair brush an even coat of good copal varnish. If this is not enough to give the whole a fine gloss, it can be re-touched, some seeds absorbing a large quantity of varnish before showing the required gloss.

If it is to be set into a frame as described it can now be fastened on to the board that is to form the back, which should first be covered with white paper, or any other material that may be preferred, studying to produce a good contrast. The space in the centre of the wreath may be occupied in any way desired, and the whole inclosed in a deep frame which will allow room for the raised surface of the wreath. For picture-frames the seeds must be glued in the same manner on to the wooden frame, which must be first prepared with a back, and groove for the glass; and, if desired for a standing frame, a hinged foot should be fastened to the back.

Fig. 1.—LADY'S FALL SUIT.—FRONT.

For large frames use the larger and coarser seeds; but for small and light ones, the more delicate seeds of flowers will be most beautiful and appropriate.

This work may be applied with excellent effect to ornament boxes for the toilette-table, brackets, hanging-baskets, wooden vases, flower-stands, book-racks, and many other articles. In general effect it differs from the cone-work or leather-work on account of the variety of colors to be found among the seeds, which are also much heightened by the application of the varnish.

A fine specimen of this work was exhibited at a late Horticultural Fair in Philadelphia, and received a special premium, besides attracting universal attention and admiration.

THE WELCOME.

ANOTHER bairn cam' hame—

Hame to mither and me!—

It was yestreen in the gloamin',

When scarce was light to see

The wee bit face o' the darlin',

That its greetin' cry was heard.

And our crowded nestie made a place

To hold anither bird!

Sax little bonnie mouths,

Ah me! tak' muckle to fill,

But to grudge the bit t' the seventh

For mither and me were ill!

Oh! nestle up closer, dearie,

Lie saft on the snawy breast,

Where fast life's fountain floweth

When thy twa warm lips are prest.

The rich man counteth his cares

By the shinin' gowd in 's hand,

By 's ships that sail on the sea,

By 's harvests that whiten the land.

The poor man counteth his blessings

By the ring o' voices sweet,

By the hope that glints in bairnies' een,

By the sound o' bairnies' feet.

An' it's welcome hame, my darlin'!

Hame to mither and me!

An' it's never may ye find less o' love

Than the love ye brought wi' ye!

Could are the blasts o' the wild wind,

An' rough the world may be;

But warm's the hame o' the wee one

In the hearts o' mither an' me!

CONVENIENCE OF ETIQUETTE.

THERE are undoubtedly a great many ceremonious practices which would be more honored in the breach than the observance. There is no innate propriety that we can discover in kissing an old man's toe, Pope though he be—no grace inherent in the act of stumbling backward from the presence of Majesty—and not the least advantage in crawling with belly prostrate on the ground into the presence of the great Tycoon of Japan when one has a pair of feet and legs to walk erect upon. We may, in fact, venture so far as to say that it is a dirty thing to kiss any man's toe, an unnatural and graceless movement to walk backward, and both inconvenient and undignified for biped man to forego walking and creep on all fours.

It is well, no doubt, to show our reverence for authority through external forms of respect to those who bear it, but there is no necessity of outraging nature in the act. Regard should be had to the laws of morality and gravity, and no human creature be required to swerve from a decorous rectitude either of mind or body.

Ceremonious observances are unquestionably carried often to an absurd extent. It is Montaigne, we believe, who tells us of a king who punished his courtier with death for having dared, at the risk of his own life, to pull his Majesty out of the fire. He had been guilty of the unpardonable sin of so far forgetting the divinity that doth hedge a king as to touch with sacrilegious hand the royal carcass. The saving of the monarch was in conformity with the duty of the subject, and his Majesty condescended to bestow upon him the royal approval for so much of the act; but the contact of commonalty with royalty which resulted, though inevitable, was deemed an offense, and accordingly punished. Though the courtier's act was both benevolent in intention and fact, it yet involved, accordingly to kingly wisdom, an insolence. This indeed is the reduction of ceremonious observance to the utmost absurdity.

The proper thing unquestionably is to yield to those requirements of etiquette, though they may seem absurd, which do not involve any necessary sacrifice of self-respect. There are many ceremonious observances in foreign countries which have no meaning for the American, but which are full of significance to the European. Some of them are symbols of authority essential to government, or traditional records of event and incident of great historical interest and value. It is becoming in the stranger to treat such with the common respect, and comply, if he can conscientiously, with the public requirements in regard to them. If he can not conform, let him keep away from such positions and places in which reverence for them is exacted.

There will be often found, on investigation, some good reason for the existence of a ceremonious observance which appears at first sight to be entirely frivolous. Among the rules of social etiquette, many of which are undoubtedly trifling, a good number will be found to be based on a sound common-sense. Consider, for example, that rule of the dinner-table, Do not ask twice for soup. This appears at first sight both silly and arbitrary. It is, however, a very sensible ordinance, and is to be justified by the laws of health and the general comfort and convenience. The soup, being a fluid substance, can easily be absorbed in small quantities, and, thus taken, is a good preparative for the solidities of the dinner. If, however, the stomach is deluged with it, the appetite and digestion become weakened, and there is neither the inclination to eat nor the power to digest the more substantial food essential to the due nutrition of the body. As for the convenience or comfort of the single-plate rule, no one can deny it who has ever looked upon an array of hungry guests whose eager appetite for the coming roast is compelled to an impatient delay by some social monster capable of asking for soup twice. The cook in the mean time is, of course, thrown out in his calculations, and the dish, when it does come at last, is either spoiled by overcooking, or cold from being withdrawn so long from the fire. The guests thus are not only tried in temper by a protracted expectation, but balked of their anticipated enjoyment.

The advantage of not putting the knife in the mouth will be obvious, we suppose, to all who are conscious that the one can cut and the other is capable of being cut. There is an excellent chemical reason for that other table rule which forbids the use of a knife of steel with the fish, the ordinary sauces of which combine with that metal, and produce a composition neither wholesome nor appetizing. These proofs might be indefinitely extended. It is, in fact, less easy to show the inconvenience than the convenience of etiquette.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

On Converting the Heathen.

MY DEAR MELANCHTHON,—It is a long time since I have written to you, but you are never long out of my mind. For how can a man walk about this city, in every part, and not feel that here are the appealing Asia, Africa, and Polynesian Islands which demand the missionary? If it had been only generally suspected the attention recently directed to the Water Street Dance Houses would certainly have confirmed it. Indeed the Canadian Indians, to whom the early Jesuits went to preach and who put them to death with every kind of horrible torture, do not seem to have been so truly barbarous, so dehumanized, as many of the dwellers in the dens not five miles away from us to-day. You will never know nor imagine the orgies of Water Street and the wharves. It is not necessary. It is enough that you know how instant and imperative is the claim upon your sympathy and effort.

But I hope you will not make the sad mistake of supposing that the sole missionary ground in the city is in the region to which public attention has lately been so strenuously addressed. Why, my dear Melanchthon, one of the most common sights is that of a heathen giving money for the conversion of the heathen. One of the busiest of persons in the missionary line so to speak, that is, in the promotion of enterprises for sending men and women to preach to the people of Thibet and Crim Tartary, is Peter Pagan. The old gentleman subscribes copiously. His house is a kind of inn for the poor vic—I mean missionaries. His voice, when he commends to the divine favor those who are embarking for the uttermost parts of the earth, is most sonorous and edifying. As the story-books say of certain ogres, that they could not see plump young men and women without a smacking of the chops and watering of the mouth, so do the spiritual chops of Peter Pagan smack and his spiritual mouth water, when he beholds a serious youth or maid. Inwardly he instantly devotes them to the remotest Christian station. He seems to hanker—if I may venture to use a word which Addison did not disdain—to afford them an opportunity of translation by fire or water, to secure to them the most exquisite tortures of martyrdom that they may triumphantly bear witness to their faith. Indeed old Peter Pagan with his perpetual pushing off of callow young missionaries of both sexes reminds me of the sympathetic hangman of old King Louis whom Scott commemorates in Quentin Durward, who was never weary of cheerfully encouraging his victims, as if strangling were the most agreeable ceremony in the world.

Now if I were a missionary I should certainly concede that "a great work," as the phrase is, was to be done at John Allen's, but I should feel myself especially called upon to devote myself to the conversion of that tough old King of the Cannibal Islands, Peter Pagan. I should tell him that he could not be saved by proxy. I should show him that although he might fit out twenty missionaries to Timbuctoo at his own expense, and although each of them might convert four of the natives every year, yet it would not be passed to his private account, which he must settle for himself. And if you ask me what on earth I mean, and whether so eminent a saint as Peter Pagan, who sustains the Feejee mission almost at his own cost, himself needs conversion, I reply that I certainly do mean just that. Let him be converted from his intolerable greed of money, from the passing of false invoices at the Custom-house, from his faith and practice that all's fair in trade—in a word, from his worship of the false god of gold. Indeed old Peter Pagan, who pays his bills regularly, who is always respectable, who has family prayers, very long and very loud—who is a kind of missionary patriarch, and has a great many good qualities, is as fond of "the stamps" as John Allen, and he degrades himself by lying and the false morality of trade to obtain them, just as John Allen does, although in a different manner. The same false god is worshiped in John Allen's dance-house and in Peter Pagan's neat office. The ceremonies are different, but the worship is the same. My dear missionary, if John Allen's house is your Burmah station, Peter Pagan's office is your Siam.

And here is Latour, the irreproachable bachelor of the old Union Club, one of the most delightful diners out in the city; a man always in request, and as apparently antipodal to Allen as the superb palace at the corner of Twenty-first Street and the Avenue is different from the house in Water Street. I saw him the other morning just after his breakfast at the Club, tranquilly picking his teeth and reading the paper. That breakfast would have been a study for Ude. I doubt if Soyer ever conceived any works of gustatory art more perfect in their way than the breakfasts and dinners which Latour orders at the Club. You may depend that he gives his mind to them, and meditates sauces and salads as he walks by the way and as he reflects in the watches of the night. The subject of his thoughts, of his studies, the end of his existence, so to speak, is his dinner. He goes to Paris from time to time, and explores the new discoveries of the cuisine at the cafés as other men go to listen to the lectures in the College de France, or to study art in the Italian galleries. He is an authority upon all subjects of the table; and it is generally understood that he has the free entrée of Delmonico's in consideration of the valuable suggestions which he occasionally offers to that maestro. This is Latour, whom I saw the other morning at the Club reading his paper while he tranquilly picked his teeth.

"Upon my honor, Margaux," said Latour to his companion at table, "it is extraordinary that there should be such heathenism in a Christian land as they have unearthed in Water Street. The newspaper accounts are bad enough, but Friscoe and a party went through that region the other night, and the sight is really unspeakable. It is really a reflection upon our Christianity. It is a shame, a disgrace.—By-the-way, don't forget that we are to try that new sauce with the fillet—is evening at seven sharp.—Really too disgraceful." So saying Latour's eyes slipped gently along to the next column, and he sat quietly for an hour, for nothing, he says, is more criminally, wickedly foolish than any kind of excitement just after eating.

Now who will go and hold prayer-meetings in the Union Club House? Who will labor with Latour? Who will point a moral with his name and his performances? When will you, dear Melanchthon, depart for that missionary ground? and will old Peter Pagan subscribe liberally for the conversion of Latour and his "companions"? Conversion, I hear you say, conversion, and from what? From heathenism, from the worship of false gods. Why do you good men go to China and Sumatra, but to win the sinners there from their false worship? They worship hideous idols, I am told. Do they, indeed! And Latour worships the awful Belly-God! Is that a true worship? Did you ever see a more hideous idol in a Chinese Joss-house than the Belly which Latour worships in the Union Club House? The ceremonies, indeed, are very delicate, and not repulsive, but the worship is none the less sincere. Now I understand that not only is the God of Gold one of the Water Street idols, but the Belly-God also. I insist, therefore, my dear Melanchthon, that if Christian zeal requires you to denounce the idols and false gods in the Dance House, you must not spare the Club House. I assure you, my excellent spiritual soldier, that we are encompassed round about with the heathen host, and how can you justify yourself in leaving the very heat and stress of the battle to undertake the light skirmishing upon the edges?

You think, I am told, of going to China. Now I learn from Mr. Ambassador Burlingame, and other learned and experienced men, that the Chinese are mainly a frugal and temperate people; and that whatever the degradation of some of the inhabitants of China may be, it is not comparable to that of the inhabitants of John Allen's Dance House. Let us, then, suppose that the whole force of the Alphabetical Missionary Association were brought to bear for the next ten years upon the heathen lands and people upon Manhattan Island, don't you believe that the general average of human welfare would be raised? I confess that Ignatius Loyola does not seem to me a true Christian missionary than John Howard, nor Henry Martyn than Mrs. Fry, or Mrs. Dix, or Florence Nightingale. You shall not, indeed, surpass me in honoring the fervor and devotion of the Jesuit missionaries in Canada, of whom I have spoken, nor the unselfish heroism of Loyola and Martyn. But the very circumstances of their missions sustained them. They were conspicuous, renowned, and they lived and died in the gaze of an admiring world. If they braved the perils of Persia and of Tartary, they had the supporting sense of the sympathy and thought of Christendom. But after the present newspaper excitement passes away, I suppose there would be very little renown in braving the fury of the savage wharves, or in penetrating the benighted Paganism of the Dance House, or the sumptuous idolatry of the Club House.

How much did you tell me the Great Alphabetical Missionary Society pays for the support of the Howard Mission? I have forgotten, but I hope it is a very large sum, for I doubt if any missionary station in the world is more effective than that. There is a very fine Gothic missionary station at the other corner of the street from Latour's Club House on the Avenue. I suppose it spiritually bombards its neighbor, as it were. I suppose the preacher shows that a house in which the Belly-God is adored is a baser sort of Joss-house. I suppose, when Latour attends the missionary services there, he hears that if the poor, ignorant, outcast sailor who worships the great Belly-God in one way at the Dance House is a sinner, the refined and intelligent Latour, worshipping the same God in another way at the Club House, is not a saint.

I am sure, my dear Missionary, that if you wish to convert the heathen, you need not go to China, and I am your well-wisher,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

DRESS BODICES.

THE shape of closed corsages is not materially altered from the styles given in the spring. French models are round waists of medium length with narrow belts. Points will be introduced later in the season for full dress. Shoulder seams are short and high, defining the outline of the shoulder—a fashion that makes the figure look square. To prevent this the corsage is cut very full at the bust by means of short darts placed near together. Some French dresses have three darts on each side to give the required fullness. The back is broad at the shoulders, has well-curved side-bodies, and is tapered down to measure only one-third of the length of the belt. The bodice is higher at the throat than the styles worn in warm weather. All imported dresses retain the half-inch standing band. If cut low at all it must be only in front, as dresses sloping at the sides and back are generally unbecoming. Buttons and button-holes are indispensable. Half a dozen hooks and eyes sewed on the belt and above it relieve the button-holes from the strain at the waist. A narrow facing of the dress material is sewed beside the buttons to prevent the white under-clothes showing through the button-holes.

The trimming begins at the belt, extending up the front near the buttons, forms a square in the back, and is brought down again to the belt. Pompadour squares and round berthas are designed on plain waists. Several rows of piping, with fringe on the last row, form a round collar.

OPEN WAISTS.

Open waists with chemisettes are very much worn. The Maria Theresa waist, square with an inside fichu of folds is suitable for handsome materials. It should always be accompanied with the open sleeve, tight to the elbow, and ruffled. The rolling collar, or revers, is a revival of an old fashion familiar to all. We commend this to ladies with narrow chests, as it gives the appearance of greater breadth. It is fashionable for demi-toilette, both for the house and street, with a chemisette of muslin or cambric. When used for more dressy attire a lace chemisette is necessary. The heart-shaped waist opens very low, and will not admit of lace alone. Young ladies with plump figures wear two narrow puffs of muslin edged with lace, or of net, extending up the front of the corsage and around the neck. The surplice or shawl waist has deep pleats on each shoulder falling in folds to the belt and crossed like a fichu. This is becoming to slender figures. The back is slightly full into a belt, or sloped over the hips, and held in place by a draw-string. French modistes make all waists and skirts separate; a bad plan for any but slight persons, as it requires several thicknesses at the belt, making the waist large and clumsy.

LOW CORSAGES.

Evening corsages are very low and square and filled out to the proper height with tulle folds à la-Grecque, and lace. When made entirely of the dress material they are not cut so indecorously low as were many dresses last season. Lace is to be the favorite garniture. Wedding toilettes this winter will be conspicuous for their elegant simplicity.

SLEEVES.

Coat-sleeves still prevail for street dresses, but with additional trimming. They are small at the wrist and trimmed to simulate a wide pointed cuff. A bias puff at the top gives the appearance of broad shoulders. A new idea is to add three or four inches to the length of the front half of the coat-sleeve and hold it slightly full from the elbow to the arm-hole. A broad pleated puff at the elbow is gaining favor. A pointed cap put on in box-pleats is a good style. There is greater variety in sleeves for house dress. The styles called Cavalier and Marie Antoinette are similar to the Maria Theresa sleeve. A French sleeve is half long, straight, and nearly tight. It is cut off square at the elbow, and the lower part of the arm is covered by a puffed under-sleeve.

TRAINED SKIRTS.

Trains are more moderate and graceful than the extreme styles worn of late. With the exception of the panier puff the general effect of the skirt is similar to those of last season, though made with fewer gores. To particularize, a trained skirt should measure from five yards to five and a half in width to prevent hooping. It should be flatly gored in front and at the sides, but very full and bouffant behind. The front width is gored closely. Stout figures require two gored side widths, slender persons only one. New skirts are not made with three side gores unless the material is so narrow as to compel it. A word of advice here; never piece gored breadths at the bottom. Design the shape and number of gores with reference to the width of the material. Two full widths are placed behind, and some French dresses have three full back widths. The front and the first gored widths are sewed to the belt without fullness. The back widths are gathered or arranged in small pleats all turned one way. A thick silk cord is used around the skirt instead of binding braid.

PANIERERS AND TUNICS.

The panier puff is generally adopted on long dresses. It is very becoming to tall, slender forms, but requires to be worn with moderation by the short and stout. To form a panier puff a quarter or half a yard extra length is added to the top of the full back widths and gathered in to the side seams. The fullness extends a quarter or three-eighths of a yard below the belt. A drawing-string or a row of trimming is then extended across the back widths, drawing them in to fit closely over the crinoline. The full material then falls over the drawing-string and forms a puff. The sash is fastened at the side seams under the belt, and tied in a large bow below the centre of the panier.

A closely-gored skirt may be modernized by the addition of a double panier puff. This consists of two lengthwise puffs attached to a belt. A band two inches wide and half a yard long extends down the back. Into this is gathered on each side a width of the material of the dress three-fourths of a yard long. The front is rounded at the lower corners and held slightly full beneath the trimming, which consists of folds and fringe or a ruffle. Bows or buttons on the band in the back. The puffs should be lined with thin crinoline or stiff muslin. This panier may be made of black silk, with a small square apron and bretelles, and worn over colored dresses that have become defaced.

Tunics are worn reversed, fastening behind like an apron. They are long in front, rounding to the belt in the back, disclosing a panier puff on the trained skirt. A good plan, designed for a lady too stout to wear a double skirt, is to simulate a tunic on the front and adjacent side widths, adding a crescent-shaped extra width at the second side seam, on which the trimming is extended up to the belt. On a heavy black silk the tunic is simulated with a pleated flounce of satin. This is an economical arrangement, and has all the effect of a full tunic.

Belts with fan-shaped bows are more worn than sashes. If a sash is preferred it must be double of the material of the dress, tied in a large bow with short fringed ends.

SHORT DRESSES.

Short dresses are adopted for breakfast, for the promenade, for church, for dancing, and on all occasions but those of great ceremony, such as bridal calls and wedding receptions.

Street suits are made with two skirts, or a polonaise with added fullness behind that produces the appearance of a double skirt. The lower skirt barely escapes the floor, is quite narrow, hanging almost straight from the waist, and seems to cling to the figure. It is worn over very small crinoline, without steels in front, like the "winged" skirts before-mentioned. The upper skirt has an apron front, with panier puffs behind made in the manner already described. If the upper skirt is looped at the sides and back instead of puffed do not be afraid of looping it too high. It is only necessary that the edges do not "hoop." Over this is a short loose basque confined by a belt. A round cape, caught up in the back and shoulders, completes the suit. The baschlik mantle is in great favor. This and other styles of wrapping have been made familiar to our readers by frequent descriptions of French suits. Mantles and basquines are lined with flannel or wadded to make them comfortable in cold weather. Flannel is preferred as it is most pliable. Cloth suits are sufficiently heavy for the coldest weather. Six yards and a half of double width cloth makes a suit. The trimming is bands of faille edged with satin. Thirteen yards of Empress cloth of stripes of two sizes, are sold for suits. A diagram shows the style in which it is to be made up. There is no trimming necessary. The price is $15. Modistes require from fifteen to twenty yards of material for a flounced suit.

TRIMMINGS.

Gathered flounces are obsolete. All kinds of trimmings are pleated. The last novelty is a ruche of diagonal pleats. The lower skirt of suits is trimmed with one flounce, two or three eighths wide, in pleats all turned one way and secured at both edges. A lining of stiff muslin makes the flounce set better. The pleats at the top are sometimes reversed to form a marquise ruche. The upper skirt has a pleated ruche and fringe. Illustrations of pleated trimmings were given in Harper's Bazar, No. 51. We commend the melon trimming in the same Number, a chain of small puffs.

A cheaper trimming is of serge braid, all wool and coarsely woven. The twelve-yard pieces cost from $1 75 to $2 50, according to the width. Another simple garniture is three rows of rich wide velvet ribbon on which are set buttons the color of the dress at intervals of an inch. Black ruffles are bound with plaid. Gay plaids are scalloped and bound with black silk sewed on with a cord of scarlet merino.

Gros grains and satins are trimmed with lace and fringe. Rich passementerie ornaments, tassels, and bows are placed between groups of pleats on flounces.

MORNING DRESSES.

Morning dresses are worn loose and flowing from a round yoke like a collar. They are lined throughout with white mohair or alpaca, and are slightly wadded in front. The Watteau wrapper has a broad fold in the front and back. Trimming extends down the centre of the fold. Serge braid is a serviceable trimming for cashmere. Another wrapper is short at the sides to disclose a striped petticoat. Lavender and cherry is a pretty contrast for robes de chambre. Pale blue cashmere is trimmed with white serge braid.

INFANTS' CLOTHING.

An infant's outfit just completed at a popular furnishing house has a dozen of each of the most essential garments. The dresses are of French nansook, trimmed with tucks, puffs, and ruffles, and a little lace. Neatly "done up" and folded in boxes a wagon was required to carry them home. The price was $375. The christening robe at $75, all Valenciennes and linen cambric, was not included in the bill. Dresses both for day and night were made high at the neck with long sleeves. The bodies have round yokes of lengthwise tucks and puffs edged with ruffles, and are shirred into a belt all around, or only in front with long sashes tied behind. A yard and a quarter is the full length, including waist and skirt.

The outer petticoat, slightly shorter than the dress, consists of two widths of cambric with a wide band of double linen about the waist. The flannel skirt, graduated still shorter, is scalloped and embroidered, or plainly hemmed and tucked with feather stitching above each tuck. The barrow coat, or protector for the feet, is a straight width of flannel three-fourths of a yard long attached to a wide linen band. The tiny shirts are of sheer linen lawn, or Kenting, with revers at the neck trimmed with appliqué embroidery and ruffles of fine cambric or Valenciennes. Gauze merino undershirts are superior to those knit of Berlin wool, as they do not shrink in washing.

Quilted muslin bibs are preferred to all others. They are softer than piqué and thick enough to absorb moisture before it reaches the clothing. Dots or sprays of embroidery are in each quilted diamond, with "Baby" wrought in front. Half handkerchiefs of muslin and lace, or round collars fastened behind, are worn over cloaks.

The shawl or blanket is a square of white merino embroidered, or simply scalloped, or bound with ribbon. It is sometimes shirred in the centre to form a hood for covering the head when carrying the infant to another room.

Cloaks are two large capes and hood of merino, lined with silk and interlined with flannel. When the child puts on short dresses the upper cape serves for a short cloak. Boy babies wear turbans of white cashmere embroidered on the crown. A ruche of narrow satin ribbon is over the forehead, and rosettes on the ears. Little cape bonnets of white satin or cashmere are made for girls. The head-piece is quilted. A rosette trims the forehead. The cape is pointed behind and edged with fringe. A light blue velvet bonnet is trimmed with Valenciennes lace. Shoes are of knitted zephyr, and of linen quilted in diamonds, and tied with cords and tassels.

Infants' baskets, covered with corded muslin, worked with scarlet wool, are sold for $7 50. A neat model, lined with Swiss muslin, costs $15. The basket is first lined with thin wadding, then with white cambric; over this is blue Marseline silk, covered with Swiss muslin laid in inch tucks. The outside ruffle, three-sixteenths of a yard wide, has but scanty fullness, and is bordered with hair-line tucks and thick Valenciennes edge. Triangular pockets at each side, trimmed with quilted ribbon and rosettes. Pin-cushion in the centre. Ribbon quilting around the mouth of the basket, with rosettes at the corners.

SHORT CLOTHES.

When long dresses are discarded, little muslin slips are substituted, made of two widths of the goods gathered into a tucked yoke, and confined at the waist by a sash instead of an inserted belt. Low-necked dresses are sloped in the side seams, to give the appearance of gores. They fit loosely about the waist, hanging from a band at the shoulders. The chemise, of linen or percale, is sack-shaped, with neck-band and sleeves in one piece with the body. The yoke is without opening in front.

Merino dresses of delicate colors have sloped skirts and low waists, with small sacques embroidered or braided to match the skirt. A wrapping for a child of eighteen months is a gored walking dress with cape, made of pearl-colored merino, trimmed with narrow satin folds. Large pearl buttons. Sacque over-coats of blue plush or white pheasants' cloth are simply made with a hood intended for use.

Boys wear closely-gored skirts and jackets of velveteen or cloth until they are four or five years old. The Highland suit is in great favor this season. It is not necessarily of plaid. One for a boy of three years is of light gray cloth. The skirt reaches to the knee, is folded plain in front in a large box-pleat, and laid in successive pleats around the figure like a Scottish kilt. Velvet ribbon is sewed down the centre of the pleats to hold them in place. The close tight jacket is lapped diagonally on the breast. Turned down collar. Plaid stockings are very much in vogue for children. Velveteen is no longer worn by ladies, and is now a low-priced material. Dark brown, gray, and black velveteens make handsome suits for boys—simply scalloped and bound.

PERSONAL.

M. DU CHAILLU, the celebrated explorer of Gorilla-land, is about to set out on an extended lecturing tour through the West, in which he will doubtless win golden opinions, especially from the ladies, with whom he is a prime favorite, and many greenbacks. M. DU CHAILLU is a thorough master of the lecturing art, and never sees a yawn on the faces of his audience.

A few days since, at the State Teachers' Convention held in this city, it was remarked by Mr. LUCIUS HART that he once had a poor little boy in his Sunday-school whom he had missed for several years past, but met him recently at Washington, and was fervently greeted by him as his "dear teacher." His name was SCHUYLER COLFAX.

A party of the name of HULL—DAVID HULL—residing in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, is the proprietor of a cat who has seven claws upon one foot, and who may therefore be considered quite "up to the scratch," as cats go.

M. DE CHAMPS, one of the Secretaries and Interpreters of the Chinese Embassy, will soon return to Boston to marry the widow of the only son of HARVEY D. PARKER, proprietor of the Parker House. M. DE CHAMPS doesn't seem to have lost any time in coming to an understanding about it.

SILAS G. BURDICK, of New London, Connecticut, is a quaint style of a man. For forty-eight years he has been the "E. Merriam" of that town; has kept a meteorological record, making observations morning, noon, and night. But the odd part of it is, he has kept this record, and also his business accounts, in common pass-books, of which he has used over 35,000, according to the New London Star (two a day!) and which are stowed away in a dozen barrels. He can tell you of any notable thing that has happened in the bailiwick during the last half century.

A journalist with a fondness for figures has ferreted out the prices charged by the prominent lecture-people the coming season. OLIVE LOGAN's quotation is the highest, her price being from $125 to $250. This is pretty good for an hour's talk on "Stage Struck." Professor E. H. HITCHCOCK is more modest, asking from $25 to $50. Mr. TILTON, of the Independent, wants from $125 to $150; Colonel T. W. HIGGINSON asks from $50 to $75; E. P. WHIPPLE, from $75 to $100; HENRY NICHOLS, the same; Rev. G. H. HEPPWORTH, ditto; Professor E. L. YOUMANS, ditto; T. W. KNOX, $50 to $75; C. OSCANYAN, $75 to $150; Brevet Brigadier-General FRANCIS J. LIPPITT, $30; J. F. MANNING, $60 to $100; J. O. MILLER, $50; Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, $100; and WILLIAM B. CULLIS, $50.

The daughter of Count BISMARCK is to be led to the "hymeneal" by a young Polish diplomat in the Russian service, who is impecunious but clever. It was supposed that the indigent condition of the "popper" might prevent the match, but the old Minister gave his cheerful consent the moment the young man mentioned it.

NICHOLAS, the late Emperor of Russia, did his courting in a novel and expeditious manner. During a visit to the King of Prussia, while at dinner, the Emperor rolled up a ring in a piece of bread, and handing it to the Princess Royal, said to her, in a subdued voice: "If you will accept my hand, put this ring on your finger." She didn't lose any time. She put it on.

The fashionable world of New York as well as Paris is in a pleasant flutter about the approaching wedding of Miss FANNY FORBES (daughter of PAUL S. FORBES, Esq., and niece of Rev. Dr. FORBES), and one of the old BARROT family. The fiancé of Miss FORBES is a brother-in-law of Count JOACHIM MURAT, a great-nephew of CAROLINE BONAPARTE's husband.

EMERSON, who seldom goes away from his home in Concord, frequently strolls about the country, and enjoys chatty talks with the farmers of the town, from whose homely conversation he derives recreation and delight. Sunday evenings are set aside for informal receptions, and to these all the towns-people of the intellectual set—and there are very many of them—or all casual visitors, are welcome. There is probably no town of equal size in America which includes among its inhabitants so many bookish people and authors. HAWTHORNE and THOREAU lived there in their day, and besides EMERSON, BRONSON ALCOTT, Miss LOUISA ALCOTT, Mrs. AUSTEN, Miss HUDSON, and other writers known to the public through the magazines, are citizens of the sleepy little hamlet which saw the first battle of the Revolution.

SIR PERCY SHELLEY, son of the poet, is one of the best practical yachtsmen of England, living on board during the summer, and sailing mostly about the Mediterranean. The people where he lives take him on his merits, and never associate him in their thoughts with his father. He goes to church once on Sunday, but doesn't stand high for vital piety. In his pew is a prim little stove. He is married but childless. Fond of children, he has twice adopted a child. One has lately married, and a second—a beautiful girl—is living with him. He and his wife are extremely fond of amateur theatricals, and are accustomed to invite all the chief trades-people of the place to Boscombe House (Sir Percy's residence) for a night to entertain them royally, and to give them the opportunity of seeing the baronet and her ladyship perform. Lady SHELLEY takes deep interest in the memory of her husband's father; and the "Memorials" published in the name of her husband were really put together by her. She has the best qualities of an English lady. She was a widow—Mrs. ST. JOHN—when she married Sir PERCY.

Queen VICTORIA's model farm, situated about a mile from Windsor, is probably the most perfect, as it is the most expensive, thing of the kind in the world. It is thus described by a gentleman writing from London to the Philadelphia Bulletin: "We entered a beautiful cottage, and were shown by one of the Queen's favorite servants into a room about thirty feet square, the roof supported by six octagonal columns of white marble, with richly-carved capitals. The floors were of white porcelain tiles, the windows stained glass, bordered with May-blossoms, daisies, butter-cups, and primroses. The floors were lined with tiles of porcelain of a delicate blue tint, with rich medallions inserted of the Queen, Prince Consort, and each of the children. Shields, monograms of the Royal family, and bass-reliefs of agricultural designs, representing the Seasons, completed the ornamentation of this exquisite model dairy. All around the walls ran a marble table, and through the centre two long ones, supported by marble posts, resting on basins, through which runs a perpetual stream of spring-water. By this means the table slabs are always cold, and the temperature of the dairy is chill, while the white and gilt china milk and butter dishes resting on the tables are never placed in water. We drank the delicious milk, just brought in bright metal buckets, lined with porcelain, the Queen's monogram and crest glittering on the brass plates on the covers. In the room where the butter was made, milk skimmed and strained, we feasted our eyes on the rows of metal porcelain-lined cans of every size, made to lock, and sent to the Royal family even as far as Scotland; so they always have good milk and butter. The churn was of metal also, and lined with porcelain, made in two compartments. The outside chamber surrounding the cylinder could have warm or cold water poured in to regulate the "coming of the butter" without disturbing the cream. The lid was screwed on, and the stationary stand on which the whole was turned made the work easy and rapid. But while over sixty cows are daily milked, and as many more are out grazing, the Royal family are more than satisfied, and the Londoners more than dissatisfied to see rolls of golden butter and cans of cream sold from the model farm for saving money for the Queen! I know the butter is sold, for we breakfasted on it this morning, and we paid for it, not as a bribe, but a regular market bargain at the dairy."

People's handwriting is made the subject of an article in a recent number of the Autographe. BISMARCK's handwriting is very similar to that of his old opponent BEUST; and, what is still more singular, there is strong resemblance between the handwriting of the Russian autocrat and GIUSEPPE GARIBOLDI. NAPOLEON III. writes a hand very similar to that of his mother HORTENSE. The Emperor FRANCIS JOSEPH writes a small and rather beautiful hand. Queen ISABELLA's penmanship is very poor; she writes a large hand, awkward and ugly. EUGENIE writes better; her handwriting is of medium size, regular, and somewhat angular. The KING OF PRUSSIA writes the strong, legible hand of an old merchant. His Queen's handwriting is long, thin, and airy. The EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA evidently does not write much; her hand is that of a school-girl. Old GORTSCHAKOFF writes a plain, legible hand, but the MARQUIS DE MOUTIER's penmanship might be greatly improved. DROUYN DE L'HUYS and ROUHER write a large and rather elegant hand; their colleague PINARD scrawls his signature in a perfectly illegible manner.

Miss CLEVELAND, a niece of Mr. GREELEY, clever with pen and brilliant in voice, will return from abroad soon, and probably form one of the attractions at concerts during the coming season.

New Orleans now claims for one of its residents a man who has had more "hair-breadth 'scapes by flood and field" than any other in the United States. His name is EDWARD CARRUTHERS. Being engaged in a personal difficulty with a man named SIMPSON, at Madison, in the fall of 1846, he killed his antagonist and fled to the American army, then entering Mexico. At the battle of Chapultepec he was taken prisoner, and lay for months in a Mexican dungeon. Being released at last he married a Spanish girl, and settled on the Rio Grande. Here being attacked by the Indians, himself and family were carried into captivity, where he again spent two years. Effecting his escape he joined a ranger company, and was shot in a fight with the Comanches, scalped, and left for dead. He, however, recovered and joined the Walker Expedition to Nicaragua, where he was wounded, captured, and again imprisoned. Being again released he sailed for the United States. The vessel he was in was wrecked, and he barely escaped with his life. He was one of the passengers on the ill-fated Evening Star, and again escaped death where so many perished. He is now a resident of New Orleans, and delights in relating his remarkable adventures.

Embroidered Table-Cover.

THE ground of this cover is red cashmere. The centre is composed of a circular piece of dark brown cloth nine inches in diameter, bordered with a braid; outside of this is arranged an arabesque circle of the same material. The outer edges are worked in application in Turkish style. Fig. 2 gives a full-sized section of the arabesque work. First draw the design on paper and paste this to the back of the stuff, leaving the drawing outside, after which cut out the arabesque with sharp scissors. This done, work the edges in button-hole stitch with dark brown silk twist, and wind the working with lighter silk in the manner shown by Fig. 2; the veins inside the arabesque are worked in half-polka stitch, also with light brown silk.

When finished the arabesque circle is sewed fast to the outer edge in the manner shown by the illustration. Fig. 3 gives a full-sized section of the outer border; this is worked partly in application of cloth of different colors, and partly in point russe, with coarse and fine silk twist in different brilliant colors. The design for the corners of the cover is also in Turkish style, and is given under Fig. 111 of the Supplement. Having completed the embroidery, line the cover with red cashmere or Turkey red, and finish the edge with red worsted fringe.

Two Embroidered Medallions with Initials.

THESE medallions are designed for the embroidering of pocket-handkerchiefs. They are worked partly in application and partly in satin stitch. The open-work part of Fig. 2 is worked in ladder stitch.

They are worked partly in application and partly in satin stitch. The open-work part of Fig. 2 is worked in ladder stitch.

Tatting Rosette.

For this pretty rosette work with fine thread and only one shuttle the middle ring of 1 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), seven times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 1 ds. Having joined the ring, fasten the thread and cut it off. For the second round of the rosette fasten the thread to a picot of the middle ring, work at the distance of a sixth of an inch space a ring composed of 8 ds., 1 p., 8 ds., fasten the working thread after a sixth of an inch space to the next picot of the middle ring, and repeat from * seven times. Then tie the beginning and end of the thread together and cut it off. Work the outer part of the rosette with two threads as follows: tie the foundation and working thread together and work next * only with the working thread one of the three-leaved figures seen on the pattern, in doing which work, first, a leaf composed of 3 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., 1 p., 3 ds., and close on this a similar leaf, which is fastened to the last picot of the former leaf instead of working the first picot, and close on this a third leaf like the second. Now turn the work, so that the three-leaved figure points downward, and work over the foundation thread a scallop which consists of three times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 2 ds., fasten to the picot of a ring of the second round, 2 ds. three times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., turn the work and repeat seven times from *, but, instead of working the middle picot of the first leaf of every three-leaved figure, fasten to the middle picot of the last leaf of the former three-leaved figure. The scallops are fastened each to a picot of a ring of the second round of the rosette. In working the last three-leaved figure fasten to the middle picot of the first leaf of the first three-leaved figure instead of working the middle picot of the last leaf.

Fig. 2.—BORDER IN POINT RUSSE.

Three Borders in Application and Embroidery.

THESE borders are for trimming covers, baskets, etc. Fig. 2 is also designed for dresses, etc. The ground of the border, Fig. 1, is of red cloth; the light part is of white cloth in application, the scalloped lines are made of red braid, which is sewed over with black silk; the loops are of blue braid, to which is added a gold cord. The remaining embroidery is worked with different colored silk, partly in satin stitch and partly in point russe.

The simple border, Fig. 2, is worked in point russe with two colors of silk in the manner shown by the pattern.

NEEDLE-WORK AND TATTING ROSETTE.

Fig. 1.—MEDALLION IN APPLICATION.

Fig. 2.—MEDALLION IN APPLICATION.

The middle of the border given by Fig. 3 is composed of a narrow black velvet ribbon; this is button-hole stitched down on both sides with green silk; the button-hole stitching is also wound with white silk. On each side of this work a row of large loose chain stitches in black silk, followed by other rows of button-hole stitch, and finally rows in half-polka stitch.

Two Medallions in Application and Embroidery.

THESE medallions are used for trimming colored cravats, toilette cushions, little baskets, etc. The centre of each is formed by a circular piece in application; the embroidery is worked in colored silks in point russe, button-hole, and knotted stitch.

Cravat Bows.

See illustrations on page 821.

THE cravat bow, Fig. 1, is made of loops of blue satin lying one over the other on a foundation which is cut in the shape given by the illustration. For each loop take a piece of satin an inch and a quarter long and three-quarters of an inch wide, and turn the edges of the stuff under. Fix a pin on the under side of the cravat. (See Cravat Bow, No. 29, p. 456 of Harper's Bazar.)

Fig. 2.—Cravat bow of black satin ribbon. The ribbon used for the upper rosette and the ends is three-fourths of an inch wide; that for the smaller rosettes is narrower. Each rosette consists of single leaves which are arranged on a circular piece of black foundation. For each leaf cut of ribbon a piece from Fig. 110 of the Supplement, fold it down along the dotted line, and turn down the under corners, bringing \times on \times , so that a leaf shall be formed in the manner shown by the illustration; the edges of the ribbon come on the under side. The centre of each rosette is finished with a round jet button.

Fig. 2.—MEDALLION WITH INITIAL. WHITE EMBROIDERY.

The cravat bow, Fig. 3, consists of leaves of green satin ribbon half an inch wide arranged in the same manner as those previously described, in the form of a rosette finished by a bavette an inch wide above and three and a half inches wide below.

The pieces for the leaflets of the cravat bow, Fig. 4, are an inch and a half long, and are arranged on a stiff foundation in the manner shown by the illustration.

Two Chemisettes for Maria Theresa Dresses.

See illustrations on page 821.

THE chemisette, Fig. 1, the fronts of which are crossed, is made of muslin, and is trimmed on the edge with lace an inch wide. The fronts are arranged in pleats two-thirds of an inch wide, bias of the material; the back is cut from Fig. 95 of the Supplement. Face the back on the neck with a bias strip of the material two-thirds of an inch wide, sew together the back and fronts, cording the shoulder seams; bind the bottom, and hem the remainder narrow, after which sew on the lace. The chemisette, Fig. 2, is of fine nansook, scalloped around the neck in the manner shown by the illustration, and edged with lace and embroidered. The right front is finished with a straight piece of the material three-fourths of an inch wide, which is trimmed with lace and embroidery. The chemisette is fastened with small linen buttons. It is cut from the same pattern as Fig. 1, except that the fronts are straight from the edges where they lap over.

Trimmings for Blouses, etc.

See illustrations on page 821.

BOTH these trimmings are formed of rolls which are made of strips of satin three-fourths of an inch wide. If designed for trimming a thin black blouse, use black satin; if for white blouses, colored satin. Cut strips of the requisite length and breadth, make rolls of this of the size shown by the illustration, and sew them to a bias strip, having first arranged them according to one or the other of the styles given by the illustration.

have received repeated inquiries with regard to the manner of working Tunisian crochet stitch, we herewith give instructions: It is done with a hook having a knot at the end, and somewhat larger than those usually employed, in proportion to the material to be worked. Begin by making an ordinary chain of the required length. Keep on the last loop, which will make the first of the next row. Insert the hook in the next, and bring the thread through with a loop on the needle. Work every chain so to the end, when all your loops will be on the needle. 2d round.—Put the thread round the hook and bring it through once. After this put the thread around and bring it through two every time till one stitch only is left, which will form the Infant's White Dimity Slip.

See illustration on double page.

This slip is fastened behind with small linen buttons. The waist is trimmed with bretelles of the same material as the slip, edged with gathered needle-work edging. The skirt of the dress is thirty inches long and a hundred and twelve inches wide, with a wide hem around the bottom; in cutting allow three inches in length for the hem. For making the waist cut from Fig. 90 of the Supplement the front, allowing in the middle an inch and a half for the box-pleats; from Fig. 91 cut the backs, allowing for the hems; and from Figs. 92 and 93 the bretelles and sleeves.

first of the following row. 3d round.—Insert your hook in each upright loop of thread, and bring the thread through in a loop. Work so to the end of the row, when once more you will have all the stitches on the needle. To decrease at the beginning of a row in this stitch draw the thread through two instead of one the first time. In any other part of the work draw it through an extra stitch, as three instead of two. The Tunisian cross crochet stitch is very similar to the ordinary Tunisian crochet stitch, but in the first round of each pattern row, of two stitches lying together, take up, first, the second stitch and afterward the first, by which means the stitches are crossed. The bib is edged with a narrow scalloped crochet lace, and is fastened with ribbons. Begin on the under edge with the requisite number of stitches in the foundation, and crochet in the manner above described according to the pattern, Fig. 33, which gives half the bib. Widen by crocheting the requisite number of chain stitches at the end of the second round of a pattern row, and taking up out of these the loops for the first round of a pattern row, but at the end of the first round of a pattern row take the loops out of the horizontal stitches of the former pattern row. Having completed the body of the apron, crochet the scalloped edge as follows: * seven double crochet in an edge stitch of the bib, passing over one edge stitch, one single crochet in the next edge stitch. Repeat from *. Sew on the ribbons as shown by the illustration.

Infant's Flannel Petticoat.

See illustration on double page.

This flannel petticoat is made of one piece, twenty-six inches long and fifty-four inches wide. It is not sewed together behind, but the waist is fastened with strings. The waist is formed by closely pleating the upper part. Take a piece of flannel of the length and breadth given above, and arrange the upper part of this in box-pleats six inches long and an inch wide; these pleats lie close together, and are stitched down along the edge to a lining of white muslin. The waist is twenty-two inches around. Having finished pleating, cut out the sides two inches deep for the arm-holes, and bind the skirt all around with narrow white ribbon. Finish by sewing on the shoulder straps, which consist of flannel strips an inch wide and five inches long, which are bound with the ribbon. The front of the arm-hole must be somewhat sloped. Lastly, sew on the strings for tying.

MARIA THERESA DRESS.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V, Figs. 19-22.

Infant's Flannel Protector.

See illustration on double page.

This protector is arranged in the form of drawers. The original consists of a three-cornered piece of fine flannel, the straight sides of which are each twenty-five inches long. Bind the straight sides with soft white cotton tape, pleat the bias side till the width is reduced to twenty-three inches, and bind with a strip of flannel two inches wide. The binding is fastened by means of two buttons and button-holes. Make a shirr in the middle part of the binding, by which the protector may be more firmly tied around the waist. Next sew on two pieces of linen-tape three inches from the ends of the binding, and on the under corner a loop of the same tape. Fasten the protector by running the strings through the loop and then tying. Two illustrations show the protector opened and fastened.

Infant's Jacket with Inserted Bib.

See illustration on double page.

The pleated and embroidered front, imitating a bib, renders this jacket very elegant. The bib and sleeves are edged with needle-work insertion and edging. Cut the front from Fig. 36 of the Supplement, and from Fig. 37 both backs, of fine muslin. In cutting, allow for hems on the backs and bottom. Cut out a piece in the front along the double line, gather the under part and stitch on the bib part, and at the same time the edging which borders it. Cut away the material under the bib and fasten the edges down. Next join the front and backs according to the figures on the pattern, and hem the edges with the exception of the neck, which is finished with needle-work edging and faced on the wrong side, with a narrow bias strip of muslin. This forms a shirr, through which run narrow linen tape. Cut the sleeves from the pattern given for Fig. 49, trim them, and sew in with a cord.

Infant's Jacket with Gored Front.

See illustration on double page.

For making this jacket cut of suitable material from Fig. 86 one piece, and from Figs. 87-89 each two pieces. Sew together Figs. 86 and 87 from 78 to 79, backstitching the seams on the right side, press out the seams and cover them on the right side with a needle-work band, which is stitched down. Trim the front with insertion stitched on and edged with a needle-work band on each side. Join the backs and sides, hem the backs, and face the bottom. The collar consists of two muslin bands an inch and a quarter wide, which are sloped in front, hemmed narrow around the edge, and trimmed with needle-work edging. Each band is ten inches long, and is gathered at the neck and bound in with the neck of the jacket. The binding is a third of an inch wide; a tape is run through it for fastening. Sew up each sleeve from 84 to 85. Trim the sleeves at the wrists with insertion and needle-work edging and set them into the arm-holes, bringing 85 on 80. Cut away the material under the needle-work insertion.

Infant's Figured Piqué Jacket.

See illustration on double page.

The front of this jacket is hemmed with insertion an inch and a quarter wide, with five narrow pleats on each side. The collar, sleeves, and cuffs are finished with needle-work edging. Cut from Fig. 82 one piece, allowing for the pleats, and from Figs. 83 and 85 each two pieces. Having taken up the pleats and stitched on the embroidery, backstitch together Figs. 82 and 83. Cut away the material under the insertion. Hem the backs and bottom and join the neck to a collar which consists of two embroidered bands, each an inch and a half wide. Slope the fronts of these pieces. Join the collar and jacket together with a binding wide enough to permit a string to be run in with which to tie the jacket. For each sleeve cut from Fig. 84 two pieces, join these from 74 to 75 and from 76 to 77, and set the revers on the upper side of the sleeve at the wrist. Trim the wrists with needle-work edging and set the sleeves into the arm-holes, bringing 77 on 77.

Children's Collars and Cuffs.

See illustration on double page.

The collar with chemisette for girl from eight to ten years old, No. X, Supplement, is of fine linen, edged with guipure lace, and is set on a muslin chemisette. Cut the latter from Figs. 93 and 90. For the binding cut of linen from Fig. 40 one piece, double, and from Fig. 41 two pieces also of double material. Stitch the corners of the collar and bind it according to the corresponding figures on the pattern; then join this to the chemisette and the collar edged with lace. For each cuff cut from Fig. 42 two similar pieces, stitch the outer edge, sew on the lace, and finish with buttons and button-holes.

The standing collar, with chemisette and cuff for girl from eight to ten years old, consists of a straight band of linen, on which is set a frill of lace; the band is fastened to a nanook chemisette. The cuff is of fine double linen, trimmed with lace like the collar, and embroidered figures. Both chemisette and cuffs are cut from the patterns given for the previous illustrations.

For Boy's Sailor Collar, No. XXXIII, Supplement, cut from Figs. 102 and 103 each two pieces, the right side of the collar and binding being of fine linen and the wrong side of muslin. Stitch the collar and bind it according to the figures on the pattern. Set a button and button-hole on the binding.

The Boy's Linen Collar, No. XXXII, Supplement, is of double material, stitched around the edge with a narrow, straight binding. Fig. 101 gives the pattern of half the collar.

CHILD'S LINEN COLLAR.—This collar is worked in button-hole stitch around the edge. It is cut from Fig. 101, making the corners somewhat less pointed.

CHILD'S PLEATED COLLAR.—This collar consists of a pleated band an inch and a half wide and twenty-eight inches long. The collar is pleated up to suit the size of the neck, and then bound with a bias strip of nanook. This binding forms a shirr, through which is run a cord with tassels on the ends.

CHILD'S COLLAR WITH ROUNDED LAPPETS.—The rounded pieces which form this collar are of striped nanook. The edges are trimmed with lace, headed by a fold. These pieces are set on a strip of lace insertion half an inch wide and sixteen inches long, with which they are joined by means of a fold of the material stitched down. The lace insertion is slightly full on the other side and overseam to another piece of insertion only thirteen inches long; this last is pleated up to eleven inches in width, and then set on a narrow muslin binding. The collar consists of eleven pieces in all; each piece is an inch and a half long and two inches wide without the lace.

CHILD'S MUSLIN, LACE, AND INSERTION COLLAR.—This collar is made of pleated muslin, lace, and insertion in the manner shown by the illustration. The Girl's Collar with Bavette consists of insertion an inch wide, bordered with edging of the same width. It is set on a muslin chemisette, which is pleated in front. The bavette consists of a fan-shaped piece of muslin, ornamented with lace and insertion in the manner shown by the illustration.

CRAVAT COLLAR FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.—This collar is formed of insertion three-fourths of an inch wide, edged on each side with somewhat narrower lace. The ends are crossed in the manner shown by the illustration. The collar is set on a nanook or muslin chemisette.

Boy's Shirt Front.

See illustration on double page.

This shirt front is of fine linen, opening with a wide hem in front. Cut the collar and binding double, and stitch them on the edges. The material for the front of the shirt front is tucked and the edges hemmed, after which it is joined to the collar, as shown by the figures on the pattern. Figs. 98 and 100 give the pattern of half the bosom and collar.

Cap for Girl from 4 to 6 Years old.

See illustration on double page.

This cap may be made of white piqué, linen, or muslin. The edge is finished with a row of linen points, headed by a bias fold. The cap is fastened by a button and loop.

Infants' Caps.

See illustration on double page.

INFANT'S LINEN CAP.—This simple cap is made of fine linen, edged with thread lace. From Figs. 104 and 106 each, cut of linen one piece, allowing for a hem on the edges. Having hemmed the crown, sew the head-piece together from 107 to 108, hem the edges, gather the back from the middle as far as X on each side, and overseam to the crown, according to the corresponding figures on the pattern. Lastly, sew on the lace and the strings.

INFANT'S MUSLIN CAP.—This pretty cap is made of Swiss muslin, and is trimmed around the edge with frills of the same material. Cut the crown from Fig. 107; for the head-piece arrange from Fig. 106, with the assistance of the illustration, a piece consisting of muslin in narrow tucks, and needle-work insertion. Along the middle of the head-piece stitch a band of needle-work edging, headed with a bias fold of the muslin. Now gather the crown from the bottom as far as X, so that in sewing together the crown and head-piece the X and figures of one shall come on X and the corresponding figures of the other; and cover the seam on the right side with a bias fold of muslin. Bind the cap around the neck, and run in hemmed strings on the back. Set a muslin frill, edged with lace and headed with a bias fold, round the edge. A second frill like the first is set about a third of an inch further back, so as to lie over the other. On the back of the cap the frill is two-thirds of an inch wide. The strings are of fine linen, hemmed.

INFANT'S HERRING-BONE STITCHED CAP.—This is a very pretty Swiss muslin cap. Make the round crown by cutting a strip of muslin twenty inches long and three-fourths of an inch wide; lay the edges of this over till they meet in the middle, and then double it again, which brings the edges inside. Work this strip in herring-bone stitch with white cotton; wind this spirally on paper, each round about a fifth of an inch from the preceding, and join the rounds by means of simple open-work cross stitch. Cut the head-piece from Fig. 104; ornament, as shown by the illustration, with herring-bone and open-work cross stitch, and join it to the crown. Sew on a narrow piece of muslin inside at the back of the neck for a shirr, and run in narrow strings, the ends of which must be brought outside and tied. Trim the front with three narrow muslin frills, laying one over the other, the under one extending round the neck of the cap. The strings are of muslin hemmed.

INFANT'S RIBBED PIQUE CAP.—This cap is of ribbed piqué, and is very simple. Cut from Fig. 109 one piece, and from Fig. 108 two equal pieces, and join the pieces according to the corresponding figures on the pattern. The seams are pressed out and cross-stitched down on the wrong side. Bind the edge with narrow linen tape, which forms the shirr on the back; run in two narrow pieces of linen tape and tie behind. Lastly finish the border with needle-work edging, and sew on the strings.

Infants' Shoes.

See illustration on double page.

INFANT'S WHITE FLANNEL SHOE.—This pretty shoe is made of fine white flannel, lined with blue flannel, and edged with points worked in blue wool. Over the top arrange bands of narrow velvet with pearl buttons, which also serve for fastening the shoe. Cut of the outside material and lining from Fig. 45 two pieces, and from Fig. 46 the sole. Next sew together the shoe pieces from 68 to 69 and from 70 to 71; work the edges with the wool, and overseam the upper to the sole. The bands are sewed down on one side, but fastened on the other by means of the buttons and button-holes.

INFANT'S WHITE PIQUE SHOE.—This shoe is of white piqué, lined with muslin, and thinly wadded; and is bound with red worsted braid, and ornamented with herring-bone stitch in red split worsted. Cut of the outside, wadding, and lining from Fig. 43 two pieces, and from Fig. 44 the sole. Sew together the wadding and lining, and embroider the outside, after which lay it on the wadding; bind the shoe with braid, and join the pieces from 63 to 64, and from 65 to 66; then join this to the sole. Fasten by means of a button and button-hole on the band.

Infant's Pillow.

See illustration on double page.

This pillow will be found a very convenient portable couch on which to carry young children, especially when ill, as it protects them from the cold, and being fastened, there can be no danger of their rolling off. The pillow is of figured dimity, trimmed with nanook puffs, needle-work frills, and needle-work insertion. Cut of dimity with muslin lining from Fig. 58 one piece, and a piece also of dimity and lining reaching only to the smooth line on Fig. 58. Join these parts around the rounded edge with a cord. On the under straight edges sew other pieces also of dimity and lining which are only half as wide as the under part and are knotted together in the middle. The outside cover is also of dimity and lining, and of the length and breadth of the straight under part; this is stitched around the edge and joined to the under edge of the pillow. The straight side of the small rounded part is stitched together and left loose so as to place a pillow under it. Next ornament the upper part of the pillow and the outside cover with embroidered insertion, a puff two inches wide of nanook, and a needle-work frill. The puff on the cover is four inches wide. The illustration shows the manner in which the cover is fastened to the cushion.

SCHULZ DELITSCH'S PINE-APPLES.

"I HAVE my article to get up," said Schulz Delitsch.

But, to make my story clear, I see that I must introduce my young friend more formally.

Schulz Delitsch is a ragman—I mean in a literary way. He is the gentleman who makes up the interesting and instructive articles about the manufacture of domestic bristles, the lives and experience of that peculiar people who fill brass letters, the statistics concerning table-knives, or the biography of the struggling individual who invented leather porte-monnaies. He (Schulz) is possibly thirty, well-dressed, good-looking, and has a vast deal of manner. He reads omnivorously, has a good memory, and a surprising faculty of invention. He is an overpowering man in conversation, for he seems to have measured the superficial area of every subject, and, if you venture to doubt whether he has really passed the universe through his sieve, is always ready to show you the grains sticking fast. As for the real man, the actual Schulz Delitsch, no one has ever struck on him, and some are uncharitable enough to conclude that he does not exist, and that the brilliant Delitsch is simply manner, memory, and audacity. Be that as it may, I like him, though it is as I do tomatoes, with a secret wonder that I can relish them, and he dines with me every Thursday. This premised we can come back to his article.

We had dined, and were smoking our cigars.

"What is your article?" said I.

"The Girl of the Period," answered Delitsch, puffed. "Capital subject. No end to the go there is in it; and you are in no danger of putting on your colors too strong. First-class virtues those." Puffed! puffed!

"Complimentary—to the sex, I mean."

"My dear fellow, you write for the press, and ask that! Of course not. All the world is like the fellow who preferred deviled enemy with cayenne to an insipid slice of cold roast friend. Nothing pays like a slashing article."

"But when the credit of our mothers and sisters are concerned," said I, not sorry to air my doctrines on this point, "you should be more tender, Delitsch. Men instinctively believe what they read, and to teach young men to despise women—"

"The facts warrant more than is said," put in Delitsch, coolly; "there are subjects that will bear touching up, but in this case the facts must be toned down. What you and the world call satire is only an expurgated edition of the reality."

Mrs. Lumpkin rose, reddening and indignant. "Beg your pardon! sorry to offend!" drawled Delitsch; "but don't condemn a fellow in that way, without benefit of judge or jury. Few ladies are like you, Mrs. Lumpkin. I wish more were. You would not see me a bachelor to-day.

I know some five hundred ladies—reckoned them up only the other day—but of these there may be fifty who neither paint, talk slang, nor dress immodestly; in a word, who may be styled modest, womanly women. The rest—the rest, Mrs. Lumpkin, would make my fortune if I dared show them as they are; but it won't do, as I said. In these days you are not to state that the devil is black, only hint that he is blackish."

"I don't believe it," cried Mrs. Lumpkin, warmly.

"Neither did I," said Delitsch, eying her compassionately. "I actually had an idea at one time of writing something contradictory—a patient Griselda, wives and mothers, violets and rose-buds sort of thing. I am a good-for-nothing sort of a fellow, you know, and I thought that my experience might have been particularly unfortunate. But it wouldn't do. I made inquiries and satisfied myself that it was too dead against facts."

Mrs. Lumpkin stuck to her colors.

"Don't believe it. I can not believe it, Mr. Delitsch. You are mistaken."

"But, my dear Madame, it stands to reason," said Delitsch, warming. "Why am I not married? Why are so few young men married? Is it because there is any thing particularly jolly in boarding-house coffee and a bleak bachelor's room. I know plenty of men—good, warm-hearted fellows; they would like nothing better than a home. They are sick to death of hotels, theatres, and billiard-rooms, fast gallops at two in the morning, and fast girls on Broadway. They would be ready to worship a sweet, modest, intelligent woman, who would love her home and children. But where are you to find them? Your style, Mrs. Lumpkin, has died out."

"I think—"

"My dear Mrs. Lumpkin," interrupted Delitsch, eagerly, "I do not think—I know. Girls nowadays sneer at men with fifteen hundred or two thousand a year. They want spending-money, not husbands. Plenty of money for three hundred-dollar cloaks and one hundred-dollar terriers; trips to Saratoga and Europe. Nothing could induce them to wear a calico gown or to cook the breakfast, and I really believe they would die outright in the country. As a consequence, while they are waiting for the spending-money, they flirt—the more recklessly because they are not to marry the men they like, but a bank-account. Consequence of that, the men who can afford such luxuries are somehow sick of the sex, and the men who want wives are too poor to marry. Shocking state of things—but it makes screaming articles. You needn't look so indignant, Mrs. Lumpkin. If I could find a girl who was pretty, intelligent, and modest, I would marry to-morrow, and settle down into the steadiest kind of a family-man—in the country at that; I am sick of all this frivolity of the city; but as it can't be, good-night."

"The puppy!" said Mrs. Lumpkin, indignantly, almost before he had closed the door. "If he could find—why, I could name twenty whom he knows as well as we, any one of them too good for him."

"My love," said I, "there was once a man who detested pine-apples. His wife doted on them. 'My dear,' she said every morning, 'remember when you pass through the market to-day to bring me a pine-apple.'"

"Certainly," always answered the complaining husband.

"My dear," she asked every evening, "where is my pine-apple?"

"My sweet," always answered this pearl of husbands, "I really could not find any; which would have astonished his wife less, could she have known that he never looked for them, except in the Stock Exchange."

Mrs. Lumpkin's eyes sparkled with sudden mischief.

"I wish—" she commenced, and stopped short.

"Exactly," said I, "I was thinking that myself. You would like to send him to look for pine-apples—"

"Where the pine-apples grow! Yes," answered Mrs. Lumpkin. "Here is my bag."

Mrs. Lumpkin's bag has a peculiar quality. I can find in it whatever I wish for others. So I simply said:

"My dear, I will take out a wish for Schulz Delitsch."

On the following day Delitsch rushed in, carpet-bag in hand, and breathless.

"I am off, Lumpkin. Bound for Lotos."

"Where is Lotos?"

"Don't know; never heard of it, or of my uncle Jacob either. But I have the most convincing proofs that there is such a place, and there was such a man. He has had the consideration to die, and appoint me his heir. He will cut up splendidly—something like twenty thousand a year. They telegraphed me, and of course I started at once. Good-by."

Mrs. Lumpkin looked at me and smiled. I had my wish.

A man on his way to twenty thousand a year is not apt to be critical about the route. Delitsch, besides, was haunted by the fear of some practical joke. So he considered what he should do with his money if he got it, and what excuse he should make for his sudden trip out of town if he did not get it, and never once looked around him till he reached Lotos station. There his first inquiry was for Jacob Delitsch, and he drew a long breath of relief on being shown his house, close by the depot. Still his heart beat fast as he lifted the heavy knocker. The closer he came to the twenty thousand a year, the more monstrously incredible it seemed to him. He let the knocker fall, and a—well, Delitsch could not at first decide what she was, so we will say—a young person opened the door, who said, "Yes, this was Mr. Delitsch's house," in a very sweet voice.

"If you are Mr. Delitsch's nephew you are expected. Please to walk in;" and showed him the way into what in New England phrase is called the keeping-room: a small-windowed apartment, with much yellow paint; but a very cheery room, thanks perhaps to its exquisite neatness, and the wood-fire and brass dogs in the old-fashioned chimney.

In this room the young person was preparing supper, and she continued her preparations with quiet simplicity. I call her the young person. She was a very young person, hardly over eighteen. She had fine gray eyes, and a beautiful fairness and clearness of look. Her features were handsome, her accent peculiarly pure, and she talked to Delitsch with lady-like ease, although she was moulding something like biscuits in a tin vessel. But for this circumstance, and that she wore a calico gown, Delitsch would have pronounced her a lady. Her manner was refined, he thought, though it lacked flavor; and certainly she neither arched her eyebrows, nor shrugged her shoulders, nor opened her eyes very wide, nor shut them up very tight when she talked; and she walked as if she simply intended to get from one place to another, and looked at Delitsch, who was a handsome young man, as quietly as if he had been her grandmother.

"Pity," he said to himself, "that so much beauty should have no style!"

Meanwhile the object of this pity had explained to Delitsch that she was the niece of the late Jacob Delitsch, and his (Schulz's) cousin, and that the will would be read in a week from that date, during which time their uncle earnestly desired that he should remain in this house.

"If you remain also I shall find it easy to comply with the request," answered Schulz, with that admiring look with which he was accustomed to point his compliments; but it fell unheeded on his cousin. She only said,

"Will you come now to supper?"

"I must say I like a little coquetry," thought Schulz, much piqued, and sitting down in a mood to find fault with every thing. Nothing could be more faultless than the muffins, but he reminded himself that he had seen her make them—also lay the cloth, and chip the beef, and bring out the honey, and brew the tea, under his very eyes. He tried her with the Opera and town gossip; she only listened. "A regular milkmaid!" he thought to himself. He brought up the fashions; she smiled.

"I have a black silk, one white, and four calico gowns a-year," she said. "And for the style, we are a simple people here in Lotos, and have no need of trains and panier skirts."

"Barbarians!" muttered Schulz, and turned the talk to books. She lighted up at once. She was thoroughly well-read. She was not pedantic, but she had opinions, and reasoned correctly and sensibly. Schulz was dismayed. Rattle would not pass current here. She was perfectly capable of finding him out. Query. Had she not found him out? and nothing could be more awful than that to a man like Schulz. He was seized with a new sensation that he knew must be either death or shyness. "Hang it all! I hate superior women!" he growled.

All night he dreamed uneasily. His uncle pursued him with a speaking-trumpet, shouting after him quotations from his own articles, or the articles themselves took legs and chased him, shrilly calling on him to acknowledge his own children. And yet, if you had waked with him in the morning, you must have wondered at his uneasiness. His cousin looked so fresh and blooming; and though she was unmistakably making an omelet she did it with such ease and deftness that even Delitsch admitted to himself that knives and eggs and salt-boxes and frying-pans must have pleasures of their own. As for the old keeping-room, it was cheerier than ever. The little snow-white table glittered with the daintiest silver and china. The room was full of sunshine streaming in across geraniums. The clock ticked, not in the solemn, reflective manner of some grouty old clocks, but with a pleasant home sound, that chimed in well with the kettle and the cat. The air came in crisp and cool, and you saw through the open windows bronzed corn-fields and a rising of hills, and between a ripple of water. A picture for Dickens; a paradise for the warm-hearted man, always wiping his eyes, in Schulz's articles, over dead, old-fashioned simplicity!

"Bah!" said Schulz, and thought impatiently of Newport piazzas, and Fanny Fichu sweeping across in an écaré foulard over-skirt à la Camargo, waist à la Pompadour, hair à la Metternich, and walk à la Saratoga; and of other rooms, long and dark, heavily carpeted, and heavier curtained, with India vases, and bronze and buhl trifles, and little gilt chairs, and huge mirrors; and Valeria Valenciennes, large eyed and smiling faintly, a mass of lace and ruffles, listening while he talked. "Bah! how shall I manage to exist! What a pity that breakfast could not last all day!" A miserable man was Delitsch. He strolled out into the garden, and looked with deep disgust at the salvias and stocks. He came back and found his cousin sewing. When he questioned her she said that she was fond of sewing. She made all her own clothes and the house linen, and she often sewed for Dolly Jones, who was getting blind. Schulz felt the situation getting too much, for flirtation was quite out of the question with a person possessed of the simple dignity of his cousin. Schulz proposed a walk. His cousin went readily enough, but she wore a large straw bonnet and a printed shawl. It was a sort of uniform in Lotos. The pretty girls and kindly-looking women whom they met were similarly attired. The houses looked sound asleep. The street was taking a nap. The effect on Schulz was indescribable. He forgot his politeness.

"What could have ailed my uncle to require me to stay a week in this place?"

The young lady smiled faintly, blushed for the first time, and handed him a letter, saying, briefly, "You will find the explanation here," and vanished.

Delitsch examined the handwriting. It was unfamiliar. He broke this seal and read as follows:

"MY DEAR NEPHEW,—You are doubtless curious to know why I have selected you, a stranger, for my heir, and I, as a man of business, will answer at once, and to the point. My reasons are, your articles and my niece Julia. Julia is rather my dear daughter than a niece, and I desire to leave her my property. I desire also to insure her a husband, who shall treat her with kindness and manage her property. Your articles, which I have read with attention, proclaim you the man. My niece is beautiful, intelligent, well-bred, well-educated, a perfect housekeeper, economical, simple in dress, modest, affectionate, and fond of home. This is a quiet, old-fashioned place, and the worst thing that has happened to it yet is the railroad. Rents are low, provisions cheap, habits simple, hours early. Here is the cheap Paradise and the paragon of women, for which you have been sighing. When a man gets precisely what he wants, and twenty thousand a year besides, I conclude that he should make an amiable husband. Therefore I leave you my property, on condition, as you will find in my will, that you marry my niece, settle one-half of the money on her and her children, and always reside with her in Lotos, otherwise the entire property reverts to her.

Yours,
JACOB DELITSCH."

As Mrs. Lumpkin and I were sitting at dinner Schulz burst in upon us.

"How about the twenty thousand?" I asked. "Hang the twenty thousand!" he answered, peevishly. "Fifty thousand wouldn't tempt me. The old man wanted me to marry and settle in Lotos. Me! Why the very mud of New York looked pleasant to me, and I heard a hand-organ with a sort of rapture."

"And the lady?" inquired Mrs. Lumpkin. "Had every virtue in the catalogue. Amiable, beautiful, careful, diligent, economical! It is true, you needn't look. She was a great deal too good for a fellow like me. Her every look was a reproof, and I never felt sure she wasn't laughing at me. Splendid housekeeper; I should like her for a cook; but my ideal will not make omelets. Handsome, but no dash, no go about her! no style! you couldn't flirt with her. It makes me gape to think of her; and then fancy! she wore calico, and went out in the street with me in a great bonnet like her grandmother's."

"Why, I should think you were describing your ideal, after all," remarked Mrs. Lumpkin, maliciously.

"Mrs. Lumpkin," answered Delitsch, solemnly, "I have come to the conclusion that a man does not always know just what his ideal is. I met Fanny Fichu as I came here. She had the Grecian bend till you would think she must fall on her nose, and a panier bunch on her back; and her hair flying; and her elbows stiffly out; and wore four different materials in her dress; and seemed as if she creaked in her tight corsets, and said, 'How funny you are, Mr. Delitsch!' But she is stylish and jolly wide awake. She isn't slow, and she doesn't look as if she were looking you through; and she reminds me of Saratoga, and the races, and Delmonico's, and Stewart's, and lots of money. She is natural, and, Mrs. Lumpkin, I could have hugged her."

Mrs. Lumpkin looked at me. "I think Mr. Delitsch does not like pine-apples after all," she said, slyly. "What do you mean by that?" asked Delitsch, quickly; but we have never told him to this day.

THE END OF THE REVEL.

WE have all seen a garden ablaze with its blossoms on a late September afternoon—here the geraniums lifting their fragrant fires, here the verbenas with their purple and crimson beauty bathed in the mellow sunshine, here the intense azure of a sage, here the nasturtiums creeping in coils of scarlet and gold, here the lingering lilies filling the air with deliciousness, the mourning-bridges with rich pungency, a perfumed wind wandering over all as idly as if it had the summer before it, every where a tossing life and lustre in the plots and alleys, disguising the decay of fallen plum and trodden leaf. A swift twilight gathers; and then a messenger comes in the night; another day dawns, the rimey webs sparkle from hedge to hedge, but the gay and vivid splendor of the garden-beds has vanished; not a blossom hangs untarnished on its stem; the vines are lying dead, like mere juiceless and discolored threads; neither sweet odor nor fine tint is to be had. There has been a black frost, and the Season is over.

Just such a black frost, one would say, has there been at all the summering-places of our coast and country lately. A few hardy perennials yet hold up their heads there, but the fragile things, the brilliant beings, fair and fragrant and frail as the blossoms to which one compares them, have disappeared; not so utterly destroyed as their prototypes, to be sure, but, as in old days' excellence, was transferred to the heavens, so these delights of the eye—these lilies that toil not, neither do they spin—have suffered a translation into the Avenues; and the beaches and springs and hill-sides are deserted, and the squares and parks and city streets are alive once more—alive with furbelows and flounces and folderols, and with the bloomy faces blushing above them and making the furbelows and folderols seem only like the petals and pistils and adornments of a flower. For they are delights of the eye, these damsels whose wild whirl of pleasures, whose extravagances and wayward vagaries threaten to bring back upon us the days of the Decameron; and when one reproves their follies and their enthrallment in the fanaticism of fashion, their chignons and ciphers and monograms and Grecian bends and diamond-powders, one yet gives them the whole meed of loveliness, and confesses there is no beauty beneath the skies beyond that of their fruity outlines, their warm flesh, their shining eyes, their marvelous tresses, and the soft fabrics that enwrap them. But the places that knew them now know them no more; now there is no more death by drowning at Atlantic City; the honey-moons are over at Cape May; Macaulay and his New Zealander may have it all their own way among the broken bridges and the bitterns at Long Branch; the Catskill has become a howling wilderness. The surf may send its horns of spray spouting up round the Great Boar's Head, there are no more sidelong lovers' glances to catch its fleeting rainbows. Yellow Jersey sands may lick a sparkle from the deep sea depths, there are no elastic little feet to fall lighter than the touches of the breeze along their shifting length. The great harvest-moon may part the mists among the mountains, like some vast spirit dividing the walls of heaven, only to swim out over splendid solitudes of Flume and Notch. Autumn may stain his parallels with all the blood of summer, no one has staid to see; for are there not pictures as gorgeous as these now waiting in the halls of the Exhibitions?

Yes, the Season is over. One is seen no longer on the drive, rivaling the tan, behind eight thorough-breds harnessed four abreast, lying back among the cushions or handling the reins upon the box, and gaudy in toilettes eclipsing the orioles with orange and scarlet and black and silver. One leans no longer on a suitor's breast while promenading up and down the verandas of public houses in the full gaze of twice one hundred eyes. The garden-scenes of Watteau, with their bare bosoms and paniered hips, which a lady used to blush over when she carried them painted on her fan, are no longer revived every day at Sharon and Saratoga. The secret owner of African barracoons, where coiled slaves sweat and shudder together in waiting for the Cuban slave-ships, no longer swings down the too-familiar waltz with the fair and pure daughter of a good man in his embrace. The great gaming-houses are as dark and silent as tombs, unless troubled ghosts return and haunt their halls, searching for the life they lost there when they left them ruined. Heaven be thanked, the Season is over, and such scenes as these, which should mark only the corruption and decadence of a people, are no longer spread abroad to the open gaze of all the countryside, but their elements are gathered back into their local centres again. For the Season is fast becoming a social vice as monstrous as the hotels that accommodate it.

But it is a pity that the innocent things should end with the shameful ones. Pity that one has no longer all day in which to anticipate the drive from the station with husband or father or friend returned from the sun-dried town, the drive through overarched lanes of greenery spiced with the sweet-brier, and along roads where the ditches on either side are white with pond-lilies. Pity there are no more evenings to be spent in idle, blissful peace, the boat rocking on the warm wave, where the dipping oar with all its feathering drops flashes and outlines itself in light, while a land-breeze full of flower-scents kisses the hair, and the music of a song steals offshore as if it stole from heaven. Pity at least it would be if, to those that love simple pleasures, every day of the year, whether in city or at sea-side, did not bring its own with it; if it were not as delightful to welcome returning feet to the bright wood-fires of October, if the divine music of some concert-hall did not need to vary the simple song round which all nature has thrown its accompaniment of twilight and flower-breath and passion. But such pleasures are hardly a part of the Season; they do not belong to the Saturnalia; they do not require a suit of thirty trunks; they laugh to scorn these single ones, those huge bureau-boxes too large to enter the bedroom-doors of the inns and forced to wait outside: to them a modest pair is as good as a coach and six with footman and postillion; a farm-house, with the breath of cows, more comfortable than the glare and musk of hotel saloons; they do not return home to parlors whose chairs and lounges are draped in Indian cachemires.

The Season is over—and what has it accomplished? A cynic new to scenes of dissipation might propound the riddle as safely as the Sphinx was wont. Has it enlarged, as every season should do, where city-bred and country-born mingle together, the humanity, the brotherhood of the race? Has it filled the foreign visitor of our shores with admiration for the gracious and gentle virtue of our women, and shown him into what beautiful nobility they can develop under the fostering of freedom? Has it advanced our social and public manners in purity, in refinement, in antipathy to vice, in attraction toward godliness? Has it given even the poor art of dress one impulse forward toward that perfection it seeks and fails to find? Has it done any thing whatever to help the upward progress of man and womankind?

As human eyes see—far from it. It has made the country sigh with gladness when the city returned to its limits; it has filled the foreigner with self-complacency over the women he left at home, in view of the beauty spread before his purse in the stalls of its Vanity Fair; it has drawn our manners one degree nearer the great maelstrom of indecency; it has experimented on freaks of fashion to find what ones may be ventured upon to settle safely down into wintry incrustations; it has done its utmost, with the display of unmeasured wealth in the hands of a few, to crush a great mass of people in hopeless poverty without the liberty of an aspiration, to cause yet others to grind their teeth in a blind agrarian rage. It has made some sporadic marriages; it has created some insane entanglements; it has broken some hearts—ruined many fortunes and more reputations; it has vanished like a plague, to appear again and work fresh havoc when New-Year's Day throws the best houses open to it once more.

And now autumn winds are blowing the land clean from the lush decay of September. The black frost came to the rank, brilliant gardens no moment too soon. Now the great rural fairs make the county towns gay with big beets and mammoth pumpkins, and processions of sleek cattle with silken sides wind along the dusty highways; the roses bloom again in the cheeks of country lasses as they take the prize for their choice handiwork; the maples kindle their torches to illumine the coming of the chill and dark side of the year as they may; and a ripe redolence fills the atmosphere from the heaps beneath the apple-tree—that thing of beauty from the time when its rosy snow drifts over all the orchard hill-sides of the north till it stands, a ruddy cloud, dropping fruit when a wind waves its breadth boldly, or when a bird lightly stirs its topmost spray. One would say that some new Masque of Comus had swept through the fields, and leaving them at last, he saw, by the comparison, faint foreshadowings of the Golden Age again. Not that the country lass has less frequent bickerings and heart-burnings than the flutter of fashion—not that she has more loveliness—but that she has less latitude; and one thing, at least, she guards a hundredfold more jealously, and no one speaks lightly of her good name!

It is, doubtless, too much to hope that a population so crude as ours, so boundlessly enriched with sudden wealth, should do much more at present at its centres of gayety than indulge in a frivolousness for which the lookers-on may offer thanks if it does not accelerate itself into wickedness. That it shall not do so is the censor's task to endeavor. By-and-by it will weary of all that, let us trust. Opportunities of wealth, when one has exhausted their first material enjoyment, are opportunities of culture. The spiral progress of the universe, whether seen in the mounting life of plants or in the starry systems, is a thing so wide and general that it may even underpin society; and if to-day we touch the lower wing of the screw, to-morrow we shall but wind so much the higher. To-morrow, then, perhaps, these damsels—whose hour-glass runs with gold dust, and who now scatter their precious sands upon the four winds, who know nothing better to do with their day than to waste it—may cause us to remember that, in the ancient times, a parasol, now the emblem of frivolity, then was sacred to Pallas Athene, even to such extent as bestowing upon the goddess an epithet; and that one of the loveliest months of the Attic summer, where June and July combined their splendor, was named for her festivals, in which Skiron, a white parasol, was borne in pageantry by the priestesses from the Acropolis. And so remembering, we shall turn, then, to see, while blossoms breathe upon the sod, and ephemera have their day; while there is the life of bird and insect to be studied till it tells God's meaning in creation; while there is succor to be carried to the poor or to the dying; while there is innocent love to be made and listened to with all outdoors for a confidant—to see our own priestesses of the parasol carrying it to as good, if not a better, purpose.

THE SWING IN THE APPLE-TREE.

THE sunbeams come, the sunbeams go,
The boughs droop gently over;
I hear the breezes laughing low
Among the blossomless clover.
A-swinging to and fro, I pass
Through leaves that autumn dapples,
And watch, upon the fading grass,
The fall of russet apples.

I listen for the babbling creek
That stirs the noonday quiet;
Of summer gone its quavers speak,
Of dag-flowers running riot.
Oh, lonely creek, your shallow brink
Another spring will grow them;
For flowers bloom full sweet, I think,
Where'er the angels sow them!

I hear across the meadow lots
The sheep-bells softly tinkle—
They crop the tender daisy plots
That frosts begin to wrinkle.
My swing goes up, my swing comes down,
The zephyrs hurry after;
And hope and youth triumphant crown
The day with joy and laughter.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FASHIONS AND THE FASHIONABLES.

THE watering-places are still brilliant. At Baden the dresses are of an unheard-of eccentricity. Crinoline is no longer seen; the skirts cling close to the body, and are made either with prodigious trains for evening or excessively short. New modes of looping up the skirt are invented daily. Some dresses are even looped with agrafes of precious stones.

Gambling is the order of the day. A pretty Parisian actress, Léonie Leblanc, one of the so-called three Graces (the other two are Mlles. Montaud and Purson), has just lost three hundred thousand francs at roulette. She threw every thing, even to her jewels, on the tapis vert.

Prince George of Prussia, on his side, has won about sixty thousand francs. He is a charming Prince, and a great lover of art and artists. Rachel inspired him with a lively passion, which has survived the tomb. He always has before his eyes a portrait of the celebrated tragedienne, and even carries it with him when he travels.

Appropos of Rachel, I must tell you an anecdote which is not generally known. She was greatly beloved by Count Walewski, who has just died, the reputed natural son of Napoleon I.:

so much so indeed that when going on a journey he left the keys of his apartments in her care. Shortly after the Count's departure Rachel learned that he was about to be married. She hastened to his house, and, in order doubtless to have some souvenir of this well-beloved friend, or perhaps to punish him for his forgetfulness, carried off with her all the little objects of art and portable pieces of furniture that the rooms contained, leaving absolutely nothing but the large articles which were too heavy to be moved. When M. Walewski was ready to bring his young wife to Paris he wrote to one of his lady friends, asking her to have an eye to the servants, and see if every thing in his apartments was ready to receive the bride. When the lady reached the house you can judge of her consternation. A few heavy wardrobes, tables, and easy-chairs, and nothing besides! Not one of those elegant trifles, not one of those exquisite articles of vertu, which the rich scatter with such art and taste around them. What would the Countess Walewski think of such dreary bridal apartments? The newly-wedded couple were to arrive the next morning. There was no time to buy any thing, and it was an embarrassing question to know what to buy. The minister's friend was struck with an idea that could only have come from a woman. The idea was charming. She ordered wagon-loads of grasses and flowers of all kinds to be brought, and tastefully arranged them all over the rooms, on the mantles, the tables, the empty étagères—every where, in short. The effect was enchanting. When the young bride arrived she thought herself in Eden. The master-pieces of men had given way to flowers, those master-pieces of nature. Had the thing been expressly arranged it could not have succeeded better.

The Emperor and Empress are at Biarritz. An interview between the Queen of Spain and Napoleon III. is announced.

They arrived at two o'clock in the morning. At nine they were already promenading on the beach. The Emperor is greatly amused at the sight of the bathers. Very few persons look pretty in these frightful bathing costumes. There are such caricatures, among the men especially, that the Emperor can not help laughing.

The Empress was very simply attired. She wore a black cashmere suit drawn up en paniers, and trimmed with guipure, the whole covered by a large water-proof cloak. She was exquisitely coiffée, with a Spanish toque of black felt, turned up with black velvet, with silk balls scattered over it, and two large heron's plumes at the side. This sombre coiffure admirably sets off the delicate whiteness of her complexion and the dazzling gold of her hair.

The Empress has ordered the pretty cutter, La Nive, presented to her by a Bordeaux deputy, to be moored in the harbor. It was in this cutter that she and the Prince Imperial were nearly drowned last year while in the country.

The Emperor has given his beloved Nero a successor. He has bought a large Pyrenean dog that answers to the name of Picon.

Distinguished ladies from all countries, especially Spaniards and Russians, are daily arriving at Biarritz. The American colony is smaller than usual. These ladies come to enjoy the magic spectacle of the surf, and to display the magnificence of their toilettes. The Princess Galitzin is one of the most noticeable; an intrepid swimmer, who goes out as far as the eye can reach, followed by a huge black dog, her probable savior in case of accident.

A piquant Spanish lady, the Marchioness de C—, attracts much attention by the art with which she varies her black dresses. She is devoted to black without being in mourning, for she is often seen with bright-colored sashes and precious stones such as emeralds, garnets, and lapis lazuli. She always wears jewels to match the trimmings of her dress. She has a suit of black poul de soie, embroidered with wreaths of large blue corn-poppies, with a lapis lazuli necklace, ear-rings, and buttons.

The most successful dress of the season has been a complete Watteau costume, with large bow behind; dress of black China crape, trimmed with uncut coral fringe; and broad belt of large coral beads.

The ladies of the highest rank at Biarritz especially affect simple costumes of cashmere and dark cloth. Dark green and bottle-green are favorite colors. An under-skirt is made with a narrow flounce of the same material, trimmed with black worsted galloon. The over-skirt is trimmed with the same galloon and caught up very high at the sides. The jacket is furnished with a revers, and is tight-fitting or loose according to taste. It is frequently buttoned at the side.

The styles of jewelry are as eccentric as most of the dresses. I can not imagine what pleasure one can take in wearing such hideous things. Owls and death's-heads are seen for ear-rings, as are also the famous lantern of Henri Rochefort, and miniature boats, and sonnettes or little bells. Victorien Sardou made this prediction in the Benôiton Family, that when the daughter put on grelots the mother would want sonnettes. Apropos of Victorien Sardou, it is said that he is writing a drama after the style of Paul Féval. The Bossu and the Benôiton Family mixed must surely make a spicy work.

Mademoiselle Patti, or rather the Marchioness de Caux, is at this moment at Hombourg, where, after singing before a parterre full of princes, she is the object of the most flattering attentions. There is one person far prouder than she of her triumphs, namely, her husband, who is puffed up at every compliment he hears. It is he that receives the bouquets and applause. He said the other day, "We are going to America. We shall sing there for some months; we have an engagement worth a million." Bravo! Marquis de Caux; we did not give you credit for so much talent.

DEATH AND THE SEASONS.

ANNIE, as a rose-leaf tender,
As the morning fresh and fair;
Little form, so light and slender,
Little face, of beauty rare!
Childhood's hours are fleeting, Annie,
Spring is changeable, well-a-day!—
Death came by and look'd on Annie,
Look'd, and slowly turn'd away.

Annie, blooming, gentle maiden,
Deck'd with blushes like the rose!
Droops thy head with sweetness laden,
Or with grief, that no one knows:
Summer clouds will ofttime, Annie,
Veil the glad, bright, golden ray.—
Death bent, threatening, over Annie;
Gazed a while, and pass'd away.

Annie, Autumn's glowing treasures
Bend the luscious orchard's bough;
Spring-time's beauty, Summer's pleasures,
Into fruit have ripen'd now.
Round the spreading pear-tree, Annie,
All thy little children play.—
Death came by and look'd on Annie,
Would not strike, but pass'd away.

Annie, feeble, worn, and wrinkled,
Bent with weight of care and years.
Snows upon thy head are sprinkled,
And thy beauty's quench'd with tears.
Winter closes round us, Annie;
After toil for sleep we pray.—
Death stoop'd gently over Annie,
Took her with him; then, away.

LAURA STANTON.

NO one who has not actually been the principal of a boarding-school for young ladies and gentlemen can rightly appreciate some of my peculiar trials. The foremost one of all arises from the necessity of having teachers of both sexes. I wish some one would tell me how I am to manage them. If I find the scholars inclined to pay more attention to each other than to their books, I know how to deal with them; but when I hear—overhear, if you like—Mr. Smith telling Miss Brown that she is an angel, which she is not by any means, I confess I am somewhat puzzled as to the best plan of action.

I think my teachers must have a peculiar fondness for marrying, or else I have a peculiar talent for selecting suitable wives for my neighbors; for the neighborhood of the Seminary is mainly peopled by my ex-teachers and their families, excepting the families into which my pupils have married. And sometimes my teachers have even married each other. Now I do not see the propriety of this. I did not find it necessary to propose to every girl I met when I was a young man. In fact, I did not find it necessary to marry at all. The matron of my establishment is a most excellent person, who fulfills all her duties in a praiseworthy manner, and I have never felt any need whatsoever of a wife, nor any patience with a set of teachers whose heads are full of love-nonsense when they should be occupied with the greatness of their mission. Do they ever reflect that they are, perhaps, educating future senators and presidents, or mothers and wives of great men? That the bias given by them to the young, unformed minds under their care may change the whole tenor of America's future?—nay, of the world's future? Not they! Their kind hearts are too much absorbed in sympathy with poor Mr. Scott, who is just beginning to look cheerful after his second wife's death; or in trying to comfort Zachariah Jones, who must have had some terrible love-disappointment some time or other, or why is he still a bachelor, with his fine fortune and fine appearance? He did not show any symptoms of a broken heart that I could see, but he accepted the comfort with a very good grace nevertheless.

I grew tired of this sort of thing, and so, when two of my teachers announced to me, at the close of a session, that they were about to be united in the holy bonds of wedlock, and take their departure together for parts unknown, I resolved to go to the city, and stay there until I had secured the services of a gentleman who would positively promise not to marry, become engaged, or even make love to any one during his stay in my house. One lady and one gentleman were needed to complete my corps of resident teachers. The latter was easily found—a mild-looking gentleman, thirty years old, or thereabouts, who professed himself an inveterate woman-hater; and, indeed, he appeared to have general misanthropical tendencies. "I have not loved the world, nor the world me," he said.

Somewhat startled by this quotation, I asked him if he was fond of Byron. He assured me that he never read poetry at all nowadays; that he learned that line when he was a boy at school; and I engaged him.

Then came the hardest part of my work. I, a crusty old bachelor, must find a woman who was not a coquette, who was not a scold, who had a good intellect, a good education, a lady-like appearance, and not beauty enough to attract admirers of the opposite sex. It seemed a hopeless task. Where are all the stately ladies of whom Shakespeare wrote? Did Scott's heroines leave no descendants? I certainly saw no traces of them in the numerous visitors who called in answer to my advertisement. Toward night I sat ruefully thinking over my sorrows when another applicant was announced, and looking up, I saw a plain, soberly-dressed young lady, whose whole appearance corresponded so well with my ideal of a school-teacher that my heart gave a sudden bound.

"She is found!" I said to myself. "If she knows her A B C's I will engage her."

She knew rather more than the alphabet. Her acquirements, particularly in the languages, were so great, and she was so ready to give proofs of her ability to teach, taking it for granted that I was able to converse fluently in all the modern languages usually taught in schools, and to read the ancient ones at a glance, that, fearing to dispel her illusions, I dropped that subject, and engaged her. I was sure that she would be just the one I wanted; I was sure that a lady whose everyday friends and companions were Homer and Sophocles, Virgil and Schiller, was not very likely to attract or be attracted by the honest farmers of Marshdale, nor the superficial collegians upon whom I usually had the luck to light for teachers.

It so happened that the lady, whose name was Miss Stanton, and I went to Marshdale by the same boat. I met, besides, two of my young ladies who were returning to school. Considering it highly improper for them to travel without an escort, I immediately took them under my protection; which I did by introducing them to Miss Stanton. For a time all went well. The young ladies were homesick, and just a little sea-sick, and behaved with the utmost propriety. But, returning to them after one of my excursions round the boat, I found Miss Stanton herself engaged in an animated conversation with a gentleman, while the young ladies, with restored cheerfulness, were busily engaged in demolishing the contents of a basket of fruit that had made its appearance on the scene since I left them.

I am not a quick-tempered man; so, before I let my angry passions rise, I came forward to see who the stranger was, and what business he had there. Seeing he rose, and put out his hand. "Don't you know me?" said he, laughing. "I have come fifty miles to-day to see you again."

"You ought to have left those brown whiskers at home," said I. "How am I to guess whose face is hidden behind them?"

"Yes," said he; "you are right. I did not have much hair on my face when I left school fourteen years ago. I'm Mark Torrington, and these young ladies are my nieces."

"I am glad to see you, Mark," said I. "You will find Marshdale very much changed since you were there. You are acquainted with Miss Stanton?"

"Oh yes," he replied. "I've always known her." And we fell into a general conversation respecting schools, memories of boyhood, the changes of time, and other interesting subjects. But after we reached Marshdale I took the first opportunity when I was alone with Mark to ask him some questions about Miss Stanton. He did not seem inclined to be very communicative; but he told me that she was an orphan, with one brother, Archibald. Although they were nearly the same age she had always taken care of him, more as a mother than a sister; thinking no sacrifice too great that conduced to his comfort or pleasure. When he went to college she gave up nearly all of her income to add to his, in order that he might live well in New Haven. But his expenses continually increased, while she had made hers so small that it was impossible to make them any less; so, giving him her whole income, she became a teacher. Archibald had left college, and was now nearly through studying law.

"Then she will not teach much longer?" said I, somewhat dismayed.

"I hope not," said Mark, in any thing but a hopeful tone.

Miss Stanton proved to be an excellent teacher, and a very pleasant inmate of the house in every respect. But she was not so plain as I thought at first. She had beautiful hair, and clear frank eyes that made one forget to look at the rest of her face; and then she had the only beauty that can take a real hold upon the heart, the beauty of expression. I dreaded more and more the time when she would no longer teach for me. I was sitting one evening, thinking partly of this, and partly of the general incomprehensibility of human nature—for my cook had just given warning in order to marry my ex-gardener—when I heard some one trying the garden-gate; and looking out, I saw a female figure enter the garden from the house just as the person outside, finding the gate firmly locked, climbed over the high board-fence into the yard that had been held sacred to the young ladies from the beginning of its existence; where no male feet but my own and my gardener's were ever allowed to penetrate. I am sorry to say this was not the first scene of the kind that I had watched and interrupted at the proper moment; and I was able to control my indignation sufficiently to listen a while in order to find out how far the affair had progressed before interfering. It progressed farther than was consistent with my ideas of propriety then and there. For the stranger caught the lady in his arms and kissed her, not once but many times; and then, with his arm still around her, they began to walk up and down the garden, talking in low, earnest tones. As they came nearer my window I heard the gentleman say,

"I couldn't help it. I couldn't come before Sunday unless I came at night; we are so busy. And you know what a time there would have been if I had come to see you at this time in the evening. Ten to one the house would have been locked up."

"Couldn't you have come Sunday?" said she. "Suppose some one should see such a mysterious meeting here?"

"Suppose they should?" said he. "I have something to say that will not keep till Sunday, Laura."

"Not bad news, Mark?" I could see their faces quite plainly as she looked anxiously up to him in the moonlight. Mark Torrington and Miss Stanton.

"Just as you take it," he replied. "I call it good news. Are you willing to go with me to make a new home in a new country, Laura? Will you—" But by this time they were too far off for me to hear what they said. I had already heard and seen enough to know that it was not necessary to interrupt them. Mark Torrington and Laura Stanton were quite able to manage their own affairs. I did not for an instant suspect them of any further impropriety than the mere act of meeting in this clandestine manner; and as they did not seem inclined to come near enough to the house for me to overhear any more of their conversation, I sat still. But the current of my meditations was completely changed by this added proof of the nature of the tendencies of humanity, something on the principle of the old philosopher who injured his eyesight by jumping into a bramble-bush, and cured himself by the very simple process of jumping into another one. So my thoughts ran in such a very peaceful channel that I must have grown sleepy, for I suddenly became aware of voices near me, without having any definite idea of where they were, or what they were saying. But presently I saw Mark and Laura standing near me, and heard him say, "Then I must go alone, Laura?"

"How can I leave Archibald now?" she said, pleadingly. "You know I can not, Mark. All my work for him would be thrown away; and in another year he will not need my help."

"And in another month I shall be in South America," said he.

"Why do you tempt me so? You know it is harder for me to stay than for you to go," she replied.

"Then go!" he exclaimed, vehemently. "What right has your brother to keep you from me? Isn't it enough that you have made a slave of yourself to him ever since—"

He hesitated slightly, and she interrupted him, "Ever since I nearly made him blind. No; nothing could be enough to atone for that."

"Nonsense!" said he, impatiently. "As if it did him any harm! Nobody can tell that his eyes are not all right; and he can see as well with one as with two."

She did not answer; but shook her head.

"Laura," he went on, seeing that she was unconvinced. "I can not believe that this is your real reason. Your going away need not injure Archibald. He can have your money all the same. Of course I shall sign away all right in it, and you could give it all to him."

"That would not be quite right, would it? Besides—" and she paused.

"What!" he exclaimed. "You don't mean to tell me that it would not be enough? Does that scamp use all his own money and all yours, and then take your salary in this miserable place besides?"

"You don't know. You can not understand," she said. "Oh, Mark, can't you see that it would be this way all the time if I went? And it has been the hope and work of my whole life to make some reparation to him of the injury I did him. You could not always be patient with him; and he would not take one cent from you, Mark."

"Wouldn't he?" said Torrington, with a short, bitter laugh. "I know I'm no favorite of his, nor he of mine; you are right about that. So, if you prefer your brother to me, I have no more to say."

He might have known that if his pleading could not move her, his anger certainly would not. Perhaps he did; for, taking both her hands in his, and looking down into her face, as if he hoped to read some change of purpose there, he said,

"Then we are never to see each other again, Laura?"

But she had said all she had to say, and she remained silent. So after a little he simply said, "Good-by, Laura," and went away. She fastened the gate, and stood watching him until he was out of sight. Then she came into the house.

I heard, incidentally, in the course of the next month, that Mark Torrington had sailed for South America. He had been made partner in a large New York house, on condition of going there, and had every prospect of becoming a wealthy man in a very short time. After that I heard no more of him for years. Archibald Stanton finished his course of study, and entered upon the practice of his profession, but still Miss Stanton said nothing about giving up her position in my school. Her brother married, as brothers will, and she seemed more completely alone in the world than before. She spent her vacations at his house; but she did not seem to enjoy being there much. Notwithstanding her self-sacrificing devotion to her brother I think she took very little real pleasure in his society, and still less in that of his wife. Mrs. Archibald Stanton was rich; and both she and her husband were absorbed in the frivolities and dissipations of fashionable life; they could have very little in common with Laura Stanton.

She was always cheerful, as far as I could see; yet I knew that she must often have had a heavy heart. She was not unsociable, but she made no intimate friends. Every one went to her with their joys and griefs, sure of finding a ready and sympathizing listener; yet no one ever seemed to think it possible that she could have a story of her own to tell, or could wish for sympathy in return. And she, on her part, appeared to have no need of it; she lived her quiet useful life among us, doing more good by her unconscious influence and unselfish example of cheerfulness and good temper than many women do in a long life. After her brother's marriage she had the use of her money again; and then she made arrangements with me to have less of her time occupied in teaching; but she wished to remain in Marshdale. She wanted some work in life, she said; some definite daily employment to keep her, by the necessity of constant exertion, from falling into indolent habits; or, still worse, from getting the blues. Then she liked Marshdale. The world is a large place, and such an insignificant part of it as herself would soon be lost in the crowd if she moved about too much. If her friends had to be constantly looking in different places for her they might, after a time, forget where to look, or cease to look at all.

I thought I knew who these "friends" or friend might be; and whenever Mark Torrington's nieces had a South American letter, as they did sometimes, I used to ask Miss Stanton to deliver it to them; and made a point of asking them, in her presence, for news of their uncle afterward. It may have been foolish; it was a thing which I certainly would not have done in many cases. But as one year after another went by, and no message came to Laura Stanton from Mark, my interest in him began to flag, and I naturally supposed that hers did the same. My interest in Mark, not my interest in Miss Stanton. I had now, by means of fortunate investments, economy, and general good management gathered together money enough to make me independent of my profession, even with the additional expense of a family; and the "light of household fires" was beginning to have a stronger attraction for me than in the days when I thought that marriage, for a man with a small income and good position in society, meant anxiety, labor, and, worst of all, debt. If I ever meant to have a home, this seemed the most suitable time; and Laura Stanton the most suitable woman. But watching her with the new attention awakened by these reflections I perceived that I was not the only one who had discerned her merit. There was Chauncey Osgood, who had lately come into possession of the Bellman place. He was young—y younger than I by at least ten years; rich, and passably good-looking. He had very few opportunities of seeing Miss Stanton, however; and she made them as few and unsatisfactory as possible; in which laudable conduct she was vigorously aided and abetted by me.

I met her one evening, when Mark Torrington had been gone five years, in the garden in which she had parted from him that summer night. As the day had been a warm one, the doors and windows were all open to receive the cool air; and, as I walked up and down the path with her, I heard the door-bell ring. Not wishing to exchange the pleasant twilight and Miss Stanton's society for the dull parlor and still duller visitor who had probably arrived, I turned toward a part of the garden where the shrubbery would hide me from sight. The soft air, the rich sunset colors, the odor of the flowers, all conspired to fill me with more sentimentality than I had felt for many a long year; and I came as near the verge of talking nonsense as I consider myself capable of doing. I had fully made up my mind to ask Miss Stanton to marry me; but I had intended to state my case in a plain, straightforward manner, as a sensible man should in speaking to a sensible woman, putting clearly before her the wider sphere of usefulness and happiness open to her as my wife than as my teacher; and now I found myself speaking so earnestly, so passionately, that she blushed suddenly, and then as suddenly turned very pale. I had never seen her so much excited before; could it have been love for me that had kept her so long in Marshdale? But I had not time to solve this problem; for, while I had been talking, I heard the door open and some one ask for me; and, although I purposely went still farther into the shade, the servant who was looking for me walked directly to the spot where I was, and led me triumphantly into the house. As I passed the open hall-door on my way to the parlor I saw Chauncey Osgood coming up the steps. He asked for Miss Stanton, and I told him that she was particularly engaged, but I would call her if it was important. He had not the courage to insist upon seeing her, being somewhat doubtful as to his reception, poor fellow; and leaving a message for her he went away again. I went into the parlor, still holding the card the servant had given me, and which I had not read, and found Mark Torrington. Why, in the name of all that is sensible, couldn't he have waited a year or two longer if he must come back? Earnestly, but silently, wishing him in the heart of the Andes I shook hands with him, endeavoring to appear cordial, and tried to talk of every thing but Laura. But it was of no use. He began almost immediately after the first commonplace.

"So Miss Stanton is still with you? I thought I heard some one asking for her just now."

I could have knocked the man down with pleasure. The impulse to throw him out of the window was so strong that I went to the one nearest me and closed it, by way of resisting temptation. The impertinent wretch! To leave her without a word or a sign these long years; to let her waste the best part of her life in mourning over his absence, for all he knew to the contrary; and then to come back and expect to find her waiting and ready, like patient Griselda, to come or go according to his will. But I had to say something; and I could not very well deny her presence in my house; so I said,

"Yes, she is still here; and I should be glad to have her here as many years more; but that gentleman calls very often; so often, in fact, that I am sometimes obliged to send him away. You must have heard me to-night."

"I did," said he; "but I did not recognize his voice."

I saw that I had touched him, and the temptation to go on was too strong for me.

"Probably not," said I. "He has not been in Marshdale long; but you must have heard of him. His name is Osgood—Chauncey Osgood—and he inherited the whole of Chauncey Bellman's property. It will be an excellent match for Miss Stanton."

"Ah!" said Mark. "An elderly man, I presume?"

"About thirty," I replied. "But don't mention this to any one. I really had no right to say any thing about it just yet; but you are such an old friend of hers. I hope you mean to stay in Marshdale some time, now you are here."

"Yes," said he; "I have cast anchor at your hotel for the present. I am looking for a farm in this neighborhood."

We were both ready to drop the subject of Laura's future life by this time; and to quiet my uneasy conscience I entered into a detailed account of the best farms in the vicinity. He went away at last, without asking for Laura again, or leaving any kind of message for her.

I never asked Laura for an answer to my offer of marriage. I could see by her face that she knew of Mark's return, before we spoke of it; and that she had not forgotten him. But as day after day passed, and she knew that he was only a few doors off, without coming to see her, her courage began to fail. I could see it in her slower step and paler face; and in her nervous way of looking up whenever a door opened or the bell rang. I saw her one day standing before a glass with a single gray hair in her hand, looking, with a deeper feeling than mere vanity, at the dim and indistinct foreshadowings of wrinkles in her face. Two pictures lay on the bureau before her; one of herself, taken several years before, and one of Mark. We saw him in church the next Sunday. He was with the De Forrests, and was so much taken up with one of the young ladies, Lena, that he could only bow across the church to us as we came out. Laura returned the bow quietly, without the slightest change of color or expression; she did not even retaliate by letting Chauncey walk home with her. She shook him off, as usual, in the course of the first two blocks, and walked with the school. Mark and Lena De Forrest were on the other side of the street; and even I could not help seeing that they were a remarkably handsome couple. She was so fresh, so bright, and so stylish; a complete contrast to Miss Stanton in every respect; and Mark was a tall, fine-looking man. But whether the sight pleased our eyes or not, it was one we were destined to see many times in the course of the next few weeks. They rode on horseback, they drove, and they walked; and no matter where they went, they always passed my house before they reached home.

For a few weeks only. Then the flirtation ceased as suddenly as it had commenced. Whether Lena, having found some one she liked better, had dismissed Mark; whether he was tired of her, or whether the whole thing had been merely a way of passing time, while he watched to see what changes the years had made in Laura, I do not know. Lena De Forrest is a sensible girl, perfectly well able to take care of her own heart and her own affairs generally. I did not feel troubled on her account. But I did feel indignant when, after a day's absence, I found that Mr. Torrington had called, insisted upon seeing Laura, and after a long call had taken her out riding. Of course the sequel is easily guessed. I did think that Laura Stanton had more spirit than to put up with such treatment, and more sense than to love a man who was capable of it; but no, I am afraid the story of Patient Griselda is true after all. If the end of that tale was considered poetical justice in the days of Chaucer, I am glad that I live in the nineteenth century, when I have a right to be indignant at such conduct as Mark Torrington's. Chauncey Osgood is worth fifty such as he. But Laura does not think so.

PEACHES AND CREAM FOR TWO.

By BARRY GRAY.

WE drew around the tea-table—my wife and I. Tea, save in the summer time, when I take my month's vacation, is almost an obsolete meal with me; for the hour—six o'clock—wherein it is proper for it to be partaken, is usually devoted by me to dinner. All day in town, with just a chance to run into Delmonico's for a sandwich or a tart at noon, finds me at six o'clock, with the vesper-bell from the college sounding in my ears, as I reach my cottage-home in the country, possessed of an appetite which demands more than the simple tea, which, in the days of my boyhood, with dinner at noon, was all-sufficient for my wants.

Having, however, a regard for the habits of early life, my wife and I, in these idle vacation days, take our dinner at the primitive hour of half past twelve, and so are enabled to enjoy our cups of Ojtee tea, with the accompanying light biscuits and fresh butter, sponge-cake, and peaches and cream, with exemplary zest, in the good old-fashion way.

Tea is the most social, too, of all meals. At breakfast the thoughts of the duties of the day often interfere with our proper enjoyment of the same; while dinner is a business that nature regards as a most important affair, not to be slighted or hastened, but treated with the attention and observance which it so eminently deserves. Tea is the only meal which may be dallied over. Then the labor of the day is done, and as we stir the sugar in our cups, we may fearlessly laugh and chat and be merry. The tea-cup is your true gossip's bowl, and, next to the ancient wassail-bowl, merits the encomiums of all gentlefolks. The tea-table is the most proper, too, of any for the display of flowers; still, a shallow dish, filled simply with nasturtiums and morning glories, looks well on the breakfast-table. On the dinner-table, however, with the steams of hot dishes mingling with their perfume, flowers, unless, indeed, they come in with the dessert, are extremely out of place; but on the tea-table a vase containing a few roses or sweet-peas, "on tip-toe for a flight," as the poet hath it, or other flowers, of mild odors, is an elegant and appropriate ornament.

I said something very like the above to the lovely woman who, for many years, has honored me by sitting opposite to me at table, pouring out my coffee in the morning and my tea at evening with a cheerfulness and punctuality creditable alike to her good taste and her kindness of heart.

She acquiesced with a smile in all I had said, but reminded me that my tea was getting cold, and my peaches and cream remained untasted.

"Peaches and cream, my dear," I said, taking a spoonful or two of them, "form a repast fit for a poet; and if there be one dish more than another which I like, it is peaches and cream. Indeed, nothing can be better."

"I think," said my wife, blushing ever so slightly, "that in the days of our courtship your preference was for strawberries and cream."

"Strawberries and cream, my dear," I replied, "is exceedingly proper food for lovers; but for matrons and graybeards, peaches and cream is better."

My wife said that she didn't see why.

"Well, the only reason I can give at present is," I answered, "that a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush; here are your peaches and cream; but where are your strawberries? Besides, I always had a weakness for peaches. They have ever had an attraction for me which no other fruit possesses. In my earliest years, when I was the wickedest boy in my native town, I was more given to the rifling of peach-trees than of any other trees which flourished in the grounds of my neighbors. I remember I used to take much satisfaction in walking through the peach orchards, even in the spring time, when the trees were only covered with pink blossoms, for I enjoyed, by anticipation, the rich harvest which the summer would yield. True, too, I took delight in looking at the beauty of the blossoms, and in listening to the ceaseless murmur of the bees extracting honey from them, and in hearing the song of the robin, hidden from sight amidst their pink clusters."

"Even dried peaches in the winter time had a relish for me which dried apples or plums never possessed; and the tarts the pastry-cook made of them were in my school-days much sought after."

"And I remember," said my wife, "that when we were first married my brandied peaches, which I kept in a store-room off from your library, were also much sought after by some one, and disappeared in a most mysterious and rapid manner. I know you laid their disappearance to the little black boy, but I have always had doubts as to whether he took them."

"Nonsense!" I exclaimed. "But I confess I like brandied peaches very much, and I trust you will not neglect to put a jar or two of them down. Brandy, I know is dear, but don't let the price stand in the way of your fulfilling my request."

"Oh, for that matter," said my wife, "good whisky will answer quite as well. Take"—and here her housewifely qualities triumphed over every other consideration, while, with commendable zeal, she spoke as follows: "take," she repeated, when she found she had gained my attention, "a pound of sugar for every two pounds of peaches. Select the best fruit, large and plump, and take off their skins by dipping them into hot water, when with a napkin they will easily rub off. Boil your sugar until it is ready to candy. Then take the kettle off of the fire, and pour upon the sirup as much brandy or whisky as will serve when united with the sirup to cover the peaches which you have already placed in the jar to receive them. Pour the liquid while still warm over the peaches, and close and seal the jar."

"Excellent," I said. "Now, how about preserved peaches?"

"To preserve peaches," said my wife, becoming more interested as she proceeded, "first rub off the skins. Halve or slice them, take out the stones, weigh them—"

"What—the stones?" I asked.

My wife deigned no reply.

"To one pound of fruit," she continued, "add half a pound of sugar—"

"That is just the proportion," I interrupted, "that you use in brandying them."

"No," said the excellent woman, "that was one pound of sugar to two pound of fruit."

"Well, what is the difference?" I asked.

"Why, the difference between half a pound and one pound," she replied, and so, without waiting for me to reply, she went on. "Cook them a little, till the sugar is well dissolved and the fruit heated through. Skim it well, fill your jars, and seal securely. The 'Morris Whites' are the best peaches for preserving."

"A capital recipe, my dear; and now observe," I said, "how the topaz and ruby tints of these sliced peaches blend into each other, for all the world like the color on the cheek of a brunette. Notice, too, how naturally the cream, aided by the granules of white sugar, unites with the sweet juices of the peach. Cream, yellow and thick, but not clotted, is the proper element to pour over the slices of ripe peaches. Milk, even of the best, is scarcely rich enough, and the city mixture under that name—to which the cow with one arm that produces what callow classical students call aqua pumpaginis contributes largely—should be rigidly kept from contaminating the luscious fruit."

"I suppose," said my wife, with a sorrowful look turned cityward, "that there are people in the town who can not get cream, and who, indeed, scarcely know it except by name."

"I suppose so," I said.

"People," she continued, "who have no milk-maids, as you and I have, who at early dawn and dewy eve come tripping over the meadows, or rather over the grass, at Madison Square, with pails brimming with milk both pure and creamy."

"I presume so," I said, dolefully.

"But if they have never known," she added, her countenance brightening as she spoke, "what cream is, why then, of course, they can never miss it."

"That's so! Why, you are a philosopher, my dear," I said, admiringly.

"I had rather be a poet," she replied.

"Well, poets are not bad creatures," I said. "They have spoken well of the peach. And there was one poet—I've forgotten who—of whom it is recorded that he was accustomed to walk in his garden of an afternoon with his hands stuffed into his pockets, and taking a position beneath a peach-tree, lazily eat from the pendent branches the sunny side of the fruit which hung temptingly before his lips."

"He must have been a perfect epicure," said my wife, "and extravagant withal."

"He was so," I answered. "Poets have ever been partial to peaches, and have seldom failed to give them their meed of praise. Thomson, in 'The Seasons,' speaks of 'the downy peach,' and Walter Savage Landor, in his 'Last Fruit off an Old Tree,' sings:

'Bring me a cool alcove, the grape uncrushed,
The peach of pulpy-cheek and down mature,
Where every voice, but bird's or child's, is hushed,
And every thought, like the brook night, runs pure.'

Cowley, in his 'Thoughts on a Garden,' referring to the process of grafting, says:

'We nowhere art do so triumphant see
As when it grafts or buds the tree:
It does the savage hawthorn teach
To bear the medlar and the peach;
And bids the rustic plum to rear
A noble trunk, and be a pear.'

From this we see that the peach was grafted upon the hawthorn, but I doubt very much whether the fruit amounted to much. Leigh Hunt babbles of the peach in this tailor-like way: "The peach, whose handsome velvet coat strips off so finely," and again, in his 'Story of Certumnus and Pomona,' printed in his 'Indicator and Companion,' he makes an old woman say to and of the fair Pomona, "and so my lady is mighty curious in plants and apples, they tell me, and quite a gardener, love her! and rears me cart-loads of peaches. Why, her face is a peach, or I should like to know what is. But it didn't come of itself neither. No, no; for that matter there were peaches before it; and Eve didn't live alone, I warrant me, or we should have no peaches now, for all her gardening."

"One might infer from this that Leigh Hunt believed it was a peach instead of an apple that Eve ate in the Garden of Eden. And for my part I seriously incline to that opinion; and think that after the woman had eaten the pulp of the fruit she handed the stone to Adam, and he, poor man, in attempting to swallow it got it lodged in his throat, where, under the common but erroneous name of Adam's apple, it remains to this day. It is preposterous to presume that Adam was so great an idiot as to attempt to swallow an apple, whereas it is not difficult to imagine that his disturbed conscience might drive him to seek to dispose of this evidence of his disobedience in this way."

My wife said tut! tut! to this, and declared that she was very glad the children were not present to hear me express such unorthodox views.

"At all events," I said, "peaches are about as old a fruit as is known, and there is no reason to believe that they did not grow in Eden. Besides it is a much more tempting-looking fruit than the apple, and ought, per se, to have been selected in preference. Indeed it grew in Persia ages ago, and the Latin name Persica plainly indicates its origin."

"Tradition says that the peach was poisonous, but lost its deadly effects by being transplanted. Now, if it was the peach instead of the apple which was eaten by our first parents, its deadly effects can well be said to be felt to this day. Perhaps the peachy odor of prussic acid may have originated this libel of deadliness on the peach, though it is true that poison may be extracted from the kernel. All medical authorities nowadays, however, attest the healthfulness of the peach, and even so long ago as when Sir T. Elyot wrote 'The Castel of Helth' the peach, as compared with other fruits, was thus spoken of: 'They doo lesse harme, and doo make better iuyce in the body, for they are not soo some corrupted being eaten.'

"Ben Jonson, in his description of Penshurst, the family-seat of the Sydneys, thus alludes to the peach:

'Thou hast thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers,
Fresh as the air, and new as are the hours.
The blushing apricot and woolly peach
Hang on thy walls, that every child may reach.'

"It used to be the fashion to train peach-trees against a wall with a southern exposure, very much as grape-vines are trained—this explains the last line of the stanza. In some hot-houses peaches, nectarines—which are really peaches proper—and apricots are thus cultivated."

"The ancient Romans liked peaches, and paid high prices for them. An old English writer states that for a couple of Persian peaches a Roman would give a score of pounds—which, at the present rate of gold with us, would be about seventy-five dollars apiece in greenbacks. Of course these peaches must have been perfect ones, plump and round, and of a good size, the pink blending beautifully with the white on their cheeks, and free from fleck or speck; no worms had been born and bred in their hearts, nor had the dandy-waisted wasp—and the only good trait I know of wasps is that they are partial to peaches—stung them with his poisoned dart. They must have been indeed such peaches as poor Charles Fennel Hoffman would have used in concocting his favorite drink, and which, in his anacreontic song,

'The Origin of Mint-Juleps,' he has happily expressed in this stanza:

'Pomona, whose choicest fruits on the board
Were scattered profusely in every one's reach,
When called on a tribute to call from the hoard,
Expressed the mild juice of the delicate peach.'

"Where in the world," exclaimed my wife, arching her eyebrows in surprise, as I paused to take breath, "did you gain all this information? Why, you're a perfect encyclopædia."

"Of course I am," I replied, with a modest air. "And now I'll thank you for another saucer of peaches and cream."

"Another?" she asked, with surprise, seeing that I had already eaten two.

"Yes," I answered; "and the highest praise I can award to peaches and cream is, that it is never necessary to have an appetite to appreciate them. They are ever grateful to the palate, and with the last, as with the first spoonful, we are ready to exclaim, 'That was delicious!'"

MOURNING.

THE subject of mourning is one on which there is much to be said, and plausible reasons may be given for or against the whole system. It seems to us natural and inevitable, and to most people's feelings probably grateful, that there should be some such shelter from the ordinary cares of dress in times of real sorrow, and the adoption of mourning can not be such a shelter unless it be so strictly conventional as to give no indication of the actual feelings of any individual wearer. But the form which it takes in this country is to the last degree troublesome and unreasonable. The addition of so many inches of crape for every degree of affinity is irritatingly absurd. Apart from this, crape itself is a peculiarly bad material for the purpose, from its expensiveness and its liability to injury from every drop of rain. The too common addition of quantities of jet ornaments, or, still worse, of black flowers and other dismal translations of finery into funeral trappings, is both lugubrious and ill-timed, and nobody can think the result really beautiful. To lay aside one's ornaments is the natural symbol of grief, and a relief when the feeling is real. The French plan of signifying "depth" of mourning by increasing the degree of plainness of the simple black dress, and by the absence of ornaments and trimming, seems to us much the most reasonable and appropriate. The period of wearing mourning is considerably shorter than ours. We believe they never wear crape at all, and we can not see how any living or dead is the worse for it. The free use of white in all cases of mourning, however deep, would also be a great gain. In hot weather to condemn mourners to the use of heavy black clothes is a mild form of suttee, and should, in common charity, be abolished. But it is too much to expect that individuals should have the courage to break through such customs as these, and there seems no present prospect of any means being provided for united action in such matters.

MOSQUITO SLAYING.

THERE is something terrifying, says Sala, in slaying a satiated mosquito. To kill a flea is a lively and cheerful operation. You talk to him ironically when caught, and crack him as you would a joke. The bug, even, you dismiss to limbo with one deep and not necessarily loud adjuration, wash your hands, and there is an end of the matter. You feel no more remorse for having played the part of Cainifex than does the head-master of Eton after the victims of the "Bill" have been brought to the block. It is a very different thing to kill a plethoric mosquito. The monster, minute as he is, bleeds; and it is your own blood which is expressed from his crushed carcass. You wonder, as Glosster wondered over Henry's corse, that he could have had so much blood in him. The wall is absolutely bespattered, and that too from the body of an assassin no bigger than a pin's head. You are appalled, you shudder; for that great crimson stain on the wall is you. The wretch has robbed you of so much salt and iron, and consequently vitality. The blood is the life. From your sum of existence how many hours may not be deducted on account of the mosquitoes?

CROQUET.

MUCH as croquet is affected by pleasure-seekers in the heats of summer, the cool, bracing days of autumn are the true time for this exquisite game, at which the stakes are soft glances and wreathing smiles, and where hearts are lost and won. At every blow of the mallet Cupid's shafts are driven deeper and deeper into the willing victim, and the fortunes of a life depend, perhaps, on a "fluke." And then how many of the charming damsels who enter the arena discover too late that the meshes into which they have fallen eventually bind them in matrimony, and lead to "nursing."

Many a "rover" finds himself hopelessly captured at last, and others become "scape-goats" to the more wary; while we should say that the demurely flirting young clerical in our picture is an admirable personification of a "booby." Then, looking at the young lady who is being evangelically addressed, we take it she is well versed in the game, and is making admirable use of "the foot;" and if the parson does not take care she will cheat him to a certainty. After all, even in croquet one can not always "turn the corner" safely, and frequently much difficulty is found in shooting the "bridges," as we may see by the vexed waters that trouble the plain-sailing of our principal group.

LA PREMIERE JEUNESSE.
SWEET seventeen! with eyes downcast,
Of modesty's roses rich thy store;
Fair débutante, they will fade full fast,
Wait till your first few seasons have past:
What will life be at twenty-four?

Society waits you, all untried:
Yes, you have beauty and youth galore:
Changes enough are sure to betide:
Will you be maid, or widow, or bride,
When you have come to twenty-four?

Gayly you'll tread the dance to-night,
Gayly you'll dream when the ball is o'er;
The world as it opens promises bright,
Girlhood's heart is happy and light,
Will it be so at twenty-four?

Votaries many soft words and sweet
Into those pink sea-shell ears will pour;
All the world will seem at your feet,
Looks of worship your eyes will greet;
What will you think at twenty-four?

Sweet seventeen! when those years are sped,
Broken vows may you none deplore;
Idle visions and bright hopes fled,
Ne'er may these rise round your weary head
When you have come to twenty-four!

THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD.
A Story.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.
CHAPTER XII.
A VERY GENTEEL CHAPTER.

EVERY thing in this world is comparative, we know, and only to be judged of in relation to something else. Let not the reader, therefore, despise the smallness of the ambition which led Mathilde von Schleppers to rejoice and triumph mightily in the social distinction conferred on her by an invitation to the saloons of Frau von Groll. I have written "saloons," so let the word stand. It sounds well; which, as Frau von Groll herself would have considered, is a great thing. But, in truth, the aristocratic Major's wife had but one reception-room, and that one was scarcely grand enough to deserve to be styled a saloon. Nevertheless, Mathilde von Schleppers felt it to be a very fine thing to be sitting there, drinking weak, flavorless coffee, and surrounded by the "elect" of Detmold society. Every thing in this world is comparative, as we began the chapter by saying, and it may be doubted whether the entrée to the private theatricals at Compiègne, or an invitation to meet a royal highness in a Belgravian mansion, ever gave more pleasure to a votary of fashion than Frau von Schleppers felt as she sat majestically on a worsted-work cushion in one corner of Frau von Groll's sofa. Indeed, to Mathilde, St. James's or the Tuileries would have been barren and worthless in comparison. What satisfaction could she find in being elbowed by duchesses, or stared at by peers of the realm, unless the doctor's wife, and the rich brewer's widow, who were not in Detmold "society," could be made to pale with envy at the knowledge of such glory having fallen to her share?

Of course folks in the great world have greater aims. But I am writing of a small place and small people, and, to say truth, the social ambitions were a little ignoble—in Detmold. How satisfactory it is to reflect that yours and mine, dear reader, are so infinitely higher!

As Frau von Groll's drawing-room was a fair average specimen of similar rooms in the little capital, I may as well describe it. It was tolerably large, rather long in proportion to its width, and with three windows on one side which overlooked the gardens of the noble old Schloss. These windows were high up in the wall, and were approached by two rather deep steps. There was another shallower step dividing the room nearly in half, after the fashion of a mediæval dais. The door gave access to the room at its highest end, and many unwary or near-sighted strangers had made an ignominious and embarrassing entrance into Frau von Groll's presence by plunging awkwardly over the unseen and unsuspected step, and coming heavily down to the lower level with the peculiar jarring shock which most of us know by experience. The walls of the apartment were of a deep, bright, glaring blue. A color of that insincere, bloomy kind very often to be seen in toy-shops, and which one instinctively feels would be liable to come off on contact with any other surface. The floor was of white wood, also recalling the toy-shop in its look and in its smell, with rectangular pieces of bright, many-colored carpet of various dimensions scattered here and there upon it. There was a round table at the lower end of the room, where Frau von Groll usually sat, covered with a green cloth bound with yellow. The chairs were covered with crimson velvet, usually concealed by chintz, but on this festive occasion the richer material was revealed in all its glory. It was doubtless very glorious. Nevertheless, it had the drawback of sticking tenaciously to any woolen or stuff garment with which it came in contact. Gentlemen in broadcloth and ladies in bombazine alike found an unexpected difficulty in getting up again when once they had sat down on one of these magnificent velvet cushions. At one end of the room stood a broad, massive sofa in mahogany and black horse-hair, on which were disposed sundry specimens of Frau von Groll's wool-work, in the shape of pillows and cushions. The blue walls were adorned with three colored prints, surrounded by gilt-paper in lieu of carved frames, and representing respectively Spring and Autumn and Napoleon Bonaparte crossing the Alps. Spring was a plump, fair young lady, in a chemise and a wreath of wild flowers of Parisian manufacture. Autumn was a plump, dark young lady, with very broad shoulders and a very small waist, who, notwithstanding the evident tightness of her stays, had been doing a good stroke of work without apparent fatigue, for she stood, sickle in hand, contemplating a newly-reaped corn-field, and leaning elegantly against a pile of impossibly-yellow sheaves. As to Napoleon Bonaparte, he was crossing the Alps apparently to slow music, being preceded by a military band, and mounted on a fiery steed, whose action was of that eminently pawing character only to be seen in perfection in a circus-trained animal. There was the inevitable white china stove, and a French looking-glass over it. There were several groups of paper-flowers, in pink, blue, and green vases, disposed on every available table or shelf; and, lastly, there was in one corner a small piano-forte, whose outer surface appeared to consist chiefly of gilding and crimson silk. Such was the aspect of Frau von Groll's drawing-room. And it certainly could not be objected to on the score of want of color, or a too prevailing sobriety of tint.

The company assembled within it was not very numerous, but it was of irreproachable gentility. There was the Justizrath's portly wife, and Fräulein Bopp, and the stout, placid matron who had made one at Frau von Schleppers's tea-party, and two other dames, who need not be more particularly described, inasmuch as they have no concern with my story. There was the Major von Groll standing with his back to the stove conversing with a group of gentlemen; and about the Major's personal appearance I may be allowed to say a word or two. He was of middle height, but owing to his extreme leanness, and the military erectness of his carriage, he appeared at first sight to be a tall man. He had a long peaked face, which seemed yet longer than it really was, owing to a high, bald, narrow forehead which rose above it. His naturally fair skin was tanned to a dull, deep red color, and his long, elaborately-pointed mustaches were of the lightest flaxen. He had high cheek-bones, immediately below which his cheeks sank into so deep a hollow that one might have supposed him to be purposely sucking them in to that shape. His eyes were light blue, widely open, and rather deep-set, under shaggy eyebrows of the same flaxen hue as his mustaches. The prevailing expression of Major von Groll's face was intense and hopeless melancholy. But this was merely an illusory effect caused by his meagreness, by the downward curve given to the line of his mouth, by his long, drooping mustaches, and by the unsmiling gravity of his eyes. Major von Groll was in reality by no means a melancholy man. But he was undeniably a dull man. The "melancholy," which some beholders found in his countenance, was no more a real sentiment than the "melancholy" which one may see in the eyes of a ruminating ox. Our imagination connects an idea of sadness with those large, dark, wistful orbs that the dumb beast turns on us so mildly. But all the while the ox is chewing the cud contentedly enough. The Major wore a military uniform, but even had he appeared in any other costume it would have been impossible to mistake his profession. And one might even have pronounced pretty safely to what branch of that profession he belonged. His whole air, his gestures, and especially the habitual attitude of his legs, proclaimed the cavalry officer. He was listening with his usual solemn, silent gravity to a warm discussion going on among his male guests, and occasionally throwing in a monosyllabic contribution to the argument.

The principal disputants were a learned Professor, whose long, leonine locks were shaken hither and thither in the heat of his discourse, as though a high wind were blowing about him, and a brother officer of the Major's.

"Erlauben Sie, permit me, I beg," said the latter in loud, abrupt tones. "I admit your erudition. I should never dream of disputing your opinion on a point of—of—" The military gentleman hesitated here for the weighty reason that he did not know precisely what it was that the Professor professed. But receiving no assistance from the by-standers—who indeed were not conscious of the nature of the difficulty he experienced in finishing his sentence—he presently added, with a circular wave of the hand, "On any scientific point, in short. But with regard to military questions you must allow me to say that no civilian—no civilian—is competent to discuss them."

"Good," grunted the Major, from beneath his mustache.

"Listen, Captain!" said the Professor, with much solemnity, at the same time putting back his hair behind his ears with both hands. "Not long ago I was visiting the fortress of Königstein for the purpose of studying the rock formation on which it is built, and of which I have spoken in my book on the Quadersandstein of the Saxon Switzerland" (this with a significant glance at the captain, who had shown himself so ignorant of the Professor's special and distinctive reputation in the scientific world), "and while there I got into conversation with an old officer—a veteran soldier who had seen service" (again with a significant glance at the captain); "and speaking of the strength of the place, I observed, jestingly, 'Ha, so Herr Lieutenant, then when the French come, you are ready for them, eh?' Upon which he shook his head, and made answer thus: 'Her Professor, the French will not come—but the Prussians will.'"

At this point the Professor's elf-locks were made, by some dextrous twist of the head, to release themselves from bondage behind his ears, and to tumble in wild disorder about his face, and the man of science folded his arms and gazed sternly on his adversary.

Then arose a great hubbub of voices. All talked together with none the less vehemence that no one could hear what the other said. "Prussia," "Austria," "National Movement," "Young Germany," "Anarchy," "Aristocracy," "Principles of Government," and "Revolutionary tendencies of the age," flew about hither and thither over the heads of the disputants, like showers of shot and shell, and one or two spent balls—to carry on the metaphor—reached the ladies, who forthwith began to fire off blank cartridges of shrill exclamations, that made a considerable report, but did nobody any harm. In the midst of the noise in walked the Justizrath von Schleppers. He went straight to where the hostess was sitting, and saluted her with the tortoise-like thrusting forth of his head which we know of. The gentlemen were still in the thick of their wordy war, and did not observe the Justizrath. The latter was at once seized upon by Frau von Groll as a promisingly taciturn recipient of her political creed. And the good lady proceeded to edify her guest by the enunciation of some rather stern and terrible sentences upon those who were so lost to all sense of right and religion as to desire to change in any way the existing order of things. Frau von Groll was quite Draconian in the simplicity and ferocity of her theory of punishment.

"Hang them all, or cut off their heads," said she, with a terrible resolution in her eye. "That appears to me to be the most direct course."

And Puss-in-boots put his head on one side with a thoughtful air, as though he was giving the proposition his best attention. Presently came a lull in the discussion going on near the stove, and then the Major saw Von Schleppers, and came across the room to greet him.

"We were in rather a stormy debate, and I did not perceive you at first, Herr Justizrath," said his host.

The Justizrath was reminded of his evening at the Pied Lamb, and the thought just flitted across his brain that the mode of conducting a political discussion did not differ so widely at the two poles of Detmold society as might have been expected beforehand.

"I wish you gentlemen wouldn't talk politics at all!" exclaimed Fräulein Bopp, clasping her hands.

Frau von Schleppers struck in with dignity. "My dear," said she, "that is all very well for you; but people in official positions have to consider public topics. When one belongs to the governing classes politics must be talked about."

"Well, I don't know," said the stout, placid matron, innocently; "I used always to go to her highness's Wednesday receptions when she was at the Residence, and I'm sure the Prince never said one word about politics at all. He used to chat about the theatre and the weather and the company at the baths of Meinberg, just like any body else."

The Justizrath hastened to smoothe matters down with his velvet paw. He thought it would be well to change the topic of discourse from the manners and customs of the "governing classes" to some less dangerous ground. So he said, "Ah Meinberg! Baths of Meinberg! What a charming little place! You know it well?"

"We always go to Pymont," observed Frau von Groll, with a superior air.

"Oh! I know Meinberg, Herr Justizrath," said the stout matron. "We have not been there for years, it is true; but when I was first married we went to Meinberg every season, and that is fully nineteen or twenty years ago."

"My goodness!" exclaimed Fräulein Bopp, with the ingenuous astonishment of one to whom nineteen or twenty years appear an immense period of time.

"Oh, yes it is, truly. And the second year we were there quite a romance happened that made a deal of talk at the time."

"A romance? Thenere Frau Oberhausen, do tell it us!" This time Fräulein Bopp was sincere and unaffected. She loved romance dearly, and was apt to believe in it with a fervor and simplicity which would have been pronounced quite charming if only the poor lady had been young and pretty.

"Oh, well, I don't know that there is much to tell," replied the stout matron, who had been addressed as Frau Oberhausen. "It created an interest at the time because the girl was known so well and was so pretty."

"What girl? Oh, do explain to us!"

"Why the poor girl that ran off with a young gentleman of good family. She was only a waitress at the Rose, but such a lovely creature. They say she was the very image of the Belle Chocolatière in the picture-gallery at Dresden."

"Hussy!" exclaimed Frau von Groll, waspishly. Frau von Schleppers's feelings were too deep for words. She raised her eyes to heaven and clasped her fat hands together in silent horror.

"Ah, well, dear me!" said Frau Oberhausen, softly; "of course it was wrong, and all that, but I know I was very, very sorry for her, poor thing! The young gentleman abandoned her after a time, and got married—so the story went—and I couldn't help crying over her fate. I was but a young bride, and I put the case to mv-self, if my Max had run off and left me—Ach Gott!"

"Why Frau Oberhausen," cried the hostess, pursing up her mouth, "you don't suppose such creatures have the same feelings that we have, do you?"

"What became of the girl?" asked Fräulein Bopp, timidly.

"No one ever knew for certain. Her old mother maintained for a good while that she was really married. But then folks heard of the young nobleman's marriage with a rich lady at Vienna. So, of course, it couldn't have been true what the mother said. The old woman died broken-hearted. And by degrees the whole affair was forgotten in Meinberg. New people came who had never seen the girl, and knew nothing about the story; but for two or three years the landlady at the Rose used to show a portrait of her that had been sketched by some foreign artist who came to the baths. It was a lovely face; so lovely that somebody bought it at last for its beauty, and paid a handsome price for it, too."

"Ah—h—h!" exclaimed Frau von Schleppers, rising and drawing her shawl about her with a virtuous shudder, "of course, what became of her was what always becomes of such creatures. I don't think you need waste your sympathy on her, Fräulein Bopp."

Then Mathilde majestically bade farewell to her hostess, and sailed out of the room with the Justizrath shambling meekly along in her wake. "I think Frau Oberhausen's story was in very bad taste," said she to her husband as they walked homeward together.

"Ach so! I'm afraid I was not listening to it, my dear. My head's full of business just now—full of business."

Then Mathilde perceived that for some occult reason the Justizrath desired to avoid discussing the matter. But the experience of thirty years sufficed to make her morally certain that her lord and master had perfectly heard and clearly remembered every syllable that had been said.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A KNOWLEDGE of geography is a matter of no little importance in these days. And it will not answer to rely upon ideas gained at school twenty, or even two years ago. To realize how great a change has taken place in the political geography of our country it is only necessary to glance over an old map of the United States—on which, for example, Missouri is the most Western State, and the Territories are four in number, Michigan, Wisconsin, Arkansas, and Florida. In olden times the great West seemed of but little importance, and it did not matter so much if we were ignorant of its vast extent. It is very different nowadays.

Not long ago, the President of a New York Bank inquired of a Western friend, "Do steamers run above Omaha?" An exchange makes this question the basis of an entertaining article. And it may not be fully realized by others, besides the President of that Bank, that steamers do run twenty-three hundred and sixty-eight miles above Omaha, diagonally across Dakota, into the very heart of Montana, to Fort Benton. The Eastern conception of the extent and rapid growth of the West is very vague. A good investment for every family would be made by purchasing one of the latest and best maps of the United States, and spending half an hour every evening in social study of our great country.

The great Skating Rink in Boston, which was recently opened to the public, and dedicated by a grand concert and other festivities, has been unfortunate. It was insecurely built, and the roof has fallen in, causing the death of one person, and severely injuring others. On one occasion since the opening of this rink not less than fifteen thousand persons were under this roof; and it is, therefore, a matter for thankfulness that when the accident occurred there were only a few painters at work inside. Whatever may have been the definite cause for the falling of the roof, architects may well learn a lesson from it.

A rocking-chair without rockers has been invented by a Massachusetts man. It is to all appearance an ordinary "easy-chair," but the chair-seat is detached from the lower frame, and, when the seat is occupied, moves backward and forward on two stout coil springs: the upper and lower frames being firmly held together by upright iron bearings. It is said to be far superior to the ordinary rocker.

It is a very good thing to know how to read. Mr. Charles Dickens has agreed to give one hundred readings in England at £100 each—£10,000 for the season.

According to the Jewish Messenger the sum of $750,000 was realized at the auction sale of pews in the new Temple Emanuel. The highest price paid was $4000, the purchaser selecting the pew directly in front of the pulpit. Many of the seats were sold at a comparatively low price, the trustees declining to neglect the claims of the poorer members. The lowest priced pews were sold for $300, accommodating seven occupants each. By this sale, the Temple stands free from debt, and with a sinking fund of $100,000, which will be increased when the pews remaining unsold are disposed of.

Longfellow's new volume, which has been announced, is entitled "The New England Tragedies," and contains two dramatic poems. One of them is based on the persecution of the early Quakers in New England, the other upon the witchcraft delusion.

Steinway Hall has been undergoing various improvements. Skillful artists have quite transformed the plain and dreary-looking hall of last year into an elegant and attractive concert-room. The ornamentations are beautiful, and many important alterations have been made, among which is the addition of a new stairway, making egress from the hall much easier than before. It is announced that Mrs. Siddons Scott is to read for the first time in America, at the opening of the hall on Monday, the 19th of October, and that on the evening following Ole Bull will give a concert.

Numerous attempts have been made to discover something that would answer the purpose of the albumen used on paper prepared for photographs, and yet leave the surface dead instead of shining. The object has been at last attained in Paris, by Chambay, the photographer of the Champs Elysées, whose new mode of coloring photographs attracted notice about two years ago. The photographs have a much greater softness upon the dull paper, and when taken from engravings are undistinguishable from the originals. The process to which the paper is subjected is still a secret, but can hardly fail to come into general use soon.

A curious collection of forty thousand play-bills, from all countries, has recently been donated to the library of Brunswick, Germany. The donor has spent upward of twenty years in gathering these oddities together, some of which date back to the last century.

Among the curiosities to be seen at the Paris Exhibition was the spinning-wheel used by Queen Marie Antoinette during her imprisonment. After her execution it was given to one of her ladies in waiting, and a grand-daughter, who has recently married a Hungarian of high rank, has inherited it.

It is said that Milwaukee has had a "Peach Festival." Here in New York peaches have been too high and scarce and poor to admit of using them with much freedom.

The Florida air-plant is a great curiosity. It grows freely on the bark of living trees. Its favorite locality appears to be the bank of the St. John, where it flourishes on the large oaks which overhang that glorious river. It does not penetrate the bark like mistletoe, but merely sends its roots into the cracks and fissures, and is really an "air-plant," as it appears to live entirely on air and moisture. It grows readily when taken from the tree and transplanted. When plucked the plant is found to contain pure ice-cold water, obtained, it is said, from the heavy dews which prevail at night in Florida.

A Philadelphia paper states that New York depends largely upon Philadelphia for its supply of cut-flowers—that a bouquet sold there for a couple of dollars brings five here. The flower trade of Philadelphia has attracted a great deal of capital as well as skill. At Tiverton a hundred acres of rich land are being converted into a flower and seed farm. A range of hot-houses is now in construction upon it on a new plan. The means of heating will be hot-water pipes, but the method of building is what is known as the ridge and furrow system. Thus, instead of a range of buildings being under one great roof, leaving a vast space to be heated, each building has a ridge and furrow covering, requiring but half the fuel used under the usual plan.

Prang has several new pictures in process of lithographing, which will soon be issued. "A California Sunset," after Bierstadt, "Horses in a Storm," after Adams, a German artist, have just been published; and "Our Kitchen Bouquet," after Haring, will speedily appear. These chromos are beautifully executed, and serve to decorate a home inexpensively and tastefully.

The name given to the fashionable drive in Hyde Park—Rotten Row—has a curious origin. It is a corruption of Route du Roi—the King's Road. The crowded thoroughfare of the Strand was formerly a mere river-strand—a narrow, thinly-settled suburban lane, washed by the Thames. Temple Bar is the only gateway now standing of the ancient city of London proper, and separates it from Westminster. It is never closed except when the sovereign is going to enter the old city, when a herald sounds a trumpet before it, and after a parley in proscribed and ancient forms the sovereign is admitted by the Lord Mayor.

A novel invention is announced, which threatens to throw the most skillful musical performers into the shade, and to deprive music teachers of their means of livelihood. The apparatus is called the pianautomaton, or the organautomaton, and is expected to perform on the piano or organ the most difficult music which can be procured at "first sight," and without hesitation. This will be a great improvement upon living performers! The patent of the inventor covers three different kinds of instruments: one which contains within it a magneto-electric apparatus, and which is worked by a crank; another, provided with a galvanic battery, and also worked by a crank; and a self-acting instrument, which performs alone, without any apparent aid. The apparatus can be attached to any piano or organ. The music played by this novel performer must be written in a special manner, and can be rendered with the nicest variations of style. Such, at least, are the reports. The inventor is Mr. Eugene Trastour de Varano, a native of New Orleans.

An insect exhibition in the Champs Elysées is attracting considerable attention in Paris. The collection shows every variety of insect, from the largest to the most minute. The transformations of the silk-worm, and the habits of the bee are displayed, and form instructive studies. It is curious to find in this entomological collection some cases contributed by scientific milliners. A fashionable modiste sends three bonnets sparkling with rows of beetles' wings of prismatic charm, evidently from the tropics. To adapt the green and gold wing of a beetle to Parisian modes is considered by the scientific promoters of the exhibition an art worthy of place in their instructive collection. Another case shows the gem-like glitter of the insect's body and wings mounted as jewels.

A singular ceremony took place not long since in Mandalay, Burmah, in connection with the "boring the ears" of the daughters of the king. The whole of the royal party were bedecked with diamonds, rubies, sapphires, emeralds, and pearls. His Majesty and two of the principal queens were scarcely able to walk from the weight of the ornaments on their robes. The king and the queens were supported on either side by maids of honor of rare Burmese beauty. The orchestra was filled by dancing girls, who performed on sackbuts, drums, and harps. It is estimated that the whole affair will cost upward of ten lacs of rupees. The gates of the palace were thrown open to all—men, women, and children—and theatrical performances went on day and night.

It is well worth while for women to learn to swim. Not long ago, one of the bathers at Nahant was carried out beyond her depth and suddenly sunk. A friend, attempting to save her, as quickly disappeared; but a young servant-girl swam out to the spot, and after a serious struggle brought them both to a place of safety.

Whatever may be said in opposition to women leaving what is considered their special "sphere" to enter the more public walks of life, there seems to be a good degree of liberality shown in regard to their becoming physicians. Many are very willing to concede that they are well fitted for certain departments of medical practice, provided they are properly educated. The Women's Medical College of this city, under the charge of Dr. Lozier, has been for some time in successful operation; and a new medical institution will soon be opened by the Drs. Blackwell. Both receive the support of the medical profession. A Women's Hospital has been established in Philadelphia, where a systematic course of instruction is received. A great deal of opposition has been made in England to the policy of educating women for physicians. Years ago Miss Nightingale, desiring to prepare herself as an intelligent nurse, could find no institution in England suited to her wants, and went to Germany to study. Miss Garrett found great difficulty in obtaining admission to any English institution, and was compelled to pay a much larger entrance fee than was required of a man. But in France the greatest liberality is shown to women in this respect, and the French schools have been patronized by those desiring medical instruction from both England and America.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

FLORENCE.—To alter a skirt gored closely about the waist into the present full style you must substitute two full widths behind for the sloped widths worn a year ago. A more economical way of modernizing a gored skirt is to make a separate panier put on over the skirt, according to the directions given in the New York Fashions of this Number. The sample of striped poplin you send will make a stylish petticoat for a suit, with over-skirt and mantle of changeable poplin, scarlet and black, or, if this is too gay, solid black. You will find hints about over-skirts in this Number of the Bazar.

FAYETTEVILLE.—Bustles are almost universally worn. Dresses are not cut so low in the neck as they were during the summer. Read the article about dresses in another part of this paper.

ROMANCE.—A large nose, if of nature's making, can not be cured, and must therefore be endured; if a product of disease, then probably it is an efflorescence of what the doctors call acne rosacea, which requires this treatment: The nose should be well fomented every night with a decoction of marsh-mallows, as hot as can be borne, the fomentation being continued for full half an hour. As soon as the part is dry, dab it with this lotion:

Sublimate of mercury 2 grains.
Almond mixture 4 pint.
Mix.

Then lay over the nose a piece of lint dipped in the same, covering the whole with oiled silk. In the morning wash with soap and water, and make a single application of the lotion, to last the whole day. When the size of the nose becomes exorbitant it is sometimes necessary to have it pared down with the surgeon's knife. The lotion above-mentioned is also a very effective one for the "removal of pimples from the face and making the complexion clear."

HORACE.—We can hardly advise you as regards "the proper mode of declaration to your lady-love." If the affection is mutual we should suppose there would be no difficulty in coming to an understanding. Where both are "willing" there is very little necessary to be said on either side. You may, as you propose, make your declaration by letter; but if you have not the courage to do it by word of mouth, we should doubt either the strength of your love or the proof of hers.

E. SURBEY.—Black continues to be worn, especially with colored skirts. Changeable blacks in which a tinge of blue, maroon, or purple is introduced are newer. Pleated flounces and fringe, headed by bias bands, are the trimmings most used. Trim your changeable poplin like the design No. 2 of the illustrations of dress trimmings given in Bazar No. 51. The chain of puffs on the flounce called melon trimming should be of silk.

ELLA BELLE.—The plaid you speak of is more fashionable than merino. The skirt should just clear the ground. Trim with three bands of the same edged with silk of a solid color. Sacque of blue plush, of velvet beaver cloth, or white Astrakhan cloth with a hat to match. Fluting machines are from $12 to $18. Fluting scissors from seventy-five cents to $1.50.

Mrs. G. M. B.—A stout lady should not wear a Garibaldi dress. We can not promise to give you the patterns you mention.

LUOY L.—More exercise and the heartier appetite which will come with it are probably all you require.

A. L.—Your frequent fits of hiccough are due, probably, to too hasty eating and drinking after long abstinence. If a greater regularity of meals and more deliberate consumption of them don't cure, a drop or two of ether on a lump of sugar probably will.

ANNIE F.—One hour is a small enough allowance for dinner, not that you require all that time for masticating and swallowing your food, but you need some time for repose after before resuming work.

X. Y.—It is not a good practice to sleep after dinner. It is a dangerous one even, especially where there is a great inclination to it, as this indicates a tendency to fullness of the head, and its more or less remote consequences of apoplexy, etc., which are favored by the habit of taking a daily siesta.

NURSE.—A quarter of an hour is generally long enough to keep on a good mustard plaster. Such a one retained for "an hour or more" might cause a severe burn, which thus produced would be dangerous and very difficult to heal.

HOUSEKEEPER.—Stoves are unwholesome if their use is not combined with means for thorough ventilation. An open fire-place, with a fire in it, is one of the best ventilators.

LIDA.—Make a gored slip of the merino, shaped by seams at the side. The fullness front and back forms a broad box-pleat like the Watteau fold. A wide sash of ribbon or of the merino embroidered confines it at the waist. There is no way of getting rid of the front seam in your dress. It is the buttons that are so objectionable. Remove them and place trimming over the seam.—"No Thoroughfare" was written jointly by Mr. Dickens and Wilkie Collins.

COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.—You will find a complete alphabet of capitals designed for pocket handkerchiefs in Harper's Bazar, No. 45, page 709.

JANIE.—Pearl-colored silk is becoming to brunettes. Select a steel-gray poplin for your bridal traveling dress, made with a flounced skirt polonaise and small cape. Line the polonaise with flannel. Trim with satin bands and fringe.

E. P. W.—We do not publish individual monograms. The Watteau wrapper described in this Number will suit your style and material.

ZULETTE.—We have said before that we can not always give precisely such patterns as each reader may want. If you have a file of the Bazar you will probably find the designs you ask for in a former Number.

ADELIN.—Take four deep pleats about the hips on the side seams of your polonaise. Put a large button on each pleat. A sash of gros grain depends from the centre of the belt. It is composed of several loops or a very large bow. The ends must not be more than half a yard or three-quarters in length. You will find information about short dresses on another page of this Number.

BURNETT'S COCAINE is a perfect hair-dressing for preserving and beautifying the hair, and rendering it dark and glossy. No other compound possesses the peculiar properties which so exactly suit the various conditions of the human hair. It is the best and cheapest hair-dressing in the world. For sale by all druggists.

S. T.—1860—X.—The unprecedented and extraordinary demand for PLANTATION BITTERS is evidently owing to their being prepared with pure St. Croix Rum, Calisaya Bark, etc. Our druggists complain that it is almost impossible to keep a supply, and that their orders, owing to the great demand, are but tardily executed. Do not become discouraged. Be sure and get the genuine.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.—Mail.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR REMOVED from any part of the body in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by UPHAM'S DEPLATORY POWDER. $1.25 by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, 115 South Seventh St., Philadelphia.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FACETIE.

The following announcement lately appeared in a paper: "Edward Eden, painter, is requested to communicate with his brother, when he will hear of something to his advantage—his wife is dead."

PRECIOUS STONES AND METALS.

The head of these is of course the king of diamonds (which, if genuine, are always trumps). Diamonds resemble over-obtrusive friends—it is so difficult to cut them. Like men, however, they frequently cut one another. In fact, diamond only can cut diamond, and it is impossible to cut even diamond panes of glass with any thing else. But, when once cut, diamonds take an exquisite polish, or rather they have it given them. They are procured from Brazil, and in India from Vizagpoor and Madras—in short, many places ending in poor are rich in them. They are found in the bed of the River Ganges—who evidently sleeps in his jewelry.

Then comes the ruby. This gem is frequently seen to sparkle on the nose of the topaz—I mean toper—who imbibes too much ruby wine.

The carbuncle is the richest uncle any one need wish for.

The emerald is distinguished by being the softest and greenest of all jewels—softness and greenness generally go together.

The sapphire, found in far Peru, resembles in its depth of hue the bright, glowing Prussian blue. The sapphire is a kind of sapphiry blue color, darker than azure, as you're probably aware.

Then there is the chrysolite, and its opposite the chrysodark, although where the latter is found I certainly can not say.

The pearl, the pearl! who can help admiring this per-riceless gem, and eating any number of oysters to arrive at its semblance in the denuded shells? Oysters are found in the Persian Gulf, and thereabouts, where, of course, there are many divers, such as the Maldivas, the Lacedivas, and divers others.

The onyx is an onyx-pensive gem, whose hue is sometimes brown—and occasionally Jones and Robinson. Then among others is the opal, which is distinguished by a kind of milky tint, easily detected by a lapid-dairy.

Of course there is no end of other precious stones, such as the hearth-stone, the paving-stone, and the cherry-stone, but these I need not particularize. The load-stone, although not so showy as the diamond, possesses much attraction.

There is one kind, too, called a free-stone. A stone hitting one on the head is more free than welcome. Free-stone is of course principally worked by Freemasons. The blarney-stone makes a man invincible with the ladies.

We now come to the metals. (N.B.—Some of them are slow in coming to us, especially the precious ones.)

Gold is the hardest—to get—of all metals, and yet, strangely enough, it is most easily got from soft people. It is much used in jewelry, the general recognized standard being two parts of gold to forty-eight of alloy.

That useful metal, iron, is largely used in medicine. A little iron insinuated into a man's system inspires him with an iron determination. It is not generally known that iron ores are always used to propel the boats attached to our iron-clads.

Steel dumplings are made by putting iron ones into a furnace, and subjecting them to the usual processes. All steel requires well tempering, and a knife sharpened upon a good-tempered steel will always insure a pleasant dinner.

Copper is principally known in connection with half-pence, washing-days, and the fortifying of those ubiquitous vessels that carry experienced surgeons.

Silver is a quarrelsome metal. You should take care of any property composed of it, for you know that there is always fighting going on near the Plate.

PUMPKINS. "Why, Dawkins, how thin you've grown! One could hardly say, now, whether you've three Umbrellas or three Legs!"
DAWKINS. "Ah, my boy! and you'd have been Thin too if you'd passed the Season at Long Branch, as I have! But I hope City Air and Regular Hours may set me up again!"

Old Nickel is, as may be guessed, of a sulphurous origin.
Zinc is very useful to literary men, for it's ink that they write with. The oxyd of zinc is called calamine, for which reason, when it is dug up, a chorus of "My dear boys, it's a calamine!" is invariably sung by the miners.

Among all these minerals we have not mentioned the philosopher's stone, because it is a substance that has never been found in any mine, nor yet found out. Oceans of philosophers have tried to discover it, but in vain.

An old lady attended Episcopal service for the first time just as the congregation were rising. "Oh don't, don't, good people!" she exclaimed; "I am not deserving such honor. Pray, keep your seats!"

A FISH STORY.—An Alabama paper, speaking of Florida, says, "There are also numerous small lakes of pure water, filled with fish, some of which are only a few rods in extent, while others are from two to ten miles long."

SARAPHIM.

Are you beauteous as the rose,
Saraphim?
Have you snub or Grecian nose,
Does a smile white teeth disclose,
Does a dimple sweet repose
In your chin?

Have you black and glossy hair,
Saraphim?
Over forehead broad and fair—
With your arching eyebrows rare—
Do you friz or braid it there,
Saraphim?

I am trying to surmise,
Saraphim,
Have you sparkling, speaking eyes,
Does your bosom fall and rise,
In response to lovers' sighs,
Saraphim?

Though our eyes have never met,
Saraphim,
My fond heart can ne'er forget,
And 'tis wildly beating yet
For its little stranger pet,
Saraphim.

POSSIBLY NOT.—Is it an original remark that the "estate" of matrimony may be said to be in a "ring fence?"

A certain Justice was called to the jail to liberate a worthless debtor, by receiving his oath that he was not worth twenty dollars. "Well, Johnny," said the Justice, "can you swear that you are not worth twenty dollars, and that you never will be?"

"Why," answered the other, rather chagrined at the question, "I can swear that I am not worth that at present."

"Well, well," returned the Justice, "I can swear to the rest; so go along, Johnny." And the man was sworn and discharged.

THE CENTRE OF GRAVITY.—A modern comic song.

THE CHIEF OF THE MINT AUTHORITIES.—Lamb.

HORRIBLE CUSTOM.—We have been credibly informed that during the season a large number of persons have been observed picking up flesh at the sea-side. Surely the authorities, including the coroners, ought to make some inquiries about so horrifying a habit.

"Peter, what are you doing to that boy?" said a schoolmaster. "He wanted to know if you take ten from seventeen how many will remain, so I took ten of his apples to show him, and now he wants I should give them back." "Well, why don't you do it, then?" "Coz, Sir, he would then forget how many is left."

What makes the sun rise?—Why, the East, of course, stoopid!

A New York tradesman having three customers, a father and two sons, by the name of Wheeler, and fearing a confusion of accounts from their different orders, solved his difficulty by styling the stern parent "Stern Wheeler," the eldest son "Side Wheeler," and the youngest, rather a fast youth, "Propeller."

A BRAVE LITTLE GIRL.—A little girl in a Sunday-school was asked by her teacher:

"Mary, do you say your prayers morning and night?"

"No, Miss, I don't."

"Why, Mary! are you not afraid to go to sleep in the dark without asking God to take care of you and watch over you until the morning?"

"No, Miss, I ain't afraid, 'cause I sleep in the middle."

A German wrote an obituary on the death of his wife, of which the following is a copy: "If mine wife had lived until next Friday she would have been dead about two weeks. Nothing is possible with the Almighty. As de tree falls so must it stand."

The following rather remarkably worded advertisement was lately printed in a newspaper among the "Situations Wanted."

A LAZY, Idle, Indolent, Sleepy, Slothful young man of 20 wants a boss who will compel him to banish the above habits. Dabbles in all trades; situation not so much an object as good pay.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. I.—No. 53.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1868.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

HANGING BASKETS.

THESE have become such a common accompaniment to almost every parlor window that it may seem almost superfluous to describe them here, or give any directions for their manufacture. Still, we will venture on a few hints to those who may yet wish to make them either for themselves or for others.

One of the prettiest styles is made by taking a common horse muzzle, made of wire, and have it painted, with oil color, green. Then, when dry, take large pieces or sheets of the bright green moss, which abounds in the woods and by the road-sides in the spring, and line the inside with it, letting the green side be turned outward; then fill up the centre with earth, and plant your vines and flowers, three cords being fastened to the top wire at regular distances, by which it is to be hung up. (See Fig. 1.)

It can be watered occasionally, and the moss freshened, by dipping it into a bucket of water.

Another variety is the Rustic style, so popular and beautiful. (See Fig. 2.) In order to make one of these, procure from the woods a quantity of the bilsted branches, or other crooked, rough, or knotty twigs. Put them to soak in hot water, or steam them, so as to render them perfectly pliable. Get one of the turned wooden bowls such as are to be found in house-furnishing stores, stain it with some of the brown staining materials or black varnish, and then bore holes, or insert screw rings on the outside, for the cords or chains to pass through. Now bend around the outside of the bowl one of the pieces of bilsted, and nail it securely at the top edges on either side. Several pieces can be twined around in this way, according to one's taste, until the whole surface is covered; then finish off with one around the edge for a border.

When this is varnished it is very pretty, and the vines will of course be trained to hang over the edge.

Various styles of home-made hanging baskets and vases are to be found, but we will only give one more, which, being so delicate in its size and construction, will answer only for the house. Take an egg, the larger the better; make a little opening at the broad end, so as to let out the contents. Then with a pair of scissors cut around the hole until about one-quarter of the entire shell has been removed, and it is tolerably smooth on the edges. If this cutting is done immediately the shell will not be very brittle, as is the case in a little while after it is opened. (See Fig. 3.)

Now make a little net-work bag of split zephyr wool, choosing some dark, rich color, such as purple, crimson, or blue. Set on 28 stitches, and net 19 rows around, using a small mesh. When done, put a little tassel to the end where it was commenced, which must be drawn up to form the bag. Next draw this bag over the egg-shell, and then, with a needle threaded with the end of the zephyr, draw it over the edge of the egg, and finish it neatly off with a sort of button-hole stitch all around.

Twist three little cords of the wool, and fasten them at regular distances, making them of the same length (about seven inches), tie them together, and sew on little tassels at the places where they start from the egg.

An open-work crochet bag will be quite as pretty, and will suit those who do not understand netting. A little border of the same work around the edge will make a variety in the style.

These little vases will hold either earth or water, and when filled with little flowers are very pretty. A few violets or other early spring blossoms will fill the tiny cup, which, when suspended from a side gas-burner, or over a centre-table, shows to good advantage.

FALL COSTUMES.

Fig. 1.—Dress for girl from 10 to 12 years old. Over-skirt and waist of pearl-gray cashmere, trimmed with bias folds and a narrow flounce of the same material, and caught up in a panier behind by two lappets edged with bias folds.

High corsage and close sleeves. Plain under-skirt of blue cashmere. Hair brushed back, with a braid across the top, and worn in a net behind. Black gaiters.

Fig. 2.—Suit of bear's-eat-garnet poplin. Skirt plain. Paletot lined with flannel, and trimmed with a narrow frill and bias folds of silk down the front and along the side seams. Small cape on the paletot and close sleeves, with cuffs trimmed in the same manner. Hair crêpéd and drawn back from the temples, with long curls behind the ears.

Fig. 3.—Morning dress of changeable gold and brown cashmere, trimmed up the front with brown silk bows consisting of a knot and two ends on each side, bound round the edge, and passementerie gimp. Dress loose, in the Watteau style, with demi train. Rather loose coat-sleeves, with three rows of gimp round the wrist. Chignon of curls. Hair crêpéd in front and drawn back from the temples.

Fig. 4.—Suit of church purple gros grain. Paletot loose in the back, and trimmed with a narrow frill and bias folds of the same material, and large passementerie buttons. Fronts scarf-shaped, and longer than the back.

Fig. 5.—Dress of lavender poplin, long, with double pouf behind, trimmed with passementerie points and tassels. High corsage and close sleeves, trimmed in the same manner. Skirt plain, with demi train. Hair crêpéd, with high chignon and long curls behind the ears.

Fig. 6.—Under-skirt of Sultan-red gros grain, trimmed with a deep flounce and bias folds of the same. Over-skirt of black silk, trimmed with puffing, passementerie points, buttons, and tassels, and looped up in the back with two black silk rosettes. High corsage, with pointed busque and fichu cape.

NOON.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

Nor a murmur the stillness breaks,
Deep are the silences, deep and rare,
Nor leaf nor petal a humming makes
Singing vibrating on answering air.
Scarcely a murmur the stillness breaks,
Save where the sinuous sibilant snakes
Slip like fire through the crackling brakes
And coruscate to a sunnier lair
With barbarous brilliance as they go—
Save where the poppy trembles and shakes
One silver drop to the pool below—
Save where the light, that drips in flakes
Through the lush-leaved roof with a flame and flare, Falls on great uncurled roses, where,
With a din and a far bewildered blare,
The gauzy swarm from drowsy dreams awakes.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1868.

DESCRIPTION OF

COLORED FASHION PLATE,

ACCOMPANYING THIS NUMBER FOR OCT. 31, 1868.

To be followed by others in quick succession.

Reception, Carriage, and Evening Dresses.

Fig. 1.—RECEPTION DRESS. Dress of green gros grain, bordered with three narrow flounces, surmounted by five bias folds of satin. Over-skirt in the form of a tunic, of the same material as the preceding, trimmed with three bias folds of satin and a trellised fringe. This tunic is open at the sides, and bouffant at the sides and in the back. High, plain corsage with belt.

Fig. 2.—CARRIAGE DRESS. Dress of Sultan red taffeta, trimmed with a deep flounce, surmounted by three bouillonés, with high corsage and long sleeves. Over-dress of black silk grenadine, shorter than the preceding, and of the Watteau shape; this dress is caught up at the sides by large black velvet bows, and the front breadth is trimmed with black fringe.

Fig. 3.—EVENING DRESS. Dress of pale gray taffeta, trimmed with three small flounces. Corset of the same, with short puffed sleeves, trimmed with a pink ruche. Sash, trimmed with a similar ruche; high corsage, and long sleeves of puffed muslin.

Our next Supplement Number will contain a Double Pattern Sheet, with a rich variety of full-sized Patterns for LADIES' WINTER CLOAKS; together with Cloak Trimmings, etc., etc. Children's Cloaks will appear in the following Supplement Number.

GROWING OLD TOO FAST.

IT is an old saying that men and women are but children of a greater growth. This might have been so in former times, but nowadays it is more true to say that children are but men and women of a smaller growth. Boys and girls have gone out with the old stage-coach and other slow and obsolete modes of progress of a past generation. The age has become as impatient of the deliberate course of ancient Nature as of the tedious processes of old-fashioned Art. As man now lives so much faster it is presumed that he should grow with proportionate speed, and the child is accordingly forced at once to manhood without being allowed to pass through the successive stages of a gradual development.

It may be questioned whether the premature manhood and womanhood so characteristic of our day, and especially of the United States, is a judicious manifestation of human power. It has, no doubt, the advantage of bringing into quicker activity the forces of our great continent, which otherwise might have had a more lengthened slumber. Men and women with nimble wits and flexible hands were greatly wanted to give immediate movement to the torpid resources of the country, and as they could not be readily obtained, it became necessary suddenly to turn the boys and girls into men and women. As a temporary expedient the plan may have served its purpose; but the same hurried demand for human force, however immature, no longer existing, it would be well to recur to the ancestral distinction between the greenness of youth and ripeness of age.

It is bad economy to take the days which belong to youth and transfer them to manhood with the view of saving time. This always proves a loss instead of a gain. There can be no sound and fruitful age without a full childhood. This is true in regard to all the conditions of life, physical, moral, and intellectual. The body needs the free play of every hour of growth, the mind all the unlimited range of the wayward thought of childhood, and the heart the full joyousness of youthful wantonness, in order to acquire the muscular strength, the mental vigor, and moral buoyancy essential to bear the weighty labors of mature life.

There is perhaps no quality more essential to happiness than elasticity of spirits, and there is none which fails the American so soon. He persists in his work, no doubt, with a tenacity unequalled by few, and his enterprise lasts as long as that of most, but the very length and persistency of his labors are proofs of his fixedness and his incapacity to unbend. Old age with us is apt not only to shrink the body to bones, but to dry the soul into a skeleton. This is mainly owing to the want of that succulency of animal spirits which can only be stored up during a long and joyous childhood.

We should be sorry to admit that the advance of age necessarily brings with it progress in immorality. We will by no means allow that this is an essential, but we can not deny that it is generally an accompaniment. We therefore would insist upon a prolongation of youth, if it were only to secure a further continuation of its innocency. Apart from the greater vices there are the minor ones, the chief prevalence of which may be fairly attributed to the premature manhood of our day. Is it not probable if our male youth were checked in their taste to become men that they would be less likely to acquire the habit, for example, of using tobacco, or would, at any rate, postpone the acquisition until they had become so old and tough as not to be injured by it? The supposed manliness of this, as well as other more vicious and fatal habits is the main inducement for our would-be men to acquire them.

Our Lilliputian women, too, with all their coquetry of dress and manners, and their early initiation into the frivolities and dissipations of fashionable society, are the natural results of a too early emancipation from the nursery and school-room. Girls fancy themselves women so soon that they cease to study, at the very moment they first become capable of learning. Abandoning their books and all other means of improvement, and fancying their education finished, they do what they are only capable of doing, dressing, flirting, visiting, and getting or trying to get married.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

On Capital Letters.

MY DEAR PYTHAGORAS,—In my afternoon walk yesterday I passed the new place which Omicron has just been laying out at great expense. It was Sunday, and I am afraid that my frame of mind was not exactly what it should have been, for I could not help thinking of Mr. Omicron in a manner which was not full of Christian sympathy. The house was bought of the old widow Scrawney, who has gone to live in Europe, and on the gate-posts I beheld the capital O, as on the façades of famous palaces I have seen the coats of arms of renowned families. The capital O—it stands for Omicron certainly. Nobody who sees it, and who asks what does O stand for, but will receive that answer. "That is Omicron's place, the famous rich Omicron. O stands for Omicron." Yes, some passer will observe, when this rather obvious remark is made to him—yes, O stands for Omicron, and what does Omicron stand for?

That is a question which I doubt if our good friend has ever asked himself. Indeed, I wonder if you and I have ever asked ourselves that question, my dear Pythagoras, in regard to certain other initials and names, such as P and B. What, in fact, do the names stand for, for which those initials stand? However, our present business is with Omicron, and as I continued my walk, I could not find that Omicron stood for anything but a rich man. That stately house, those pleasant grounds, that sumptuous carriage with O on the doors, and O on the hammer-cloth, and O on the blinders, and O on the saddles, rolling in by the massive gate-posts with O carved in the eternal sandstone, or sand-pine, I have never been sure which it is—all this is very impressive, but as we stand in the dust of it all, only the great truth remains impressed upon the mind—Omicron stands for a rich man.

Now I do not think it is a friendly thing to say of any man—I mean it is not friendly or agreeable to be able to say nothing of a man but that he is rich. We have no vulgar prejudices against riches, you and I. I confess for myself that nothing would be pleasanter to me than to hear that my uncle from India had just made his will and mentioned somebody whose initial letter is B, as his sole heir. I do not think I should use that great fortune foolishly; and, indeed, in a recent letter I mentioned at least one of the uses to which I should devote a part of it. But if I merely marked all that fortune with a capital B, if, so to speak, upon all my gate-posts and carriages and harnesses there were nothing but a great B, if I myself went around marked with a great B, and it could be truly said that B stands for Bachelor, and Bachelor stands only for his Indian uncle's fortune, I should feel somehow as if my life had wholly miscarried.

What should I like Bachelor to stand for? What ought Omicron to wish O to stand for? Why, if it were not almost too personal, my dear Pythagoras, I could mention the names of rich men that stand for very much besides riches. And I will make bold to name one. I will mention Bellamy. That B stands, I was about to say, for all the cardinal virtues. It stands for humanity, good sense, charity, intelligent sympathy. It stands for the blessings of the poor, for the admiration of the wise, for the confidence of the sagacious. I am not sure about the gate-posts and the harness and the hammer-cloth. But I am entirely sure of the hearts of a hundred widows and orphans. There is a very large B stamped upon them, and it stands for Bellamy, and blessings on him. I doubt if you find the Omicron O in similar places, and yet they are more enduring than hammer-cloths and sandstone gate-posts. Suppose you saw on some faded old saddle-cloth, or upon some mouldy blinder, the initial W, and were told that it stood for Washington! There would be something more in that letter, I fancy, than a Virginian planter.
